

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is **M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

**M.125

.5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1181-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 22-25

1902-03 TO 1905-06

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
 1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13"x18"
 METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
 PHOTOGRAPHIC

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

PRECISION<sup>SM</sup> RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
 St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
 1234567890

4.5 mm

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 22

1902-1903

LIBRARY
MUSEUM OF
THE
CITY OF
NEW YORK

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.

THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

**M 125.5 vol. 22

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1902 — 1903. ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

1197
L. S. Spence, Inc.

M. 125.5 vol. 22
 Allen A. Benson
 June 15, 1903

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Date of Performance
Albert, Eug. d'	Ouv. to "The Ruby"	Nov. 29. 1902
Arensky	Intro. to "Nala + Damayanti"	Jan. 24. 1903
Bach, J.S.	Ouv. No. 2 in B minor Concert in A min. Violin + Orch. Franz Kneisel	Oct 18. 1902 Dec 6. 1902
Beethoven	Symphony No 1. op 21 " " 3 " 55 " " 4 " 60 " " 5 " 67 Concerto Violin + Orch. op 61 Hugo Hermann Concerto No 5 Piano + Orch. op 73 Fredric Lamond Ouv. Leonora No 2. op 72 " " " 3 " Andante Cantabile from op 97 Rec. + aria "To Hope" op 94 Anton van Rooy	Apr 25. 1903 Dec 6. 1902 Nov 15. " Feb. 14. 1903 Feb 28 " Nov 1. 1902 Oct 18. 1902 March 1. 1903 Jan 31. " Nov 22. 1902
Berlioz	Ouv. "Roman Carnival" op 9 " "Les Francs Juges" " 3 Two Three Movements from Romeo + Juliet op 17 Two " " "	Oct 25. 1902 Dec 6. " Dec 27 " Feb 7. 1903
Bizet, Geo.	Suite "Arlesienne" No 1 " "Roma"	Nov 15. 1902 Apr 26. 1903
Borodin	"On the Steppes of Central Asia" op 7	Apr 20. 1903
Brahms J.	Symphony No 1. op 68 " " 3 " 90 "Hungarian Dances" for orch. Concerto for Violin + Orch. op 77 Miss Maud Macarthy	Dec 27. 1902 Nov 1. " Jan 24. 1903 Nov 15. 1902

Brahms J.	Two Parts Songs for female chorus op 17. Nos. 1 + 4 with Harp + Horns Two Songs for Female Voices without acft. op 44 Nos 1 + 2	May 2. 1903 " 2 "
Chapman	Suite for orch. "Impressions of Italy"	March 14. 1903
Cherubini	Ouv. to the "Water Carrier"	Feb 7. 1903
Convers F.S.	"Endymion's Narrative" op 10.	Apr 11. 1903
Dvorák A.	Symphony No 5. op 95 "Symphonic Variations" for orch. op 78	Jan 10. 1903 Nov 22. 1902
Elgar, Edw	"Sea Pictures" 5 songs with orch. op 37 Mad. Kirkby Lunn	Jan 3. 1903
Fibich	Ouv. "A night at Karlstein" op 26	Jan 31. 1903
Foot, Arthur	Suite in D min: op 26 for orch:	March 28. 1903
Frank, Caesar	Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides"	Dec 20. 1902
German, E.	"Love the Pedlar" with orch. Miss Ada Crossley	Apr 26. 1903
Giovanni	Aria "Caro mio ben" Miss Ada Crossley	Apr 26. 1903
Gluck	Ouv. "Iphigenia in Aulis"	Apr 18. 1903
Goldmark B.	"Chorus of Spirits, Spirit Dance" for orch from Merlin	Jan 10. 1903
Gounod, Ch	Stances from "Tappho" Mad. Kirkby Lunn	Jan 3. 1903
Guilmant	Symphony for organ + orch. op 42 Mr Wallace Goodrich	Apr 11. 1903

Hahn R.	"Paysage" with Piano Miss Ada Crossley	Apr 26. 1903
Handel	"Largo" for Violins, Harp, orch, + organ organ, Mr Wallace Goodrich	Apr 26. 1903
Haydn J.	Symphony Bth. No 10 in D maj: "The Chase" "D"	Dec 20. 1902 Feb 28. 1903
Huber, Hans	Symphony No 2. op 115	Oct 25. 1902
Liszt, Fr.	"Dante Symphony" with Orchestra and Chorus Symphonic Poem "Parso" "March of the Three Holy Kings" from "Christus" Concerto No 1 in E flat Piano + orch Mr Mark Hambourg	May 2. 1903 Dec 6. 1902 " 20 " Jan 24. 1903
Litolff	Ouv. "King Lear" for orch	Apr 11. 1903
Loeffler C.M.	"Two Poems" for orch:	Jan 3. 1903
Mackenzie & C.	Suite for Violin + Orch. op 42 "Pibroch" T. Adamowski	Jan 31. 1903
Martini	"Plaisir d'Amour" with piano Mr Chas. Gilibert	Apr 4. 1903
Marsé	"L'Oiseau s'en vole la bas" Mr Chas. Gilibert	Apr 4. 1903
Massenet	"Pensée d'Automne" Mr Chas. Gilibert "Les Larmes" with Piano Miss Ada Crossley	Apr 4. 1903 Apr 26. 1903
Mendelssohn	Symphony "Italian" op 9 Ouv. "Holy Bless" op 95	Nov 22. 1903 Apr 25. + 4

Mozart	Symphony in C maj. with Fugue finale " D maj. K. 504 Aria " Il mio tesoro with orch. Mr Ben. Davies	Jan 24. 1903 Mch 28 " Apr 11 "
Parker, Horatio	Concerto for Organ & Orch. op 55 Horatio Parker	Dec 27. 1902
Raff J.	Symp. No. 5 "Leonore" op 117	Apr 18. 1903
Reinhold, Hugo	"Prelude, Minuet & Fugue" for strings op 16	Apr 4. 1903
Rimsky-Korsakoff	Ouv. "The Betrothed of the Czar"	Nov 15. 1902
Rossini	Ouv. to William Tell	Apr 26. 1903
Rubinstein, A.	Symphony No 2. "Ocean" op 42 Concerto No. 2 op 96 Cello & orch Miss Elsa Ruegger	Jan 3. 1903 Oct 25. 1902
Saint-Saens E.	Symphonic Poem "Onphalo" op 30 " " "Dance Macabre" Septet in E flat op 65 Piano - Miss Gzumowka Concerto op 33. Cello & orch Mr Alwin Schroeder Concerto No 2 for Piano & orch. Miss Gzumowka	Oct 26. 1902 Apr 26. 1903 Mch 1. 1903 Jan 10. 1903 Mch 28. 1903
Schubert F.	Symphony in C No. 9 Ouv. in E minor Fantasia in F min: for 4 vocal parts & orch op 103 " C maj. Piano & orch op 15 Raoul Pugno	Mch 3. 1903 Feb 28. " Nov 29. 1902 Oct 18 "
Schumann R.	Symphony No 2. op 61 " " 3 " 97 " Overture, Scherzo & Finale" op 52 " to Genereva" op 81	Nov 29. 1902 Feb 7. 1903 Apr 4. " Jan 10 "

Schumann R.	Concerto in A min op 54 Piano & orch " Mine Fanny Bloomfield-Leisler	Feb 14. 1903
Smetana	Symp. Poem "Richard the Third"	Apr 25. 1903
Strauss, Joh	Waltz "Wine, Women & Song" for orch.	Apr 26. 1903
Schumann G.	Ouv. "Dawn of Love" op 28	Mch 14. 1903
Strauss, Rich:	Tone Poem "Don Juan" " " "Death & Transfiguration" Burleske in D min: Piano & orch Mr Heinrich Gebhard Song "Allerseelen" with Piano Miss Ada Crossley	Nov 1. 1902 Feb 7. 1903 Apr 18. " Apr 26. 1903
Suk, Joseph	Suite op 16. "A Fairy Tale"	Nov 29. 02
Svendsen	"Carnival at Paris" op 9. for orch.	Mch 29. 1902
Tanneier	Ouv: "The Orestia" op 6	Feb 14. 1903
Thomas A. G.	Aria "O vision entrancing" with orch Ben Davies	Apr 11. 1903
Tschikowsky	Symphony No 5. op 64 Emin " " 6 " 74 "Pathetique" Suite No 3 in G maj. op 55 Ouv. Fantasia "Romeo & Juliet" " " 1812" op 49 Concerto No 1 op 23 Piano & orch. Harold Randolph	Oct 18. 1902 Mch 1. 1903 Jan 31. " Mch 14 " May 2 " Dec 20. 1902
Wagner R.	"Kaiser march" for orch: Intro. & Love Death "Tristan" "A Siegfried Idyl" Excerpts from "Siegfried" & "Götterdämmerung" A Faust overture "Wotan's Farewell & Fire Chorus" Walkyrie Anton van Rooy	Nov 1. 1902 Jan 3. 1903 Feb 14. " Mch 1 " " 7 " Nov 22. 1902

Weberlin

"Mennet d'Exaudet" with Piano
 "Jeunes Filles"
 Mr Chas. Gilibut

Apr 4. 1903

Widor C.M.

Choral & Var. for Harp & Orch. op 74
 Mr Heinrich Schuecker

Feb 28. 1903

Weingartner J.

Symph. Poem "The Elysian Fields" op 21

Mch 7. 1903

Weber C.M. &amp; M.

Overture to "Oberon"

May 2. 1903

Wieniawski

Fantasia on Faust for Violin & Orch.
 Adolf Bak

Apr 25. 1903

Willeby C.

"Four leaf clover" with Piano
 Miss Ada Crossley

Apr 26. 1903

Withinsky

Symphony in D min.

Apr 4. 1903

Soloists

Piano

Bloomfield-Zeisel, Fanny
 Gebhard, Heinrich
 Hamburg, Mark
 Lamond, Frederic
 Pugno, Raoul
 Randolph, Harold Tzumowski, Mad.
 " " "

Feb 14. 1903

Apr 18 " "

Jan 24 " "

Nov 1. 1902

Oct 18 " "

Dec 20 " "

Mch 1. 1903

" 28 " "

Violinists

Adamowski J.
 Bak, Adolf
 Heermann, Hugo
 Kneisel, Franz
 MacCarthy, Miss Mand

Jan 31. 1903

Apr 26. " "

Feb 28 " "

Dec 6. 1902

Nov 15. " "

Violoncello

Ruegger, Miss Elsa
 Schroeder, Alwin

Oct 25. 1902

Mch 28. 1903

Harp

Schuecker, Heinrich

Feb 28. 1903

Organ

Goodrich, Wallace
 Parker, Horatio

Apr 11 + 26 1903

Dec 27. 1902

Vocalists

Crosley, Miss Ada
 Davies, Ben
 Gilibut, Charles
 Lunn, Miss Kirkby
 Rooy, Anton van

Apr 26. 1903

Apr 11 " "

" 4 " "

Jan 3 " "

Nov 22 1902

a Female Chorus for the last Concert

Conductor

Wilhelm Gericke

Jan. 3 10	Dec. 27 9	Dec. 20 8	Dec. 6 7	Nov. 29 6	Nov. 22 5	Nov. 15 4	Nov. 1 3	Oct. 25 2	Oct. 18 1
--------------	--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------	--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------	--------------

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON
HUNTINGTON &
MASSACHUSETTS AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONDUCTOR -
MR. WILHELM GERICKE

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-SECOND SEASON, 1902-1903

Feb. 7 14	Jan. 31 13	Jan. 24 12	Jan. 10 11
--------------	---------------	---------------	---------------

15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
Feb. 14	Feb. 28	Mar. 7	Mar. 14	Mar. 28	Apr. 4	Apr. 11	Apr. 18	Apr. 25	May 2

RIGHT

A

6

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME

Allen et. Brown

ADDRESS

P.O. Box 1802
Boston, Mass

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the twenty-second time, the musical public of Boston and vicinity are expectantly awaiting the announcement of the soloists to appear during the coming season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The true enthusiast finds ample satisfaction in the orchestra itself which, notably in an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is simply an assembly of soloists merging their individualities into one complete composite. But so many patrons enjoy the added feature of a solo performer, the management provides as strong and attractive a list as can be secured, and this season it is quite in keeping both with the orchestra and the record of past seasons.

The simple announcement of Madame Melba as easily the first in importance is all-sufficient, with the added assurance that it will be her only appearance in Boston in concert. Madame Schumann-Heink is, like Madame Melba, too well-known and too great a favorite to need extended exploiting. A new comer is Madame Kirkby Lunn, the English contralto, fresh from a season's triumph at the famous Royal Opera, Covent Garden, London. Of her remarkable success there the London Times says: "The phenomenal voice with which Mme. Kirkby Lunn is gifted is truly a marvel, showing, as it does, a quality, volume, and range that encompasses the profundity of Wagner's Ortrud with the same apparent ease and graceful indifference that justifies her in undertaking, and with such a large measure of success, the leading prima donna role in Bizet's 'Carmen.'" The Telegraph refers to her as having "long been the bright particular star of a large section of London concert-goers, who view her final 'arrival' with unmixed sympathy."

For instrumentalists, the return of Madame Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, after an absence of three years, will be most heartily welcomed by all in recollection of her splendid virtuosity as a pianist. Another new comer is Miss Maud MacCarthy, the youthful Irish violinist. That her artistic career abroad has been most brilliant is evidenced by the following excerpts from the English press. The London Times says: "Miss Maud MacCarthy's place among the first violinists of the day is being rapidly established, and the time cannot now be long before she is universally recognized as one of the greatest and most thoroughly artistic players before the public." While "Black and White" adds the following: "Miss Maud MacCarthy can with more truth be described as an artist than nine-tenths of the musicians who are dignified by that title. At her concert on the 3d instant she played two important works—a sonata in C minor by Beethoven and Brahms' sonata in A major. Both were distinguished by intense artistic feeling, thoroughly controlled, and, as regards technique, the greatest facility."

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian violoncellist who three years since made her

Boston debut with the orchestra, has since that time, although now but twenty years of age, won added reputation and a position among the greatest virtuosi of the age. She has had the honor of twice playing before the emperor and empress of Germany since her appearance here. First among the men soloists is the basso, Mr. Anton von Rooy, whose magnificent work as a leading exponent of Wagner's operatic school while a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company will long be remembered. He stands quite unsurpassed and unique among his associates. Another most charming singer, always welcome and absolutely sure to satisfy, is Mr. Ben Davies.

Mr. Raoul Pugno makes his Boston debut in this series of concerts as the soloist of the first performance. Of an Italian father and a Lorraine mother, born at Montrouge, France, rightly claims the honor of being his country. His artistic triumphs in Berlin, Vienna, Paris and London, were of the most sensational kind, and to reproduce his press notices would require a book of considerable dimensions. He is not only an artist and virtuoso, but he is a composer and authority on musical matters. He is honorary professor of the Paris Conservatoire of Music, the only one who can claim such distinction. The Government of the French republic decorated him with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, and similar honors were conferred on him by the courts of Italy, Spain, Holland and Turkey.

A new comer is Mr. Frederic Lamond, a native of Glasgow, and in this connection it is of interest to note the extent and variety of countries from which the soloists are drawn. Australia, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Germany, France, Belgium, Poland and the United States, all send their representatives to the musical Mecca of America. A pupil of both Liszt and Von Bülow, Mr. Lamond by his score of successes at home and on the Continent has only this country to conquer to complement his career.

Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the famous Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore, who has already earned a place among leading pianists by his success with the orchestra elsewhere, will be heard early in the season. The deserved popularity of Messrs. Kniesel, Schroeder and Adamowski with Boston Symphony patrons is the best possible reason for strengthening an already imposing list by the addition of their names.

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 29 and 30, and for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2 and 3. All sales begin at 10 A. M. and continue through the day.

Sept. 1902

Boston Symphony Orchestra

If one wished to condense a description of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into a single expression, perhaps the most apt to be found would be the word "unique." This organization is unique in its founder who, asking no governmental subsidy after the manner of foreign musical institutions, has had for twenty-one years the courage of his conviction that the public wanted and would support an orchestra presenting good music in the best way. It is unique in its absolute adherence to careful and repeated rehearsals with which no other engagements must in any way interfere, and in sparing no expense to secure the best performers in the world. It stands absolutely alone in the total number of concerts given, for early in the coming season the 2000th mark will be passed, indisputable proof that in instrumental work the Boston Symphony Orchestra is making the musical history of America. Considering its years, it has the record for the least number of changes in its personnel, and can justly claim an unsurpassed esprit de corps.

Its present abiding place, the new and beautiful Symphony Hall, was erected especially for it, a voluntary tribute from hundreds of its staunchest friends at home. Engagements outside the field of distinctly concert work are frequently and steadily declined, in adherence to its creed, which is "A permanent orchestra maintained solely for concert purposes." Its field of usefulness covers ten cities outside of Boston, including a series of ten concerts at Harvard University, and there is a consistent and justifiable pride in the generous and unswerving loyalty of its clientele in each and every city visited.

In its ranks can be found a variety of admirable smaller organizations, notably two string quartets of highest standing, an absolutely unique organization of wind instruments, soloists with standard reputations, and composers whose works have been accorded highest honors, both at home and abroad.

When en route, the most careful attention is paid to its comfort and convenience. Long exhausting journeys and night rides are avoided, and ignoring all commercial advantages, only one performance a day is the inviolable rule. Whenever extraordinary orchestration of a work calls for novel and rarely used instruments, special musicians are always engaged, thus avoiding the too-prevalent doubling of performers, which weakens the department from which this special player is temporarily borrowed. And so one could go on at great length, recounting the features peculiar to this organization which justify its claim to the word "unique."

The twenty-second season, and the third in the new hall, opens on Oct. 18, 1902, and closes on May 2, 1903. There will be the usual twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. Five trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore will be made in the weeks of Nov. 3-8, Dec. 8-13, Jan. 12-17, Feb. 16-21 and March 16-21, and during these weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will begin his tenth year as conductor, five seasons representing his first régime from 1884 to 1889. No more favorable comment can be offered than this decade of devotion to high ideals, with the inevitable resultant of a satisfied public.

Patrons of the concerts by this organization will read with interest the announcement of the auction sales of season tickets, which will be held in Symphony Hall. The sale of tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 29 and 30, and for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2 and 3. All these sales will begin at 10 A. M. and continue throughout the day, as usual. Admission to the second balcony at twenty-five cents each for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals only will be under the same rule which proved so practical and satisfactory last year. The Huntington avenue entrance will be opened at one o'clock precisely before the performance on each Friday afternoon, and exactly 505 people, which is the capacity of the second balcony, will be admitted. Another rule which has proved a marked success, that of allowing no standees whatever in the hall, will again be enforced.

In due season further details as to soloists, the works to be performed, with a list of novelties, and other interesting information will be published. The usual indications to be relied upon at this early date promise the same complete sale of every seat in the house which has obtained for the past two years.

Can we have coal and symphony concert seats, too, this winter? That's the two-horned dilemma present in the minds of many heads of families just now, and they have not much time to turn the question over and to discover what their neighbors are going to do before making a decision, as during next week the four regulation sales take place, after which there's little opportunity to secure them first hand. One best seat for the entire season, shorn of premiums, costs just a bit less than a ton of coal at today's prices; two seats cost almost as much as two tons, reason some proprietors of families while others construct the "example" converse, but all arrive at the same conclusion, namely, that whereas faith is yet strong and firm in a coming circumvention of the schemes which withhold our coal and that whereas symphony concerts are among the necessities of a life in Boston, tickets for them must be bought. So when the auctioneer spreads his canvas on the stage at Symphony Hall next Monday morning and waves his own peculiar baton the response will be as prompt and fulsome as it ever has been.

$305

Premium Paid on Symphony Seat.

Spirited Bidding by the Agents.

The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction at Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 a.m. today, and the average premiums were fully up to the best prices of last year.

A premium of $305 was the record for the day.

The same familiar faces of society leaders and the squad of ticket speculators were early in evidence, and as the morning progressed the number of ladies increased.

In A row, the highest premium was $26.50 for three seats in the middle, and the lowest was $11.50 for seats at the side.

C. S. Saunders took four good ones at a premium of $15.

The lowest premium for seats in B was $12.50.

For seat 18, the same speculator who bought the highest price seats in A paid $34.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner arrived at about 11 a.m., and, after sitting downstairs a few moments, proceeded to her favorite eyrie in the first balcony to view what was going on.

She stayed but a few moments, however, and drove away in her coupe alone.

In E the premiums jumped above $50.

Seats 14, 15, 16, and 19 went at $50.50 to a ticket broker. Mr. Anderson of the Metropolitan Coal Co. got four seats in F cheap at $16.

In G a leap of $10 to $20 was easily taken, and 17 and 18 brought $73.

In H the lowest premium was $20, paid by a speculator, who got a bargain by taking the end seats and thus securing an option of three in the next row.

UP TO $200.

There was spirited bidding over 17 H. The price went by $5 leaps to $200. The contest was apparently between two agents, and the man who got it took the next two at the same price, and as one of the three was across the line he got the next four at $55.

The contest between the same two men was duplicated over seats 17 and 18 I, and the price was bid up to $305, the same agent securing it and taking the next two, as in the previous contest.

He also bought the next three at $69.

The record premium paid in any year is $330, which was paid several years ago for a seat in this same locality.

Last year's highest was $225.

It is rumored that the $305 seats were bought for Mrs. Gardner. S. L. Brackett, the artist, got two seats in the same row next to the $69 ones at only $50.

A PREMIUM OF $305

Highest Paid at Symphony Auction

Three Seats in Row I Bought by a Broker

Record Premiums for the Present Hall

Other Prices of the Morning Unusually Good

For the first time since the present Symphony Hall has been built, bidding at the auction sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals this morning reached the $300 mark. Three seats in row I, numbered 17, 18 and 19, on the centre aisle, were knocked down to Mr. Pratt, a ticket broker, for a $305 premium. Since the premium must be paid on each seat, plus the regular price of $12, these three seats cost their present owner $951. Who that owner is could not be discovered, but rumor had it (as it invariably does when the highest Symphony premium is paid) that the one behind the broker was Mrs. J. L. Gardner. Mr. Pratt paid also the next highest premium of the morning, $200, for the three corresponding seats in row H. The six seats, practically together, cost him no less than $1597. There were no other premiums in the morning that approached even this lower figure, which, indeed, is only $25 less than the high-water mark of last year. The record of the year before was $280, brought at the first sale in the new hall, largely for the honor of purchasing the first seat. Today's record, in fact, comes within $75 of the highest paid in the whole history of Boston Symphony concerts.

Mr. Pratt's bid on the seats in row H was the first exciting incident of a sale that had progressed in a rapid, business-like manner for more than two hours, with good premiums that promised a satisfactory return in the long run. The highest up to that time had been $59.50, for three seats on the left-hand aisle of row G. Three seats in row H had just been knocked down for $37, when the auctioneer called out number 17. The bidding was started at $40 by a gentleman in the middle of the hall, and was at once taken up by Mr. Pratt from his station with the other brokers at the left near the platform. Both were eager bidders, and knew their minds. The auctioneer sent the figure up by ten-dollar jumps as quickly as he could move his wand and catch the nods of the contestants. The price reached $200 before people had caught their breath, and there the gentlemen in the middle of the hall balked, for it seemed very evident that

Mr. Pratt was bound to purchase at any price. Of the three seats which he took, two were on one side of the aisle and one was on the other. This blocked off excessive bidding on the seats immediately succeeding, all four of which Mr. Pratt took quietly for the normal premium of $55.

The premiums fell down for the rest of the row from $53 to $20 at the end, and people thought they had seen the highest bidding of the morning. Row I, starting out at $20, worked up gradually to an even $50 for numbers 13, 14, 15 and 16. This left 17 the next seat—a situation exactly like that in the preceding row—and out of a confusion of bids at first the same two bidders emerged for the same contest. Only this time they did not stop at $200; the figures went rapidly upwards until finally $300 was offered by the gentleman in the middle of the hall. Mr. Pratt nodded to the auctioneer's "$305" with decision, and his opponent for a second time gave in. By naming his former choice of three seats, Mr. Pratt easily obtained the succeeding three at $69.

In the next row seat 17 had been reserved by the management of the concerts, but 18 and 19—the other two of the combination—brought $95. In row G (immediately in front of the seats which brought $200) numbers 17 and 18 were sold for $73, and 19 and 20 for $68. In row K the numbers 17, 18 and 19 went for $77; but in row L Mr. Pratt had no difficulty in taking in the aisle seats 17 and 18 for $39.

The other premiums varied from $20 to $50 and a little more, the majority of the larger premiums being paid by the brokers. Mr. Herrick also bought numbers of seats with smaller premiums; the greater part of those at the ends of each row, in fact, were purchased by him. He would often bid in the final seat of a row and then take with it (at the same premium) the first three of the next row back. He would usually follow this up by bidding in the next four or six. For most of these he paid premiums varying from $20 to $25. Mr. Connelly was the first man to bid above $50, going 50 cents over that figure for four seats in row E.

The lowest price paid during the morning was for the first seat sold, number 1 in row A—the same seat which two years ago brought $280, and last year went for $20. The highest in this row (which is not, of course, among the most desirable) was $26.50, for number 14. Thirty-four dollars was the highest price in row B, and $33.50 in row C. In this row General W. W. Blackmar purchased four seats in the centre at a premium of $27.

The auction was stopped for an intermission at half-past one, and the sale was taken up again at two o'clock. It was planned to continue until all the $12 seats (the majority in the hall) had been sold. The sale for the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will begin tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, and the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday at the same time, the $12 seats first.

SYMPHONY SEATS AT $305.

Mrs. Jack Gardner the Reputed Purchaser of Three.

Last Season's Prices for the $12 Rehearsal Seats Generally Exceeded—The Average Premiums Yesterday Ranged from $17 up—The $7.50 Seats Go on Sale Today.

The sale of seats for the coming Symphony concerts was opened in Symphony Hall yesterday morning, and it brought out the usual interested gathering of bidders and spectators.

The day's sale was confined to the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals are to be sold today, the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday.

The prices paid averaged very well, while in one instance at least the record price of last year, $225, was put away in the background by a bid of $305 for seats 17, 18 and 19 or row I. The seats were purchased by Mr. Pratt, who was one of the heaviest bidders during the morning, and it was rumored, though positive admission was refused, that the seats were bought for Mrs. "Jack" Gardner. The seats which went at that high figure flank the centre aisle and are in the locality for which Mrs. Gardner has shown a decided preference in the past.

The prices at the opening for seats in row A were somewhat above those paid last year. For three seats in the centre a premium of $26.50 each was paid, while the lowest premium paid for any seat in the row was $11.50.

Seat 18 in row B was purchased by the same speculator who had purchased the highest-priced seats in row A. The price for the seat was $34. The cheapest seat sold in the row brought a premium of $12.50.

In row E seats 14, 15, 16 and 19 brought $50.50, and from then on the price steadily advanced. Seat 20 in row E dropped off a little to $47.50; the next three seats went back to $50, and then, when row G was reached, the price went up to $73 for seats 17 and 18 and $68 for seats 19 and 20.

Row H brought out the first really stiff contest. The price for seats 1 and 2 was $24, but when the centre aisle was approached the price went up, and when Auctioneer Jackson announced seat 17, the second from the end, and started the figure at $50, the price in no time went up with a jump to over $100. Mr. Pratt was after the seat, and finally secured it by paying a premium of $200. He took seats 18 and 19 on both sides of the aisle at the same figure. The next four seats in the same row sold for $55.

Then followed Mr. Pratt's contest for the seats for which he paid $305, after which the price dropped back to $69 for seats 20, 21 and 22, while seats 25, 26, 27 and 28 dropped down to $57.

In row J the centre aisle seats, 18 and 19, brought $95, while in row K the same seats went for $76. Seats 20 and 21 were sold for $59, while seats 22, 23, 24 and 25 dropped down to $44. K 28 went at an advance, the price being $65, and then came a drop back to $31 for seats 3, 4 and 5 in row L. Seats 8 and 9 brought $65. Rows M, N and O were sold before recess was announced.

In the afternoon the prices dropped considerably, no high price being reached until row T was reached, when seats 17 and 18 went for $62.50 each to a speculator. Other high prices in this row were $46.50, $43.50 and $40.50, the average running about $33.

No high-water figures were struck in row U, $58 and $51 being the greatest, with several seats at $46 and $41. When row V was begun the sales went about $32 until seats 17 and 18 were reached, when the price jumped to $56. On the other aisles two seats sold for $42 and $48.

In row W there was a decided falling off, seat 8 selling for $39, while the average went down to about $25. This was equally true of row X, when the high seat was only $30. In row Y a little boom was started, and two seats went up to $34 and one to $33.50. In row Z, two seats brought $36, two $35, three $34 and one $33.50. The lowest seat in this row brought $18.

There was not much of a boom in row AA, the prices averaging about $25, but in row BB several seats went over $30, one bringing $37. In row CC one seat sold for $33, while the rest went from $19 to $27. The same rule applied to row DD, when one seat was run up to $33.50, while the lowest went for $17. In row EE, one sold for $33 and the rest much lower, and the average price for the rest of the $12 seats averaged about $25.

MORE SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD

Remaining Rehearsal Tickets (Those Worth $7.50) Auctioned Off This Morning—Premiums Ranged from $22.50 to $5.50, and Speculators Made Few Purchases

By a little after noon today in Symphony Hall, the last seat for the Friday rehearsals of the Boston Symphony concerts had been sold, terminating a sale which must be extremely gratifying to the managers of the orchestra. This morning the $7.50 seats were sold by auction, all the $12 seats (including the major portion of the hall) having been disposed of yesterday. Manager E. R. Comee, when asked this morning about the results of the sale, said that they were entirely satisfactory—almost the same as last year. "A little better in spots," he added as a kind of afterthought; and that these spots must have covered considerable seating space was vouched for by one of the smaller ticket brokers, who sat through the whole of yesterday's auction, from ten in the morning until seven at night, without being able to buy a single seat as low as he could afford to pay. "I've tended out on these sales for years," he said, "and never been whitewashed like that before. I never saw such prices—never a ripple in them, but just steady and heavy all the time."

The high prices of yesterday were not of course expected today, but the morning's results undoubtedly continued the record established then, and helped foot up a total somewhat greater than that of last year. It was not, like yesterday, an auction where brokers were in on almost every other sale. It was a sale to the music-lovers themselves. Those who sit in the $7.50 seats at the Symphony concerts are apt to do their own bidding, and save the commission of an agent. Bidding was very different from what it was yesterday, coming this morning from all over the hall, and mostly in women's voices, instead of largely from the broker's little corner at the left. It was less exciting, perhaps, but more amusing, for every now and then an excited little lady would raise her own bid, and the auctioneer, after a glance of half-pitying reproach, would say: "It was your bid before, madam," and continue with his rattle of figures again. Seats were sold, too, less in blocks of three or four, and more by pairs or singly.

Premiums, naturally, did not soar high; nobody who bought could be reckoned as paying any more than the most captious critic could say was his share. Even the highest bid of the morning—$22.50 for a seat in the centre of row KK—meant only a price of about $1.25 per concert; and the average price per concert was much lower than this—well under a dollar, indeed. Twelve buyers, who will occupy the last seats on the floor, paid premiums of only $5.50 on each seat—or $13 for twenty-four symphony concerts—about fifty cents a performance. The highest prices of the morning were in row KK, the first of the $7.50 seats on the floor. Row JJ, in front of it, sold yesterday for premiums varying from $12 to $15, but nothing in KK today went lower than $16; and $17.50 and $18 were by far the commonest premiums. One seat sold for $22.50, another for $21.50, and another for $20—and these were the only three of the day which rose beyond the 'teens. Seat 15 was bid up on one of the brokers by a young man, who dropped out of the running at $20, but he was paid back by the same broker on the next seat, by having it unloaded on him at $19.50. Prices in the next row (LL) dropped a dollar on the average, and in the next (MM), perhaps a little more than a dollar. The next row (NN) held almost the same as MM, but a considerable drop was noticed when OO was reached. Here the almost universal price was $13. In PP most of the seats sold for $12.50. In the next row, however, because of the posts in row PP, the prices were more variable. Some seats behind the posts dropped below $10 premium; two, indeed, going for $8, but the average was an even $10. In RR $7 was the early figure, but it dropped to $6, and at last to $5.50. The entire back row of twelve seats went for this latter gradually figure.

Prices went up again, of course, when the balcony was reached. Five rows only were sold here, and these went for prices varying from $19.50 to one lone seat, taken at the very end of the sale, for $9.50. Some of the balcony seats last night went for as high as sixty and seventy dollars pre-mum, and the majority for about twenty-five dollars. The last row before the $7.50 seats sold at about $15 or $18—and this morning row E, just behind it, brought very little more, though the par value was nearly one-half as great. Two seats in this desirable row went for $15, but the great majority varied from $19 to $19.50. In row F the premium dropped about two dollars; in G about one dollar; in H another dollar, and in I $10 was the favorite premium.

The vening concert seats will be sold by auction in Symphony Hall on Thursday and Friday, under the same conditions as the rehearsal seats.

LOWER SYMPHONY PREMIUMS

From: Oct 2, 1902
Highest of the Morning at the Auction Sale of Tickets for the Saturday Evening Concerts Was $34—One Man Got His Seats at a Dollar Premium

If the seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sold by auction on Monday, went for higher figures than usual, the increase was somewhat neutralized this morning, when the seats for the regular Saturday evening concerts went for comparatively low prices. By this sign it may be seen that the popularity of the rehearsals, which has been growing for several years, has not yet reached its height. It is a curious fact to note that not long ago the situation was reversed; the high premiums were given for evening tickets, and not for afternoon. This morning the highest bid was $34, for seats 18 and 19 in row K. These seats (though two rows farther back) correspond with those which went for the record premium of $305 on Monday. The identical seats which brought that remarkable figure for the rehearsal (17, 18 and 19 in row I), were sold for the concert at a premium of $20.50; and those just in front, which brought $200 on Monday, brought only $29 today.

The sale opened shortly after ten o'clock under exactly the same conditions as on Monday, with all the $12 seats (the greater part of the floor and first balcony, under the hammer. The first seat, No. 1 in row A, which brought $11.50 Monday, and marked the lowest price of the sale, went for $6 today—a sum which turned out to be a fair average price for anywhere in the first few rows. The next seat sold for fifty cents less, and though one in the row went up to $7, those at the other end went for as low as $3. Two seats on the left-hand aisle were sold for $6 to an old man hardly able to totter along, who was obliged to put his hand to his ear to hear what the auctioneer said. It was obvious for what reason he chose row A. The next row, starting out at $3, went down to $2.50, strangely enough, when the aisle was reached, and nearer the centre when a man bid $1 the auctioneer could not get anybody to raise him. Amid a ripple of laughter he called for four seats (the limit allowed) and fairly ran to the desk to pay out his money. It was the lowest premium of the entire sale, including those on Monday and Tuesday. Even the $7.50 seats in the extreme rear of the floor (the cheapest sold for the rehearsals) brought $5.50 at the Tuesday sale, and this lone figure may be laid to the strange chance which sometimes rules at an auction. The four seats thus bought have cost their purchaser just thirteen dollars each—exactly the same as the lowest $7.50 seat. This makes, as was pointed out at the time the others were sold, a rate of only fifty cents per concert for a season of twenty-four concerts—a price anybody might think himself lucky to pay.

In these two rows the ticket brokers had not made a bid, but in row C they began, Mr. Herrick taking four at a $5 premium. From that time on they picked up a few here and there until by the time M was reached they were buying in almost whole rows, and the familiar names of Herrick, Connelly and Pratt were heard after many of the sales. In row B one bid had reached $10, but in row C the prices varied from $3 to $9. The highest was $9.50, and the ten-dollar mark was not passed again until the middle of row D, when two seats (and off the aisle at that) brought $16. The average for this row was between five and six dollars. For the next row—E—the average jumped to nearer ten dollars, and held there through row F. Herrick bought one seat in this row on the centre aisle for $22, probably having orders from some customer to buy it in at any cost. In row G prices had improved. The very lowest paid (and this for only two seats) was $6, and several went for $19, $19.50 and $20. The brokers bought several in this row, and kept increasing in their bids from then on. In H, the premiums varied from $8 to $29. In I, the prices held at the satisfactory average of about $15. In J, the thirty dollar-mark was first passed. The favorite seats (those just off the centre aisle) sold for $32 on one side and $32.50 on the other. Those following went for $23. With the exception of the one premium of $34 in row K, prices held steadily for the next few rows.

By half-past twelve Row O had been sold out, whereas on Monday at that time the auctioneer was in the middle of Row L. This shows the relative popularity of two performances. The highest premium during that time had just touched and beyond lowest premiums of the Monday sale. Though it is hard to judge of general result, it may be safely estimated that during the early morning at least returns were somewhat less than for year. The highest premiums brought $41, for several seats in Row L, as against this year's $34.

At half-past one o'clock a recess of an hour was declared. Tomorrow the seats for the evening performances will be sold.

SYMPHONY TICKETS IN DEMAND.

The auction sale of tickets for the Symphony concerts was resumed yesterday at Symphony Hall, which was fairly well filled with would-be purchasers, the greater number being women. The tickets on sale were those for the Saturday evening concerts, on the floor, beginning with KK, and in the second balcony. Those on the floor averaged $8 premium, although a few seats went a trifle higher. When the second balcony seats were called the first set of three in the first row were sold at $17.50 premium. The first row averaged $12.50, while two seats in the first row, Nos. 9 and 10, centre, were sold after some lively bidding for $20, the highest premium paid. The other seats opposite the stage went for $5.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Small Attendance of Ticket Buyers Yesterday Morning—Prices Ran Oct. 1, 1902 Very Evenly.

The auction sale of seats for the coming concerts of the Symphony orchestra was continued at Symphony Hall yesterday. There was a very small attendance of ticket buyers, and those who were there were mostly speculators, or those who had orders to fill for their customers.

Yesterday's sale comprised the $7.50 seats for the Friday public rehearsals, beginning with row KK in the orchestra, and the last five rows in the first balcony. The prices ran very evenly, and only occasionally did some fortunate bidder get a choice seat for a little less than the previous bidder. The largest premium was $22.50, for a set of seats in KK, while the highest premium offered in the balcony was $17. The result of the sale was about the same as that of last year.

Symphony Tickets FOR SALE
$20.00 upwards. MISS GORING, Room 30, Music Hall Building. WFSM[A] 01

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL (Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues) THIS (Thursday) MORNING, at 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 3 [A]

Symphony Tickets CONNELLY'S, ADAMS HOUSE

SYMPHONY ORDERS FULFILLED
JOHN R. HEARD, Hotel Touraine
Write for Diagrams of Symphony Hall.
10t[A] 22

Symphony Season Tickets for sale in all parts of the hall, 40 State Street, Room 53. 2t[A] 02

LOWER SYMPHONY PREMIUMS

From: Oct 2, 1902
Highest of the Morning at the Auction Sale of Tickets for the Saturday Evening Concerts Was $34—One Man Got His Seats at a Dollar Premium

If the seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sold by auction on Monday, went for higher figures than usual, the increase was somewhat neutralized this morning, when the seats for the regular Saturday evening concerts went for comparatively low prices. By this sign it may be seen that the popularity of the rehearsals, which has been growing for several years, has not yet reached its height. It is a curious fact to note that not long ago the situation was reversed; the high premiums were given for evening tickets, and not for afternoon. This morning the highest bid was $34, for seats 18 and 19 in row K. These seats (though two rows farther back) correspond with those which went for the record premium of $305 on Monday. The identical seats which brought that remarkable figure for the rehearsal (17, 18 and 19 in row I), were sold for the concert at a premium of $20.50; and those just in front, which brought $200 on Monday, brought only $29 today.

The sale opened shortly after ten o'clock under exactly the same conditions as on Monday, with all the $12 seats (the greater part of the floor and first balcony, under the hammer. The first seat, No. 1 in row A, which brought $11.50 Monday, and marked the lowest price of the sale, went for $6 today—a sum which turned out to be a fair average price for anywhere in the first few rows. The next seat sold for fifty cents less, and though one in the row went up to $7, those at the other end went for as low as $3. Two seats on the left-hand aisle were sold for $6 to an old man hardly able to totter along, who was obliged to put his hand to his ear to hear what the auctioneer said. It was obvious for what reason he chose row A. The next row, starting out at $3, went down to $2.50, strangely enough, when the aisle was reached, and nearer the centre when a man bid $1 the auctioneer could not get anybody to raise him. Amid a ripple of laughter he called for four seats (the limit allowed) and fairly ran to the desk to pay out his money. It was the lowest premium of the entire sale, including those on Monday and Tuesday. Even the $7.50 seats in the extreme rear of the floor (the cheapest sold for the rehearsals) brought $5.50 at the Tuesday sale, and this lone figure may be laid to the strange chance which sometimes rules at an auction. The four seats thus bought have cost their purchaser just thirteen dollars each—exactly the same as the lowest $7.50 seat. This makes, as was pointed out at the time the others were sold, a rate of only fifty cents per concert for a season of twenty-four concerts—a price anybody might think himself lucky to pay.

In these two rows the ticket brokers had not made a bid, but in row C they began, Mr. Herrick taking four at a $5 premium. From that time on they picked up a few here and there until by the time M was reached they were buying in almost whole rows, and the familiar names of Herrick, Connelly and Pratt were heard after many of the sales. In row B one bid had reached $10, but in row C the prices varied from $3 to $9. The highest was $9.50, and the ten-dollar mark was not passed again until the middle of row D, when two seats (and off the aisle at that) brought $16. The average for this row was between five and six dollars. For the next row—E—the average jumped to nearer ten dollars, and held there through row F. Herrick bought one seat in this row on the centre aisle for $22, probably having orders from some customer to buy if in at any cost. In row G prices had improved. The very lowest paid (and this for only two seats) was $6, and several went for $19, $19.50 and $20. The brokers bought several in this row, and kept increasing in their bids from then on. In H, the premiums varied from $8 to $29. In I, the prices held at the satisfactory average of about $15. In J, the thirty dollar-mark was first raised. The favorite seats (those just off the centre aisle) sold for $32 on one side and $32.50 on the other. Those following went for $23. With the exception of the one high premium of $34 in row K, prices held steadily for the next few rows.

By half-past twelve Row O had been sold out, whereas on Monday at that time the auctioneer was in the middle of Row I. This shows the relative popularity of the two performances. The highest premiums during that time had just touched and gone beyond lowest premiums of the Monday sale. Though it is hard to judge of the general result, it may be safely estimated that during the early morning at least the returns were somewhat less than for last year. The highest premiums brought then $41, for several seats in Row L, as against this year's $34.

At half-past one o'clock a recess of half an hour was declared. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats for the evening performances will be sold.

END OF SYMPHONY SALE

The $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Concerts Were Sold by Auction This Morning—Premiums Averaged Well

By far the largest crowd at any of the four sales turned out at Symphony Hall this morning for the auction of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In consequence of this fact bidding was very lively and premiums averaged well, though it is doubtful if they much exceeded those of last year. The highest paid for the floor and first balcony seats during the first part of the morning was thirteen dollars, and the lowest five dollars, making a very fair mean. As at the Tuesday sale (when the corresponding seats for the Friday rehearsals were sold), the ticket brokers were not much in evidence; bidding came largely from the persons who expected to occupy the seats themselves. Premiums this morning were about half what they were on Tuesday for the same seats—a proportion which held true for the $12 seats sold yesterday.

On the floor seats (of which only the nine rear rows are sold at the cheaper price) premiums varied from eight to thirteen dollars for the first few rows, and from five to seven dollars for the last few rows. A man who has been watching the sales for some years said that the prices for these back rows ranged a full dollar above those paid last year, but his estimate is probably a little high. On the last four rows of the second balcony (among the best seats sold at the cheaper price) premiums reached as high as $12.50. For the first two of the four rows they did not fall below eight dollars. These seats sold on Tuesday for as high as $19.50.

The sale lasted much longer than the Tuesday sale because in addition to the rear seats on the floor and first balcony, the entire second balcony was sold. These seats on the Friday performance are the so-called "rush seats," though the present plan of distributing them has eliminated the rush.

COMMONWEALTH IN PORT

Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Was Aboard—Al Hon. Thomas L. James, Former Postmaster General of the United States

At half-past two o'clock this morning the steamship Commonwealth of the Dominion line, in command of Captain McAuley, was at Boston Light; at seven o'clock the good ship came along the wharf and at half-past seven the landing passengers began. Unusually good time was made, and the weather was propitious all the way with the exception of a little fog off the banks of Newfoundland.

There were 222 saloon passengers, 306 second cabin and 707 steerage, making a total of 1235. Yesterday afternoon at half-past two o'clock a matinée in the saloon was the great attraction. The chairman of the programme was none other than Hon. Thomas L. James, former postmaster general of the United States, and now president of the Lincoln National Bank of New York. The programme was excellent and afforded the Dyringska Quintette an opportunity of making their début before an American audience. The five attractive Swedish girls of the quintet made a great impression with their sweet voices. They have toured England and France and have given concerts in London and Paris. It is their intention to make a tour of the United States. Mr. James, who was accompanied by Mrs. James, Miss James and H. James, was one of the first to get through the custom house office and then hurried off to New York.

Another distinguished passenger was Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For five months he has been abroad, accompanied by Mrs. Gericke and his little daughter, Katie. He spent much time at his old home in Styria, and after a perfect rest in the Tyrol visited the great cities, Paris, Dresden, Berlin, London, etc. In Munich he was greatly interested in the Wagner productions. Both Mr. and Mrs. Gericke are looking in splendid health, and the long rest has done its most for them. Little Katie looks like a nut-brown fairy.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Twenty-one years ago there appeared in the Boston newspapers a very interesting communication, the first announcement of any kind in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there is a timeliness in now, at the near approach of the Symphony season, reprinting it. It read:

A WORD IN THE INTEREST OF GOOD MUSIC.

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

"To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual, inasmuch as it is independent of societies or clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organization. Indeed, the first step, as well as the natural impulse, in announcing a new musical project is to thank those who have brought us where we now stand. "Whatever may be done in the future, to the Handel and Haydn Society and to the Harvard Musical Association we all owe the greater part of our home education in music of a high character. Can we forget, either, how admirably their work has been supplemented by the tastes and critical judgment of Mr. John S. Dwight and by the artists who have identified themselves with the same cause in Boston? These have been our teachers. We build on the foundations they have laid.

"Such details of this scheme as concern the public are stated below. The orchestra is to number 60 selected musicians, their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, being engaged in advance. Mr. Georg Henschel will be the conductor for the coming season. The concerts will be 20 in number, given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings, from the middle of October to the middle of March. The intention is that the orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Both as the condition and the result of success, the sympathy of the public is asked.

"H. L. HIGGINSON."

From this beginning of 60 local musicians there has developed an organization of 94 performers, drawn from the principal musical centres of the world, with its field of usefulness extended to all the large Eastern cities. For the coming season there will be the usual 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts, with a most attractive list of soloists, including: Mme. Melba, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Kirkby Lunn, Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Elsa Ruegger, Mr. Anton von Rooy, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Raoul Pugno, Mr. Frederic Lamond, Mr. Harold Randolph, Mr. Hugo Heerman, Messrs. Kneisel, Adamowski, Schroeder and others.

The auction sales of season tickets began tomorrow at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, and continue on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.

The programs of the first four concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall are as follows:

Oct. 17-18: Beethoven's overture Leonore No. II.; Bach's suite in B minor for strings, flute and accompaniment; Tschalkowsky's Symphony No. 5. Mr. Raoul Pugno, pianist, will play the Wanderer Fantasy, Schubert-Liszt or Greig's concerto.

Oct. 24-25: Berlioz, overture "Carneval Romain"; Saint-Saëns's "Le Rouet d'Omphale"; Hans Huber's symphony in E minor (first time). Miss Elsa Ruegger, cellist, will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor.

Oct. 31, Nov. 1: Brahms's Symphony No. 3; Richard Strauss's "Don Juan"; Wagner's Kaisermarsch. Mr. Frederick Lamond, pianist, will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat.

Nov. 14-15: Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "La Fiancée du Tzar" (first time); Bizet's suite "L'Arlésienne" No. I.; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4. Miss Maud MacCarthy, violinist, will play Brahms's concerto.

SYMPHONY ORDERS FULFILLED
JOHN R. HEARD, Hotel Touraine
Write for Diagrams of Symphony Hall.
101[A]

ANACREON.

STATUES BEING PLACED IN SYMPHONY HALL.

Lofty Niches Filling up with Greek Gods and Other Notables.

ANACREON'S ASCENT

Heavy-Limbed Greek Poet Raised by Workmen with Much Difficulty.

The niches around the balcony walls of Symphony Hall are being filled with statues, and the speculation as to what the spaces were being reserved for is at an end. Society gossip and the chat in art and musical circles will go on, however, with a new topic; for the donors of the statuary have chosen to keep their names a secret, stating simply that they have provided this offering to the gods of music and the fine arts. Two ladies prominent in their love of those things that make for culture have solicited the funds for the statuary, and one of them, who lives on Beacon street, has been superintending the placing of the treasures in their little shrines. Further than this the identity of the patrons of the arts must remain a mystery, as they shun the notoriety that might otherwise accompany their efforts.

The 14 classic sculptures will soon be in place, and they will add very much to the decoration of Symphony Hall, giving the interior a completed appearance that it has lacked.

Three of the plaster casts will be much treasured by artists, as they will be the only copies in America, studies which have hitherto necessitated a trip to the originals in the European museums. Many of the subjects have direct significance to music, while others merely suggest allied arts. Some of the figures are from the Caproni galleries in Boston, while the rarer specimens have been imported by the brothers Caproni, directly from the museums where the originals are guarded. The figures are all of heroic size, about seven and a half feet tall, but being in lofty positions and with such spacious walls as backgrounds, they appear smaller. The mounting of the statues into the niches is being done by the Capronis, while the choice of subjects was the taste of the ladies who provide them, together with the judgment of the architect of the building, Charles Follen McKim, of New York.

The rare casts that are said to be the only ones in this country are those of Euripides, a female figure from Herakulaneum and the seated figure of Anacreon.

The accompanying diagram shows the location of the various subjects:

The collection will be in place probably before the end of the week. The hardest statue to place was swung up yesterday morning with much difficulty. This was the seated Anacreon, which, from its lateral bulk, was a problem of mechanics. A scaffold was built below the niche, which, with ladders, made a footstool for the old lyric Greek to ascend his throne. He was inaugurated with much difficulty, and with much danger to the workmen, owing to the extreme narrowness of the balcony, which is only the width of two rows of chairs, and which threatened a disastrous fall to the laborers should they have been shaken from the trembling staging to the distant floor below. The captive poet was festooned with ribbons of burlap, and was carried to the balcony, and then suffered the indignity of having ropes looped around his neck. Two workmen preceded him to his seat, while four others hoisted him on their shoulders, as if in token of his good fellowship. Then, with much pulling and hauling at his neckwear from above, with heaving all around at his ribbons, and with a one, two, three, and altogether, the old fellow landed on his imperial height.

The first statue to the right, as one looks from the stage, is the classic work of Praxiteles, that inspired Hawthorne's "Marble Faun." The original is in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. Of it Hawthorne says:

It is impossible to gaze long at this stone image without conceiving a kindly sentiment toward it, as if its substance were warm to the touch, and imbued with actual life. * * * The animal nature, indeed, is a most essential part of the Faun's composition; for the characteristics of the brute creation meet and combine with those of humanity in this strange yet true and natural conception of antique poetry and art. Praxiteles has subtly diffused throughout his work that mute mystery which so hopelessly perplexes us whenever we attempt to gain an intellectual or sympathetic knowledge of the lower orders of creation. * * * Neither man nor animal, and yet no monster; but a being in whom both races meet on friendly ground.

The next figure, the so-called Germanicus from the Louvre, has a more vital significance in the hall, as it shows a nude male figure listening to the music of the waves in a sea shell. The shell is inscribed, "Kleomenes, the son of Kleomenes, made this." It was probably the work of a Greek in Rome in the first century, B. C. The head is that of some Roman orator, while the body is said to be that of Hermes Logios, the god of speech and patron divinity of orators. The statue illustrates the custom of representing individuals in the form of divinities and with divine attributes.

The Amazon from the Capitoline Museum was found in a very mutilated condition, and much discussion has been rife as to its history. The restorations are much questioned, and the head is said to belong to a much older statue. Some say that the female warrior is drawing a bow above her head, others maintaining that she is about to vault. The statue is No. 97 in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and the arguments may be found in the catalogue.

The Lemnian Athena, said to be the work of Phidias, has given students much food for speculation. The original head is in Bologna, while the body is composed from two statues in Dresden. The best of the two bodies was chosen, to which was added the Bologna head, and the cast of all three is such as occupies the next niche in Symphony Hall. This is called the most beautiful statue of Athena which the world possesses. It shows her more peaceful side, as protectress of Athens. The style is severely simple, as we ought to expect of a religious work of the time of Phidias. The virginal face, conceived and wrought with ineffable refinement, is as far removed from sensual charm as from the ecstasy of a Madonna. The goddess does not reveal herself as one who can be "touched with a feeling of our infirmities," but by the power of her pure, passionless beauty she sways our minds and hearts. So says a critic.

FEMALE FIGURE FROM HERCULANEUM

The statue of Sophocles in the original was placed in the Lateran Museum, Rome, by Pope Gregory XVI. It was identified by means of several ancient busts bearing his name. He is shown in middle life, apparently reciting from one of his plays. "It is without question the noblest portrait statue which Greek art has left us," says Mr. Edward Robinson of the Museum of Fine Arts. "The head is strong, beautiful and intelligent, with the tendency toward idealization, which was characteristic of Greek portraiture in the best periods."

Beside this is the statue of Aeschines, found at Herculaneum and now at Naples. The figure of the great Athenian orator and rival of Demosthenes; is much like that of Sophocles, though inferior as a work of art.

The Apollo Belvidere and the Diana of Versailles are too well known to need comment. They occupy the back wall.

Apollo playing on the lyre, the adjacent figure, looks decidedly feminine, with his long, flowing chiton, which reaches to the feet. Augustus, after his victory at Actium, dedicated a temple to Apollo, to whom he gave the credit of the victory. This cast is from a supposed copy of the statue placed in the temple erected by Augustus on the Palatine.

Demosthenes, cast from the statue in the Vatican, is next along the wall and the Attic orator fulminates across the auditorium to Sophocles and Aeschines. The face shows tremendous earnestness, while its weariness and the conformation of the mouth and the slight, weak body correspond to the description given by Plutarch. The original statue is attributed to Polyzeus, or a copy after his work.

The Faun next represented is copied from a statue in the Borghese Palace, Rome.

The female figure next to this was recovered from Herculaneum, and is well known. The original is now at Dresden.

Euripides, the Athenian tragic poet, copied from a bust in the Vatican, occupies the neighboring niche.

Nearest the stage is the seat of Anacreon, the Greek lyric poet. The original was discovered in the 16th century at Monte Calvo, Sabina, and placed in the Villa Borghese, at Rome.

In addition to these statues, two more are expected from Naples. These will fill the niches at the far corners of the stage on either side of the Apollo Belvidere and the Diana of the Capitol. The subjects, if copies can be obtained, will be Pan and Apollo in a group, a Satyr carrying the infant Bacchus. The originals are in the Naples Museum.

EURIPIDES.

Symphony

Season Tickets for sale in all parts of the hall, 40 State Street, Room 53. 20(A) 02

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the first performances are announced for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 17 and 18. The rule prohibiting standees will again be in force. The plan of admission to the second balcony on Friday afternoons, put in operation last season, proved so satisfactory in every way that it will again be adopted. The Huntington Avenue entrance will be opened at 1 o'clock sharp on each Friday afternoon, and exactly 500 people, which is the capacity of the second balcony, will be admitted, thus insuring a seat for each person.

AY, OCTOBER 9, 190

TO BEAUTIFY SYMPHONY HALL

Group of Heroic Classic Statues, Copies of Originals Treasured in European Museums and Galleries, Secured for This City

While it has been known ever since the completion of Symphony Hall that the great niches along the side and rear walls, above the seats in the second balcony, eventually were to be filled with heroic statues, not till now has this expectation been met, except for the Apollo and one or two other statues which for some time have occupied positions in some of these niches. There are in all fourteen niches in which it is possible to place these statues, which are copies of originals carefully guarded in various European museums and galleries.

It will not be long before the completion of the group of statues in the hall here, which will be on the arrival here from Naples, Italy, of two figures which it is hoped to secure, copies of Pan and Apollo in a group, and a satyr carrying the infant Bacchus. The originals are in the Naples Museum.

One statue already secured is the classic work of Praxiteles, that inspired Hawthorne's "Marble Faun." The original is in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. Of it Hawthorne has written enthusiastically. Another figure, the so-called Germanicus from the Louvre, has a more vital significance in the hall, as it shows a nude male figure listening to the music of the waves in a sea shell. The shell is inscribed, "Kleomenes, the son of Kleomenes, made this." It was probably the work of a Greek in Rome in the first century, B. C. The head is that of some Roman orator, while the body is said to be that of Hermes Logios, the god of speech and patron divinity of orators. The statue illustrates the custom of representing individuals in the form of divinities and with divine attributes.

The statue of Sophocles from the original placed in the Lateran Museum, Rome, by Pope Gregory XVI., was identified by means of several ancient busts bearing his name. He is shown in middle life, apparently reciting from one of his plays. "It is without question the noblest portrait statue which Greek art has left us," in the opinion of Edward Robinson of the Museum of Fine Arts. "The head is strong, beautiful and intelligent, with the tendency toward idealization which was characteristic of Greek portraiture in the best periods."

A copy of the Lemnian Athena, said to be the work of Phidias, has given students much food for speculation. The original head is in Bologna, while the body is composed from two statues in Dresden. The best of the two bodies was chosen, to which was added the Bologna head, and the cast of all three is that which occupies a niche in Symphony Hall. This is called the most beautiful statue of Athena which the world possesses. It shows her more peaceful side, as protectress of Athens. The style is severely simple.

There is a copy of the Amazon from the Capitoline Museum, found in a very mutilated condition, causing much discussion as to its history. The restorations are questioned, and the head is said to belong to a much older statue. Some say that the female warrior is drawing a bow above her head, others maintaining that she is about to vault. The statue is found also in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and arguments concerning it may be found in the catalogue.

Demosthenes, cast from the statue in the Vatican, occupies a good place from which the orator looks across the auditorium to Sophocles and Aeschines. The face shows tremendous earnestness, while its weariness and other characteristics correspond to the description given by Plutarch. The original statue is attributed to Polyantos, or is perhaps a copy after his work.

A faun which is represented is copied from a statue in the Borghese Palace, Rome, and a female figure next to this was recovered from Herculaneum, and is unknown. The original is now at Dresden. Beside this is the statue of Aeschines, found at Herculaneum and now at Naples. The figure of the great Athenian orator, and rival of Demosthenes, is much like that of Sophocles, though inferior as a work of art.

Euripides, the Athenian tragic poet, copied from a bust in the Vatican, occupies one niche, while near the stage is the seated Anacreon, the Greek lyric poet. The original was discovered in the sixteenth century at Monte Calvo, Sabina, and was placed in the Villa Borghese, at Rome. The Apollo Belvidere and the Diana of Versailles are both well-known figures. They occupy the back wall.

The work of putting the collection in place has been somewhat difficult. The hardest statue to place in position was the seated Anacreon, which, from its lateral bulk, was a problem of mechanics. A scaffold was built below the niche, which, with ladders, made a footstool for the old lyric Greek to ascend his throne. There was much difficulty, owing to the extreme narrowness of the balcony, which is only the width of two rows of chairs. But the statue was finally seated without mishap.

The entire group of classic sculptures will add much to the beauty of Symphony Hall, giving the interior a completed appearance that it has lacked. These plaster casts will be much treasured by artists, as some of them will be the only copies in America, and to see them has hitherto necessitated a trip to the originals in the European museums. These rare casts that are said to be the only ones in this country are those of Euripides, a female figure from Herculaneum and the seated figure of Anacreon. Many of the subjects have direct significance to music, while others merely suggest kindred arts. The figures are all of heroic size, about seven and a half feet tall, but being in lofty positions and with such spacious walls as backgrounds, they appear to be smaller. The choice of subjects was the taste of the artist, and the judgment of the architect of the building, Charles Follen McKim of New York.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS
Season Ticket, Y8, for Saturday evenings, sale at cost. L. S. T., Exchange Bldg., Room 508.
[A]:

Symphony Tickets FOR SALE
$20.00 upwards. MISS GORING, Room 508, Music Hall Building. WFSM[A] 0

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORKS.

Sculpture at Symphony Hall Has Enriched the Auditorium.

White Walls of the Foyer Seem to Demand Some Decoration—The Juglaris Panels for the Ray Memorial Library at Franklin—Notes of Art and Artists.

THE sculpture in the niches at Symphony Hall completes the decorative scheme of the hall itself, the white figures giving just the finishing touch needed. The effect will be one of rich simplicity, completely realizing the intentions of the architect, in relation to the beautiful auditorium.

There is another part of the interior, however, that stands greatly in need of decorative treatment. That is the foyer. Its present aspect is repellantly cold, with its bare white walls absolutely without architectural character. It is no wonder that it is known as "the receiving tomb" among symphony patrons.

In its present state it does not fulfill at all satisfactorily its purpose as a social meeting place for the promenaders who resort to the corridors during the intermissions. The lighting is so subdued that the white walls give it a sort of sepulchral effect, so that it seems more like a gathering place for departed shades than the focal point for one of the most interesting social functions in American life.

Of course its present condition is merely provisional. The manifest intention of the architects was to give it a more or less elaborate decorative treatment. The curiously plain character of the room in its existing form indicates such a purpose. But it is difficult to make people in general understand an unrealized intention in art; consequently there are endless expressions of wonder that such ugliness could have been perpetrated as a feature of one of the foremost of Boston institutions.

The room needs abounding light and color, and a rich scheme of decoration, probably with mural painting and sculpture together, in a way that would emphasize the festal character of the place.

This Symphony Hall foyer presents one of the best opportunities for mural decoration at present existing in Boston. Now that the decorative scheme of the auditorium itself is realized, we may doubtless look forward to the time when the foyer will be taken in hand with the same fine appreciation.

If the proprietors of the building do not feel warranted in making the necessary expenditure, it well might be made the subject of an effort similar to that which has given the hall its sculptural adornment. The cost would be many times that of the casts, but a movement to that end would doubtless meet with hearty support among the many lovers of music, and the regular patrons of the symphonies would be well repaid for an outlay that would immensely enhance their pleasure in the social side of the concerts.

Symphony Rehearsals

Two Seats No. 18 and 19, Row W. Exceedingly desirable location. At the reasonable price, of $55 each. IVERS & POND PIANO CO.
[A] 114 Boylston St., Boston

Symphony Ticket
HEARD, Hotel Touraine.
10[A]: 08

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the first performances are announced for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 17 and 18. The rule prohibiting standees will again be in force. The plan of admission to the second balcony on Friday afternoons, put in operation last season, proved so satisfactory in every way that it will again be adopted. The Huntington-avenue entrance will be opened at one o'clock sharp on each Friday afternoon, and exactly 505 people, which is the capacity of the second balcony, will be admitted, thus insuring a seat for each person. The programme of the first concert follows:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2. No. 7, in C major.
Bach: Concerto in B minor.
Schubert: The Wanderer Fantasy.
Tschalkowski: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.
Soloist: Mr. Raoul Pugno.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS
AISLE SEATS, lower left balcony, cheap. Address D. D. F., Boston Transcript.
[A]:

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE
of the hall. G. F. WADSWORTH, 40 State street, Room 58. 8[A]: 014

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR SALE—2 end floor seats EE 12 and 13 for half the evening concerts. Address H. F. L., Boston Transcript. [A]:

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS
Three seats on floor, under balcony, OO 22, 23, 24. Price $25.00 each. Box 482, South Weymouth. WSW[A]: 08

Symphony Concerts Wanted half subscription to ticket for Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals. Will pay $10 or $12. Address J. F. L., Boston Transcript. WS[A]: 015

1901-02

NY ORCHESTRA.

ICKE, Conductor.

NGERT.

12. AT 8. P. M

mme.

to "Egmont."

ES pour GRAND ORCHESTRE. (ne.)

MENT from the Hungarian Concerto

INTERNITZ.

Photo by Aimé Dupont, New York.

PUGNO.

Copyright by THE METROPOLITAN.

RAOUL PUGNO—HIS METHOD OF COMPOSING.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |              |   |
|--------------|---|
| BEETHOVEN,   | OVERTURE to "Leonore," in C major, No. 2, op. 72.   |
| BACH,        | OVERTURE (Suite) No. 2, in B minor, for Strings and Flute.I. Overture: Largo, Allegro, Lento.II. Rondo: Allegro.III. Sarabande: Andante.IV. Bourrée I. and Bourrée II.: Allegro.V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.VII. Badinerie: Allegro. |
| SCHUBERT,    | GRAND FANTASIA in C major, "Wanderer," op. 15.(Symphonically re-arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by FRANZ LISZT.)I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo.II. Adagio.III. Presto.IV. Allegro.   |
| TCHAIKOVSKY, | SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5, op. 64.I. Andante: Allegro con anima.II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.III. Valse: Allegro moderato.IV. Finale: Andante maestoso: Allegro vivace.   |

Soloist:

Mr. RAOUL PUGNO.

The Pianoforte is a Baldwin.

Photo by Aimé Dupont, New York.

PUGNO.

Copyright by THE METROPOLITAN.

RAOUL PUGNO—HIS METHOD OF COMPOSING.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |              |  |
|--------------|--|
| BEETHOVEN,   | OVERTURE to "Leonore," in C major, No. 2, op. 72.                        |
| BACH,        | OVERTURE (Suite) No. 2, in B minor, for Strings and Flute.               |
|              | I. Overture: Largo, Allegro Lento.                                       |
|              | II. Rondo: Allegro.  |
|              | III. Sarabande: Andante.   |
|              | IV. Bourrée I. and Bourrée II. Allegro.                                  |
|              | V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.                                      |
|              | VII. Badinerie: Allegro.   |
| SCHUBERT,    | GRAND FANTASIA in C major, "Wanderer," op. 15.                           |
|              | (Symphonically re-arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by FRANZ LISZT.) |
|              | I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo.                                     |
|              | II. Adagio.  |
|              | III. Presto.   |
|              | IV. Allegro.   |
| TCHAIKOVSKY, | SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5, op. 64.                                      |
|              | I. Andante: Allegro con anima.   |
|              | II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.                               |
|              | III. Valse: Allegro moderato.  |
|              | IV. Finale: Andante maestoso: Allegro vivace.                            |

Soloist:

Mr. RAOUL PUGNO.

The Pianoforte is a Baldwin.

(Copyright, 1898, by A. Dupont.)
RAOUL PUGNO.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Opening of the Twenty-Second Season of the Orchestra—First Appearance at These Concerts of Mr. Raoul Pugno, Pianist.

The first concert of the 22d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 2.....Beethoven
 Suite in No. 2 in B minor for strings,
 flute and piano accompaniment.....Bach
 Fantasia in C, "Wonderer," op. 15.....Schubert-Liszt
 Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64.....Tchaikowsky

Mr. Gericke, who looked refreshed by his foreign trip, was welcomed most heartily.

It might be well to play in the same concert the three "Leonore" overtures in the order in which they were probably written: Nos. 2, 3, 1. A program composed exclusively of piano sonatas by Beethoven is an invention of the Adversary, and it deserves the attention of the police as a deliberate act against public morals. Nor is an orchestral program devoted exclusively to the works of any composer to be encouraged, except possibly when the 9th symphony is given. But with these overtures the case is different; for here is a revelation of Beethoven's processes of musical and dramatic thought when he was mightily interested in the same subject. When the overtures are heard separately and at long intervals there is no opportunity for comparison by the ear. With the overture known as "Fidello" we are not here concerned; it seems, in view of the other overtures that were intended for the opera, incongruous, unimaginative. Furthermore, how many composers, after the achievement of a "Leonore" No. 2, would have the courage or the ability to shape from it a "Leonore" No. 3? After the three were attentively heard and thoughtfully considered, then No. 3 might be reasonably reserved for concert use and the other two put away neatly but surely on the shelf.

A little of Bach's orchestral music goes a long way, no matter how skillfully it may be doctored for modern use, no matter how admirably it may be played. Of course there is always the question of the proper tempo. Bach himself gave no indications for the performance of this suite. The spirit of the period, as well as the spirit of each dance, is to be considered; and then enters into the interpretation what is known as the personal equation. To me the fugue in the overture, to me the Rondeau and the Bourrées might well have been taken at a livelier pace than they were taken last night. We know from the testimony of his contemporaries and immediate followers that Bach played his organ fugues swiftly, so that the hearers wondered. The Rondeau in Bach's time was a lively movement, and the Bourée was animated. The Sarabande and the Polonaise would then furnish a still more marked contrast and relieve somewhat the inexorable monotony of tonality. But is it well to play so much of an old-fashioned suite, which vexes the modern nerves more acutely than the most extravagant music of the spasmodic school? We have "Half Hours with Famous Authors;" why should we not have "Ten Minutes with Bach?"

Mr. Raoul Pugno of Paris made his first appearance at these concerts. He played here in 1898 with Ysaye and Gericke and left a most pleasant impression. He chose originally for the concert last night a concerto in E flat by Mozart; but on account of the general composition of the program it was thought that he should be heard in a more modern piece. I am not on terms of extreme intimacy with this particular concerto of Mozart, but it cannot be more old-fashioned than Liszt's arrangement of the "Wanderer" fantasia, with its ornamentation so curiously antique, with its juxtapositions of bombast and sentimentalism. Mr. Pugno, however, played with brilliance, elegance, delightful ease, and with an accuracy that was never pedagogic. His reading of the theme in the adagio was exquisite; his playing throughout was that of the intelligent musician and the justly applauded virtuoso. His recitals will be looked forward to with more than ordinary interest.

Mr. Gericke gave a most careful, emotional, impressive interpretation of Tchaikowsky's 5th symphony, which some prefer to the other five. The symphony is certainly a remarkable work in many ways, in structure as well as in poetic beauty and dramatic intensity. Some are inclined to smile at the chief theme of the second movement, just as they sneer at the second theme of the first movement of the sixth symphony. It is true that in each instance Tchaikowsky narrowly escapes the reproach of vulgarity; but the earnestness, the sincerity of the speech makes its way even before the development and the amplification makes the theme seem inevitable. The heart of Tchaikowsky was that of a little child; the brain was that of a man weary of the world and all its vanities. And so we have the singular phenomenon of naivete, accompanied by a super-refined skill—and all this in the body and mind of a man fundamentally oriental in his tastes and especially in his love of surprising or monotonous rhythms and gorgeous colors. The very modernity of Tchaikowsky, his closeness to us as the spokesman of things we think and dare not say—these qualities may war against his lasting fame; but in our day and generation he is the supreme interpreter by music of elemental and emotional thought. The thought of death and the emptiness of life obsesses him and in the expression of this thought he is again the man of his period. When faith returns again to the world, his music may be studied with interest and curiosity as an important document in sociology. But for the present we are under his mighty spell. That gloomy opening theme, that theme of bodeiment which haunts like a spectre at dead of night or in a festal hall is in the heart of the hearer. Not even the brave finale frightens it away.

Philip Hale.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Standard Programme, with No Novelties, Is Presented.

Playing of Mr. Raoul Pugno, the French Pianist, Thoroughly Satisfies His Audience at the Opening Concert of the Year—The Mascagni Season.

The playing of Raoul Pugno, the French pianist, gave complete satisfaction last evening and obtained the approbation of a double recall at the first Symphony concert, not very many of whose attendants remembered hearing him during his short tour in this country with Messrs. Ysaye and Gerardy, about four years ago. A tall, large, burly, broad-shouldered man, with a heavy, grizzled beard, Mr. Pugno has more the aspect of a sturdy business man or a resolute academician, than that of an artist or idealist. Beginning his regulated study and public exhibitions at 6 years of age, he continued to be a prize winning student in the graver departments of music, a teacher, organist, choir and chorus master and professor at the Paris Conservatory until he was 40 years old, when he made his first appearance as a virtuoso, which character he has since maintained in many cities with distinguished credit.

His American debut was made in New York in November, 1897, when he played that Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" fantasia which he chose for his re-entry last evening. The composition and he seem to be well suited. Schubert wrote into it difficulties and complexities he was unable to execute, and is said to have been so impatient with it as to exclaim that the devil might have it for all he cared. But Liszt understood its possibilities and brought out its strong points and its beauties in his orchestral arrangement. It is rather a substantial, serious and emphatic than a buoyant or brilliant music, although it cannot be perfectly rendered without the bravura of pianism.

Mr. Pugno played it rather as a demonstrator than an illustrator or illuminator, the academic effect being increased by his attention to his notes. He was positive and almost weighty—but by no means severe—in the graver portions, and he gave swift distinction and rhythmical truth to the workings-out, to the ornamental arabesques and the florid accompaniments; yet this clearness seldom sparkled, and even the most rapid passages in virtuoso vein had less dash and rush to them than orderly, animated velocity. It was an intellectual, discriminating and expository rendering; but as the music itself makes small demand for fancy, levity or the graces of art, the playing was perhaps not the less honorable because it did not add those to its faithful manliness. Mr. Pugno will soon be heard in recital, when there will be occasion to observe other elements of his disposition and art.

It was well to begin the season with a work of Beethoven, for "he, the master of all music," has established the standards by which will still continue to be compared whatever claims consideration as pure music. The choice of the "Leonore No. 2" overture was good, for it reminds the listener that Beethoven's one opera nobly portrayed the triumph of love, faith and courage over malignity, cruelty and wrath, and celebrated alike the glory of universal liberty and the simple joys of genial domesticity.

The Bach concerto for string band and flute, given with the exception of its minuet, is cheery, refreshing and easy to hear, even though its composer could not hold his hand from writing into it an occasional canon and even fugue. It was definite and animated in delivery, and Mr. Zach accompanied excellently at the pianoforte.

It is a pity that Tschalkowsky died and made no sign as to how he would have his fifth symphony understood. He was the poet of sombre, dark and pitiful, yet not unlovely or hopeless, emotion. He shows dreaded and impending danger; he threatens defeat and despair; he brings on conflict with its pang, its sharp outcry and its fierce confusion, and he pictures the blithe-some vivacity of freedom and generous life; he expresses the moods of doubt, weakness, dependence and resignation; he leaves us uncertain, unsatisfied, depressed and bowed down under the burden which the soul of man must bear through its mortality—and yet we cannot help feeling that he believes in the value of aspiring effort and in an ultimate regeneration. For this symphony a cause and plan are less easy to imagine than for the sixth, although one cannot help feeling (more through its association of moods than because of its reiteration of lines and colors) that it had one inspiration and one purpose, and one wishes he might know what they were.

Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to return refreshed after their vacation. He led as if he were glad to have once more the many-voiced instrument under his hand. For a first performance there was unusual placidity and warmth in the playing, save that the drums were noisy, hard and dull, and the overture and symphony were particularly rich in color and sentiment. The new members were named here yesterday, and it was pleasant to see Mr. Kuntz again at his desk among the first violins after his long absence.

For the second concert this will be the programme:

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Concerto for violoncello.....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Symphony in E minor, first time....Hans Huber
Soloist—Miss Elsa Ruegger.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, began its twenty-second season in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 2, opus 72.

Johann Sebastian Bach: Overture No. 2, in E minor, for Strings and Flute.
(The pianoforte accompaniment arranged by Robert Franz.)

I. Overture: Largo. Allegro. Lentement.
II. Rondeau: Allegro.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourrées I. and II.: Allegro.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VII. Badinerie: Allegro.
Franz Schubert: Grand Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), opus 15.
(Symphonically rearranged for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Franz Liszt.)

I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Presto.
IV. Allegro.

Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64.

I. Andante. Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso. Allegro vivace.

Mr. Raoul Pugno was the pianist.

Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture is always interesting; were it not for the third, it would be a good deal more than that, but nothing so inexorably devitalizes a work as a better version of itself. Time was when some reputable judges preferred the No. 2, a preference which is rather a significant item in the history of musical feeling, by the way. Such men were Julius Riefz and Franz Lachner; when we reflect upon what they represented in the musical life of their day, this opinion of theirs becomes instructive of much!

Mr. Hale says truly in the Programme Book: "The 'Leonore' No. 2 was Beethoven's first grand overture; and in general scope and richness of development it was far in advance of its time." Yet it is none the less true that Beethoven took a longer stride ahead of his day in passing from this No. 2 to the No. 3 than in writing the former. In truth, the "Leonore" No. 2 is to be recognized as the culmination of a whole period of overture-writing; which period it logically closes, Beethoven entering upon a new era with the composition of No. 3. In the sense that Wagner (not entirely without truth) called Beethoven's ninth "the last symphony," can one call this "Leonore" No. 2 the last symphonic overture; the No. 3 shows it as already antiquated, puts the very "symphonic overture" itself out of reason—as the State put people out of law in old times.

Curiously enough, the No. 3 seems at first sight the more symphonic in form; there is at least a suggestion of a "recapitulation" in it, there being nothing of the sort in the No. 2. But this is a detail; the enormously extended contrapuntal development of the free fantasia in No. 2 makes it intrinsically the more symphonic, while the totally different sort of development in the No. 3 makes the latter dramatic. Note, by the way, that just this new development of the free fantasia in No. 3 that is the epoch-making element in the work!

But the superiority of the No. 3 does not reside in its dramatic quality alone; Beethoven could not rewrite a composition without improving it musically. His was no Zeus's brain, giving birth to full-grown Athenes; the longer he worked at a thing, the better he made it. Every change he made in the themes or instrumentation of the No. 2 was of the nature of an improvement. Take, for instance, the second theme in No. 2 (derived from Florestan's "In des Lebens Frühlingstagen"); the wish to get a good working theme for contrapuntal development led Beethoven to change it considerably from its original shape in the opera—and he got what he wanted, as usual. But, when it came to writing the No. 3, this conveniently workable theme no longer satisfied him; he accordingly brought it back nearer to its original shape, greatly enhancing its expressive beauty, if to the prejudice of its "thematic" value. And we see clearly enough that its "thematic value" was just what he had ceased to care about; for in the No. 3 he no longer works it up contrapuntally at all, but only dramatically. And so with much else in the overture. The performance of No. 2 on Saturday evening was thoroughly fine.

As for the Bach overture, it seemed to produce no effect whatever upon the audience in general; its most forcible effect upon me personally was to recall a saying of the late Otto Dresel (a pretty warm Bach-lover, if ever there was one!): "Of all the dreary and boresome things I know, listening to the whole of a Bach suite is the worst!" Oh, come now; a joke is a joke, but one can have too much of a good thing. Sebastian Bach was as great a genius as ever lived on this planet; he is today as modern (at heart) as anyone now alive. But he lived in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and was in some things influenced by the habits and customs of his day. No one today except a person of feeble mind and no education, who is bitten with the ambition to be intellectual, wishes to listen to the whole of the most eloquent and stirring eighteenth-century three-hours' sermon at a sitting; no one in his senses wishes to hear the whole (nor even six movements) of a Bach suite, no matter how divinely beautiful. If anyone who was in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening will solemnly swear that he enjoyed that Bach suite, he will lay himself open to the legitimate suspicion of being a case de lunatico inquirendo. The faculty of enjoying that sort of dose became extinct with the late John Sullivan Dwight; it is no longer of our day.

The strength of Tchaikovsky's E minor symphony becomes more and more patent with repeated hearings. It is a wondrous bit of musical workmanship, tremendously elaborated, and held together as with bands of steel. As yet, I have got only to the pitch of admiring it; in ten years more I like it—but not yet. I do not object overmuch to that peculiar essence which those who dislike it call "pessimism," and those who like it would probably call

34
 "Samoeidic gloom;" with Tchaikovsky it seems so genuine and unforced that it becomes almost a source of power. What I like far less is Tchaikovsky's instrumentation, that besetting mania ing every conceivable con-struments sound as harsh.

 With the exception of a wood-wind and horns, about long, twice repeated in the the instrumentation of the simply icy; stridency, one no farther go. But, with all this, I can admire the third and fourth movement cantabile is hard to take sounds too much like Bülow agreeablest witty things ab-

It was good to hear Mr.
 There is a rumor afloat that play a Mozart concerto.
 Gerike thought the Bach of eighteenth-century clasprogramme, and begged for Liszt fantasia instead. I ca-ing he had played the Moza playing is very beautiful large, heavy men have a w eliminating the percussive their pianoforte tone, and r resonance! Mr. Pugno's seems irrefragable; his ph itself, and he has a fine ins without exaggeration. His fined and very genuine, if poignant. In fine, he is ev mantic; and the Schubert
 tasia is a romantic compos lence! Still it was rare en a performance in every wa masterly.

The next programme is ture, "Le Carnaval roma concerto for violoncello
 symphonic poem, "Le Ro Hans Huber, symphony in time). Miss Elsa Ruggier cellist.

RAOUL PUGNO.

RAOUL PUGNO, the distinguished French pianist and composer, will open his tour in Boston on October 17, when he will play the Mozart Concerto in E flat with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Manager Henry Wolfsohn has arranged an orchestral concert for his New York début in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, the 21st, when he will have the assistance of Walter Damrosch and his orchestra. At this introduction he will also play the Mozart Concerto and the Grieg A minor Concerto. The following is of interest to those unacquainted with the life and career of this brilliant artist.
 It was not until December 23, 1893, that Pugno appeared before the public as a virtuoso.

He was born at Montrouge, Ile de France. The rudiments of his musical education he received from his father, who, as Pugno said of him in a recent interview, "was a poor teacher of music, barely able to support himself, but who had the soul of an artist."

At the age of six Pugno competed with a large class of boys for entrance into the Paris Conservatoire. Then commenced years of continuous study, which eventually placed Pugno at the head of the graduating class, taking with it the first prizes for solfège, harmony and counterpoint and fugue, in the class of Ambroise Thomas. After this came years of retirement and private study and then his appearance in 1893, when his success was almost sensational. Since then Pugno has won universal fame. His most recent triumphs were in Germany and England. During June last he played in London, where he made one of the most sensational successes of his entire career. It is best summed up in an extract from the London Post of June 13, 1902: "There is no greater pianist living. His technic is magnificent. He can turn the piano into an orchestra, and also plays with the most exquisite softness and refinement. Every gradation of shade and light is realized to perfection. It is not only the absolute command he possesses over the keyboard that entitles Pugno to so high a rank; it is the extraordinary way in which he is able to interpret the thoughts of the different composers, the poetry and charm of his playing." Some of his Berlin criticisms will be printed next week.

THE FIRST OF THE SEASON.

Opening Concert by Symphony Orchestra Included Gems from Beethoven, Bach, Schubert and Tchaikowski.

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more," for the 22d season of the Boston Symphony has begun, the 2000th concert of the organization approaches, and the sound of the two-step of the hotel hop is gladly exchanged for the strains of Beethoven and Bach. The opening programme consisted of Beethoven's "Leonora Overture," No. 2; Bach's Overture, or Suite, in B minor; Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, E minor.

Mr. Gerike was abundantly applauded as he came to the conductor's stand. The "Leonora No. 2" (which sounds more like the name of a fire engine than of an overture), went with splendid fervor, its dramatic contrasts being made the most of. Although "No. 3" is accepted as the best of the four overtures that Beethoven wrote for his single opera, yet this "No. 2" is not a whit inferior; one can be happy with either.

One ought to give a word of commendation to the trumpeter, whose solo was especially effective in this performance. This and the similar passage in the sister overture are the only prominent passages for trumpet that exist in the scores of Beethoven, who made very little out of the instrument, because there were few good trumpeters in Germany at the beginning of the 19th century. The delirious joy of the finale, with the theme in diminution, was finely given, considering that this was the first concert after a long vacation.

The second number was rather a large dose of Bach for any but an audience of musicians, but it served to display some excellent flute work by Mr. Maquarre, and the great ability of Robert Franz in restoring the faded tints of the old master without modernizing him. Even now the world does not recognize the self-abnegatory character of the task of this most careful "editor" of Bach and Handel. His painstaking was something marvellous; the reviewer can state from personal knowledge that sometimes Franz would make half-a-dozen arrangements of a Bach number before he was satisfied with one. But one must recognize the fact that some of Bach's music is old-fashioned and cannot appeal to the general public any more than Richardson's novels.

The final "Badinerie" (or "Badinage") was not a picture of playful coquetry to a modern auditor. The Sarabande, however, was delightful; all Bach's Sarabandes come close to the latter-day homophony; and the Bourrees had charming contrast and easily comprehended counterpoint. It would be a pity to turn auditors away from the greatest of composers by ill-judged or by too copious selections from his works.

Raoul Pugno next appeared as soloist in Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," made into a work half-solo, half-concerto, by

35
 Liszt. He played with exquisite expression and delicacy—at times; at other times he tried to live up to his name ("Pugno" means "fist" or "blow") and gave such fistcuffs to the instrument that it fairly roared. Nevertheless one could readily recognize the true artist in almost every part of his work, and he has plenty of celebrated company in the matter of assault and battery upon the piano. His playing of the theme of the song as a solo was entirely beautiful, and that startling counterpoint in octaves was given with surprising virtuosity.

He played from notes! This is something so unusual that one must chronicle it. It is a proceeding that may be commended. Why should an artist, who feels at all nervous about his memory, force himself to do a double task unnecessarily? It is surely better that the music, rather than the performer, should be on the rack. Mr. Pugno won a decided success and the recalls which followed the fantasia were of the most spontaneous and enthusiastic description.

After dress parade in the corridors came the symphony. There are some judges who prefer Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony to his "Pathétique." The works are both made of dramatic material, but run an opposite course. In the "Pathétique" Tchaikovsky starts early with the pathos of glory and leads them to the grave; in this work he commences with a lugubrious theme which he leads to victory and triumph. But, whichever road he takes, one must grow enthusiastic over his work for two reasons; first, he is sincere—and that we fear most of our modern musical pessimists and discord-makers are not; second, his tone-coloring is often phenomenal; he might almost be called the discoverer of the deep wood-wind.

The symphony is not new to Boston, therefore we need not speak at any great length about it. The clarinette deserves praise for its excellent work in the first movement. The transference of figures from the first movement to later ones, an effect invented by Beethoven, gives the symphony a continuity that seems to suggest a definite story, but it might be dangerous to guess at a composer's "intentions."

The romance of the second movement is built upon a theme so Gallic that Massenet might have invented it. For startling effects of tone-color the pizzicato effects here cannot be excelled. The horn, which had a very important part to play, did it very well. The interweaving of themes was brought out with excellent ensemble and balance.

The waltz which forms the next movement seems strange in this place, although Berlioz had previously taken up this dance as a symphonic movement. But one cannot help the query

Que diable venait-elle faire
 Dans cette Galere?

A full-dress suit would not be more out of place in a monastery than a good waltz in a symphony. To be sure it was not much of a waltz (from the dancing standpoint) and no auditor was tempted to tap his feet or wag his head to the rhythm.

The wild orgie of the finale was most brilliantly interpreted. This movement has much to say for itself and deserves study. There is a good deal of Russia ly like it—but not yet. I do not object overmuch to that peculiar essence which those who dislike it call "pessimism," and those who like it would probably call "Samoeidic gloom;" with Tchaikovsky it seems so genuine and unforced that it becomes almost a source of power. What I like far less is Tchaikovsky's instrumentation, that besetting mania of making every conceivable combination of instruments sound as harsh. With the exception of a wood-wind and horns, about long, twice repeated in the instrumentation of the simply icy; stridency, one no farther go. But, with all this, I can admire the third and fourth movements; cantabile is hard to take sounds too much like Bülow agreeablest witty things about.

It was good to hear Mr. Gerিকে thought the Bach of eighteenth-century classical programme, and begged for Liszt fantasia instead. I can imagine he had played the Mozart playing is very beautiful large, heavy men have a well-eliminating the percussive their pianoforte tone, and resonance! Mr. Pugno's seems irrefragible; his ph itself, and he has a fine inst without exaggeration. His fine and very genuine, if poignant. In fine, he is evanistic; and the Schubert fantasia is a romantic composition! Still it was rare enough a performance in every way masterly.

The next programme is ture, "Le Carnaval romain" concerto for violoncello symphonic poem, "Le Roi Hans Huber, symphony in time). Miss Elsa Rügger cellist.

RAOUL PUGNO.

RAOUL PUGNO, the distinguished French pianist and composer, will open his tour in Boston on October 17, when he will play the Mozart Concerto in E flat with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Manager Henry Wolfsohn has arranged an orchestral concert for his New York debut in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, the 21st, when he will have the assistance of Walter Damrosch and his orchestra. At this introduction he will also play the Mozart Concerto and the Grieg A minor Concerto. The following is of interest to those unacquainted with the life and career of this brilliant artist. It was not until December 23, 1893, that Pugno appeared before the public as a virtuoso.

He was born at Montrouge, Ile de France. The rudiments of his musical education he received from his father, who, as Pugno said of him in a recent interview, "was a poor teacher of music, barely able to support himself, but who had the soul of an artist."

At the age of six Pugno competed with a large class of boys for entrance into the Paris Conservatoire. Then commenced years of continuous study, which eventually placed Pugno at the head of the graduating class, taking with it the first prizes for solfège, harmony and counterpoint and fugue, in the class of Ambroise Thomas. After this came years of retirement and private study and then his appearance in 1893, when his success was almost sensational. Since then Pugno has won universal fame. His most recent triumphs were in Germany and England. During June last he played in London, where he made one of the most sensational successes of his entire career. It is best summed up in an extract from the London Post of June 13, 1902: "There is no greater pianist living. His technic is magnificent. He can turn the piano into an orchestra, and also plays with the most exquisite softness and refinement. Every gradation of shade and light is realized to perfection. It is not only the absolute command he possesses over the keyboard that entitles Pugno to so high a rank; it is the extraordinary way in which he is able to interpret the thoughts of the different composers, the poetry and charm of his playing." Some of his Berlin criticisms will be printed next week.

THE FIRST OF THE SEASON.

Opening Concert by Symphony Orchestra Included Gems from Beethoven, Bach, Schubert and Tchaikowski.

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more," for the 22d season of the Boston Symphony has begun, the 2000th concert of the organization approaches, and the sound of the two-step of the hotel hop is gladly exchanged for the strains of Beethoven and Bach. The opening programme consisted of Beethoven's "Leonora Overture," No. 2; Bach's Overture, or Suite, in B minor; Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, E minor.

Mr. Gerিকে was abundantly applauded as he came to the conductor's stand. The "Leonora No. 2" (which sounds more like the name of a fire engine than of an overture), went with splendid fervor, its dramatic contrasts being made the most of. Although "No. 3" is accepted as the best of the four overtures that Beethoven wrote for his single opera, yet this "No. 2" is not a whit inferior; one can be happy with either.

One ought to give a word of commendation to the trumpeter, whose solo was especially effective in this performance. This and the similar passage in the sister overture are the only prominent passages for trumpet that exist in the scores of Beethoven, who made very little out of the instrument, because there were few good trumpeters in Germany at the beginning of the 19th century. The delirious joy of the finale, with the theme in diminution, was finely given, considering that this was the first concert after a long vacation.

The second number was rather a large dose of Bach for any but an audience of musicians, but it served to display some excellent flute work by Mr. Maquarre, and the great ability of Robert Franz in restoring the faded tints of the old master without modernizing him. Even now the world does not recognize the self-abnegatory character of the task of this most careful "editor" of Bach and Handel. His painstaking was something marvellous; the reviewer can state from personal knowledge that sometimes Franz would make half-a-dozen arrangements of a Bach number before he was satisfied with one. But one must recognize the fact that some of Bach's music is old-fashioned and cannot appeal to the general public any more than Richardson's novels.

The final "Badinerie" (or "Badinage") was not a picture of playful coquetry to a modern auditor. The Sarabande, however, was delightful; all Bach's Sarabandes come close to the latter-day homophony; and the Bourrees had charming contrast and easily comprehended counterpoint. It would be a pity to turn auditors away from the greatest of composers by ill-judged or by too copious selections from his works.

Raoul Pugno next appeared as soloist in Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," made into a work half-solo, half-concerto, by

Liszt. He played with exquisite expression and delicacy—at times; at other times he tried to live up to his name ("Pugno" means "fist" or "blow") and gave such fistcuffs to the instrument that it fairly roared. Nevertheless one could readily recognize the true artist in almost every part of his work, and he has plenty of celebrated company in the matter of assault and battery upon the piano. His playing of the theme of the song as a solo was entirely beautiful, and that startling counterpoint in octaves was given with surprising virtuosity.

He played from notes! This is something so unusual that one must chronicle it. It is a proceeding that may be commended. Why should an artist, who feels at all nervous about his memory, force himself to do a double task unnecessarily? It is surely better that the music, rather than the performer, should be on the rack. Mr. Pugno won a decided success and the recalls which followed the fantasia were of the most spontaneous and enthusiastic description.

After dress parade in the corridors came the symphony. There are some judges who prefer Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony to his "Pathétique." The works are both made of dramatic material, but run an opposite course. In the "Pathétique" Tchaikovsky starts early with the pathos of glory and leads them to the grave; in this work he commences with a lugubrious theme which he leads to victory and triumph. But, whichever road he takes, one must grow enthusiastic over his work for two reasons; first, he is sincere—and that we fear most of our modern musical pessimists and discord-makers are not; second, his tone-coloring is often phenomenal; he might almost be called the discoverer of the deep wood-wind.

The symphony is not new to Boston, therefore we need not speak at any great length about it. The clarinette deserves praise for its excellent work in the first movement. The transference of figures from the first movement to later ones, an effect invented by Beethoven, gives the symphony a continuity that seems to suggest a definite story, but it might be dangerous to guess at a composer's "intentions."

The romance of the second movement is built upon a theme so Gallic that Massenet might have invented it. For startling effects of tone-color the pizzicato effects here cannot be excelled. The horn, which had a very important part to play, did it very well. The interweaving of themes was brought out with excellent ensemble and balance.

The waltz which forms the next movement seems strange in this place, although Berlioz had previously taken up this dance as a symphonic movement. But one cannot help the query

Que diable venait-elle faire
Dans cette Galere?

A full-dress suit would not be more out of place in a monastery than a good waltz in a symphony. To be sure it was not much of a waltz (from the dancing standpoint) and no auditor was tempted to tap his feet or wag his head to the rhythm.

The wild orgie of the finale was most brilliantly interpreted. This movement has much to say for itself and deserves study. There is a good deal of Russia ay like it—but not yet. I do not object overmuch to that peculiar essence which those who dislike it call "pessimism," and those who like it would probably call "Samoeidic gloom;" with Tchaikovsky it seems so genuine and unforced that it becomes almost a source of power. What I like far less is Tchaikovsky's instrumentation, that besetting mania of his for making every conceivable combination of instruments sound as harshly as possible. With the exception of a passage for the wood-wind and horns, about four measures long, twice repeated in the first movement, the instrumentation of the symphony is simply icy; stridency, one would think, can no farther go. But, with and in spite of all this, I can admire heartily the first, third and fourth movements; the Andante cantabile is hard to take seriously; it sounds too much like Bülow saying the disagreeablest witty things about Raff.

It was good to hear Mr. Pugno again. There is a rumor afloat that he wished to play a Mozart concerto, but that Mr. Gericke thought the Bach overture enough of eighteenth-century classicism for one programme, and begged for the Schubert-Liszt fantasia instead. I cannot help wishing he had played the Mozart concerto. His playing is very beautiful indeed; those large, heavy men have a wonderful way of eliminating the percussive quality from their pianoforte tone, and retaining only the resonance! Mr. Pugno's rhythmic sense seems irrefragable; his phrasing is grace itself, and he has a fine instinct for variety without exaggeration. His sentiment is refined and very genuine, if not particularly poignant. In fine, he is everything but romantic; and the Schubert "Wanderer" fantasia is a romantic composition par excellence! Still it was rare enjoyment to hear a performance in every way so secure and masterly.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval romain"; Rubinstein, concerto for violoncello; Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"; Hans Huber, symphony in E minor (first time). Miss Elsa Ruggger will be the solo cellist.

W. F. A.

N ISHAM.

and Edwin Isham, ar in Boston on the Mozart Concerto. Man-orchestral concert Hall on Tuesday and London, Eng- he assistance of from Europe, where this introduction spicuous social and and the Grieg A eason just past, are erest to those un- Charlton for this is brilliant artist.

t Pugno appeared they have studied attained a degree of rance. The rudi- osen lines. Each is eceived from his artistic gifts, attrac- recent interview, h have enjoyed the le to support him- ing under the best th a large class of ge of the very best atoire. Then com- ducts they make a h eventually placed s which are almost ass, taking with it version. In these d counterpoint and they have idealized. After this came ave scored some of id then his appear- both sides of the almost sensational.

me. His most re- musicales of Lon- England. During Washington, D. C. e made one of the uses in Boston dur- career. It is best winter, Mr. Devoll ndon Post of June gue and a clientèle iving. His technic every appearance. into an orchestra, be heard this sea- e softness and re- out their fame and id light is realized bookings for public olute command he demand.

Mr. Devoll and Mr. itles Pugno to so of Monaco, H. H. ay in which he is of Abercorn, the fferent composers, of Sutherland, the Some of his Berlin s of Londonderry, Some of his Berlin

nger Countess of

THE FIRST OF THE SEASON.

Opening Concert by Symphony Orchestra Included Gems from Beethoven, Bach, Schubert and Tchaikowski.

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more," for the 22d season of the Boston Symphony has begun, the 2000th concert of the organization approaches, and the sound of the two-step of the hotel hop is gladly exchanged for the strains of Beethoven and Bach. The opening programme consisted of Beethoven's "Leonora Overture," No. 2; Bach's Overture, or Suite, in B minor; Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasie," for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, E minor.

Mr. Gericke was abundantly applauded as he came to the conductor's stand. The "Leonora No. 2" (which sounds more like the name of a fire engine than of an overture), went with splendid fervor, its dramatic contrasts being made the most of. Although "No. 3" is accepted as the best of the four overtures that Beethoven wrote for his single opera, yet this "No. 2" is not a whit inferior; one can be happy with either.

One ought to give a word of commendation to the trumpeter, whose solo was especially effective in this performance. This and the similar passage in the sister overture are the only prominent passages for trumpet that exist in the scores of Beethoven, who made very little out of the instrument, because there were few good trumpeters in Germany at the beginning of the 19th century. The delirious joy of the finale, with the theme in diminution, was finely given, considering that this was the first concert after a long vacation.

The second number was rather a large dose of Bach for any but an audience of musicians, but it served to display some excellent flute work by Mr. Maquarre, and the great ability of Robert Franz in restoring the faded tints of the old master without modernizing him. Even now the world does not recognize the self-abnegatory character of the task of this most careful "editor" of Bach and Handel. His painstaking was something marvellous; the reviewer can state from personal knowledge that sometimes Franz would make half-a-dozen arrangements of a Bach number before he was satisfied with one. But one must recognize the fact that some of Bach's music is old-fashioned and cannot appeal to the general public any more than Richardson's novels.

The final "Badinerie" (or "Badinage") was not a picture of playful coquetry to a modern auditor. The Sarabande, however, was delightful; all Bach's Sarabandes come close to the latter-day homophony; and the Bourrees had charming contrast and easily comprehended counterpoint. It would be a pity to turn auditors away from the greatest of composers by ill-judged or by too copious selections from his works.

Raoul Pugno next appeared as soloist in Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasie," made into a work half-solo, half-concerto, by Liszt. He played with exquisite expression and delicacy—at times; at other times he tried to live up to his name ("Pugno" means "fist" or "blow") and gave such fisticuffs to the instrument that it fairly roared. Nevertheless one could readily recognize the true artist in almost every part of his work, and he has plenty of celebrated company in the matter of assault and battery upon the piano. His playing of the theme of the song as a solo was entirely beautiful, and that startling counterpoint in octaves was given with surprising virtuosity.

He played from notes! This is something so unusual that one must chronicle it. It is a proceeding that may be commended. Why should an artist, who feels at all nervous about his memory, force himself to do a double task unnecessarily? It is surely better that the music, rather than the performer, should be on the rack. Mr. Pugno won a decided success and the recalls which followed the fantasia were of the most spontaneous and enthusiastic description.

After dress parade in the corridors came the symphony. There are some judges who prefer Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony to his "Pathetique." The works are both made of dramatic material, but run an opposite course. In the "Pathetique" Tchaikovsky starts early with the pathos of glory and leads them to the grave; in this work he commences with a lugubrious theme which he leads to victory and triumph. But, whichever road he takes, one must grow enthusiastic over his work for two reasons; first, he is sincere—and that we fear most of our modern musical pessimists and discord-makers are not; second, his tone-coloring is often phenomenal; he might almost be called the discoverer of the deep wood-wind.

The symphony is not new to Boston, therefore we need not speak at any great length about it. The clarinette deserves praise for its excellent work in the first movement. The transference of figures from the first movement to later ones, an effect invented by Beethoven, gives the symphony a continuity that seems to suggest a definite story, but it might be dangerous to guess at a composer's "intentions."

The romance of the second movement is built upon a theme so Gallic that Massenet might have invented it. For startling effects of tone-color the pizzicato effects here cannot be excelled. The horn, which had a very important part to play, did it very well. The interweaving of themes was brought out with excellent ensemble and balance.

The waltz which forms the next movement seems strange in this place, although Berlioz had previously taken up this dance as a symphonic movement. But one cannot help the query

Que diable venait-elle faire
Dans cette Galere?

A full-dress suit would not be more out of place in a monastery than a good waltz in a symphony. To be sure it was not much of a waltz (from the dancing standpoint) and no auditor was tempted to tap his feet or wag his head to the rhythm.

The wild orgie of the finale was most brilliantly interpreted. This movement has much to say for itself and deserves study. There is a good deal of Russia in its measures.

One sometimes feels that Tchaikowsky is like the bat which was decried by the birds as being too like a mouse and by the mice as being altogether too much of a bird. Had he been more thoroughly under German influence he would have had less of roughness and uncouthness; had he been pent up in Russia he would have had more savagery and yet more originality. For ourselves we lean to the Russian side of this musical question. We have possessed plenty of Germans who have wandered along the symphonic road, and their present successors seek for possible new effects in the brambles of metaphysics in music. When the new school of instrumental music starts (whatever that unborn thing may be) we believe that it will be cradled in Russia.

Louis C. Elson.

The Symphony Concerts Begin Again.

Post

Oct. 19, 1902

Interesting Program Enjoyed by the Usual Fashionable Throng.

Mascagui's Opera Company— Concerts Tonight—Gossip.

The 22d season of Symphony concerts was opened with a conservative program which comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 2, Bach's B minor overture for strings, flute and piano accompaniment, Schubert's "Wanderer" fantasia, rearranged for piano, and Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony. As was the case last season, a soloist appeared at the opening concert. The celebrated French pianist, Raoul Pugno, was heard in the Schubert selection, and judging from the numerous artists announced to appear this season nearly every concert will have the assistance of a prominent soloist.

The third year of Symphony hall finds nearly all the niches above the upper gallery occupied by appropriate statuary which relieves the former barrenness of the walls. And the third year also found the usual great attendance of familiar faces at both concerts and the composition of the grand orchestra nearly the same as in former seasons, with Mr Gericke as conductor.

Beethoven's brilliant "Leonore" overture opened the series auspiciously, for the orchestra played the work beautifully throughout, the trumpet calls were given in perfect harmony with the supplementary entrances by the full band, and the wood winds sang their melodies very sweetly. The familiar number is always welcome on a Symphony program, for the richness of the orchestration for the various parts of the band shows the splendid quality of each contingent, and yesterday's work was fully up to the usual standard.

The Bach suite for strings, flute and piano accompaniment is a charming work, illustrating various forms of dances, opening with a stately movement and changing in style through the seven numbers. The tonal colors are highly characteristic of the different subjects, but delicate withal because of the absence of the brasses in the score. The strings did their work smoothly and with perfect swinging rhythm, the third movement, the "Sara-bande," possibly calling for special praise by reason of the graceful flute part, which was performed very daintily. In the somewhat formal measures of the polonaise the ensemble playing by the strings was flawless.

The Tchaikowsky symphony voices the spirit of the Russian composer in unmistakable terms, and although not as barbaric and chaotic as his sixth symphony, the former number is permeated with the vigor usually associated with the composer's writings. The principal theme, which is reiterated at intervals throughout the work, is somber and dramatic and suggests the nature of the symphony at the outset; and this atmosphere continues even in the third or waltz movement, which terminates in gloom. In the second part the fortissimo playing by the orchestra was notably vigorous, yet without being muddled; the lighter measures of the waltz were given with proper sentiment and refinement of style, and in the first part, the theme allotted to the bassoons and clarionets was phrased perfectly. The climaxes of the final movement also went admirably.

Mr Pugno was heard in the Schubert "Wanderer" fantasia, which in its modern and rearranged form, gives abundant opportunity for the expression of the player's technique, Liszt's elaboration of the work leaving but few traces of the pathos of the original. The difficult score seemed apparently simple to the big, bearded pianist who played with a grace of sentiment, a firm yet delicate touch and with a thorough appreciation of the score. His forte passages at times were a trifle hard and lacking in clarity; but his legato work was smooth and appealing, his runs were given with ease and rapidity and his whole performance was very enjoyable. His simplicity of manner at the piano wins immediate favor, for he is the personification of modesty and good nature. He was enthusiastically applauded at the close of his performance and recalled many times to the platform.

The program this week will introduce the young cellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger, as soloist in a Rubinstein concerto. The other numbers will be the Berlioz overture, "Carnaval Romain"; Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and Hans Huber's E minor symphony.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Post Oct. 19, 1902

The 22d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated last evening in Symphony Hall.

There was the usual brilliant audience present, among which were noticed many of the familiar faces seen in seasons past, together with many new ones.

Mr. Gericke was enthusiastically applauded when he appeared on the platform. The programme of the first concert presented no novelties, yet there was much of an interesting nature. The opening number was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 2, which of the four written by the composer for his only opera, "Fidelio," ranks in popularity only second to No. 3, which it closely resembles. The work was quite in advance of its day, and even after a lapse of nearly a century is still found in the repertory of all the great orchestras of the world and justly ranks among the best works of its kind.

Bach's B minor suite, for strings, flute and piano, is occasionally given, but does not possess the interest of the suite in D, even though some great contrapuntal writing is apparent. It was admirably given, the solo flute contributing a large share towards the successful performance.

The soloist of the evening was Raoul Pugno, the French pianist, who last evening appeared at these concerts for the first time. He is, however, not entirely a stranger to this city, for he appeared several seasons ago in joint recitals with Ysaye and Gerardy and many will recall with pleasure the fine ensemble of these recitals. Mr. Pugno chose for his solo number the Liszt adaptation for orchestra and piano of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasie," Op. 15, which the composer originally composed for piano solo.

The Liszt adaptation was at one time

quite a favorite with pianists, but today it shows unmistakably the effects of time, even though there is much showy orchestration and brilliant passage work for the solo instrument. Mr. Pugno played with notes, a rare sight in these days, though years ago it was a common occurrence. He has a fluent technique, his style is brilliant, though not profound, with a tone pleasing in quiet passages, but hard and metallic in more vigorous moments. The work hardly showed Mr. Pugno at his best and one would prefer to forego an opinion of his powers as a pianist until after hearing him in recital, an opportunity which will soon be offered.

Mr. Pugno's performance may be, however, considered vigorous and brilliant, and the audience rewarded his efforts with much applause and several recalls.

The final number was Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor, Op. 64, a work only second to his great symphony, No. 6, the "Pathetic." Those who think that Tchaikowsky's work is not lasting reckon apparently without true knowledge and understanding, for he is certainly up to date in all that pertains to brilliant instrumentation; elaboration and ingenuity are displayed on every page of his score and as for melodic invention in the best sense of the term, there is none today that can surpass or perhaps equal this greatest of Russian composers.

This wonderful symphony was superbly played and made a profound impression, as well it might, for there are beauties in the score that to describe adequately would fill many pages.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, cellist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week, and Hans Huber's E minor symphony is promised for a first performance.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS in first row of second balcony are for sale; price $16.50 each. Address L. C. B., Boston Transcript. St[A] n 6

MR. ERNST PERABO TEACHER OF PIANO May be found at 130 Bowdoin Street daily from 11-1 o'clock. St[A]: n 5

TWO SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS FOR SALE for balance of season for $48 for both. Please address E. D. G., Boston Transcript. St[A] n 6

FOR SALE TWO SEATS FOR SAT. EVE. SYMPHONY CONCERTS in a good position may be secured for $19 a seat. Address V. F. R., Boston Transcript. St[A] n 6

ELSA RUEGGER,
'Cellist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |              |  |
|--------------|--|
| BERLIOZ.     | OVERTURE, "The Roman Carnival." op. 9.   |
| RUBINSTEIN,  | CONCERTO No. 2, in D minor, for VIOLONCELLOand ORCHESTRA, op. 96.Allegro moderato. — Andante. — Moderato. —Allegro vivace.   |
| SAINT-SAËNS, | SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel." op. 31.   |
| HANS HUBER.  | SYMPHONY No. 2, in E minor, op. 115.I. Allegro con fuoco.II. Allegro con fuoco non troppo.III. Adagio ma non troppo.IV. Finale: "Metamorphoses: suggested by pictures byBöcklin."(First time.) |

Soloist:

Miss ELSA RUEGGER.

Photographed in Brussels.

ELSA RUEGGER.

A NEW SYMPHONY.

Hans Huber's Translation of Pictures by Arnold Boecklin Into Music—Miss Elsa Ruegger, an Admirable 'Cellist, Plays a Sorry Concerto by Rubinstein.

The program of the second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:
 "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
 Concerto No. 2 in D minor for 'cello.....Rubinstein
 "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel".....Saint-Saëns
 Symphony No. 2 in E minor.....Hans Huber

Hans Huber is at the head of a music school in Bale, where he was born in 1852. His first symphony is entitled "William Tell," and his second is a eulogy in music of Arnold Boecklin, the painter, who, born at Bale, knew, like Ulysses, many towns, and spent his later years in his villa at or near Florence, where he died.

The first three movements are supposed by ardent analysts and pamphleteers to describe Boecklin's character as an artist. The Finale is composed of a short introduction and a theme and variations. Each of these variations was suggested by a picture, and the title of the picture is prefixed to each variation in the score. The symphony was performed for the first time on July 2, 1900, at a Festival of the Society of Swiss Musicians, held at Zurich.

Boecklin was a painter of bold and daring imagination and he was a gorgeous colorist. He is probably best known to the world at large by his "Fields of the Blessed" and "Island of the Dead"; but the huge album of his works, in three volumes, would attract even the most indifferent visitor at the Public Library. His genius was fantastical. His subjects are often almost incredible; his treatment of them is audacious; yet where a man of talent would be only grotesque, Boecklin is impressive. You accept his strange women-of-the-sea, his Centaur at the blacksmith's, his Tritons, Nereids, and still stranger shapes that are half-beast, half-human. The old Grecian mythology was as real to the painter as were the scenes of bloodshed and terror he saw in the streets of Paris as a student. He painted the mysteries of plain, mountain and ocean, Prometheus bound to Caucasus and the Sleeping Diana watched by satyrs, Pan fishing for sea-nymphs, sporting nymphs. At times he was frankly symbolical, as in "The Spirit of Adventure"; "War"; but, as a rule, symbolism lurks, and dares not protrude.

And now comes Huber with his translation of Boecklin into music. He is not the first to write music suggested by pictures or music that attempts to preserve the spirit or the mood of a painting. Liszt was before him, and Liszt had a habit of anticipating many, even men of today.

But Huber and Boecklin! The industrious teacher and maker of music and the man of wild fancy and flaming imagination. No, Huber is not the man for this unnecessary task. For originality and individuality were also strong characteristics of Boecklin.

The symphony is well-made and Huber is evidently a sound and thoroughly grounded musician with no little fluency of expression, but the music is neither individual nor imaginative. The themes are not striking, and the second theme of the first movement, the theme announced first by the oboe, is decidedly Brahmsian. There are other passages which in melodic and rhythmic structure recall Brahms. The Scherzo is at times entertaining; it is not distinguished. Portions of the Adagio are most agreeably sonorous, but the musical thought is rather commonplace. It may here be said that the symphony as a whole is effectively scored.

The Finale shows plainly inherent lack of imagination, and here the musician puts himself boldly in comparison with the painter. It is not necessary to ask the old question which foes of program-music delight in putting: "If there were no specific titles, only the headline 'Suggested by pictures by Boecklin,' could any one thoroughly acquainted with the pictures identify each of the nine?" The violin solo and the organ would probably suggest the hermit fiddling before the Madonna, and the last variation, a Bacchanale. But Huber has given the titles, and the question is this: "Is the mood of each picture reproduced?" Here, of course, the double personal equation enters in; the individuality of the composer and that of the hearer. To me not one variation suggested the accompanying picture. How trivial the musical agony of Prometheus in comparison with that giant figure, bound yet still defiant, on the rocky mount? And the Elysian Fields? This dance-tune might pass in the Elysian Fields of Paris, but Gluck with simplest means caught the classic spirit of that serene enjoyment which eludes the Swiss or is not understood by him. And "Night"? And "The Silence of the Oceans"? As the famous reviewer once remarked: "This will never do."

Miss Ruegger played admirably, nor was she disconcerted by the breaking of a string. Her tone was beautiful and pure; her technic, wholly adequate; her sentiment unimpeachable; her bravura, accurate and brilliant. But no wonder that the concerto is seldom played. It is sorry music, another instance of the weakness of a wonderful pianist who had the mania of composition.

It is always a pleasure to hear the overture of Berlioz and the symphonic-poem of Saint Saëns. How fresh, how modern the overture seems, and yet it was written nearly 60 years ago. And the symphonic-poem is a masterpiece with its daintiness and elegance, with its spirit of exquisite irony.

The performance of the orchestra was of a high order of excellence, although in the trio of the scherzo there was momentary unsteadiness. I doubt if this symphony ever sounded as well as it did last night. Nor should Mr. Longy's playing of Omphale's mocking solo be passed by without grateful recognition.

Philip Hale.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Its Important Number Is Huber's Boecklin Symphony.

Miss Ruegger, a Swiss Artist, Plays Concerto of Rubinstein Keyed in D on 'Cello and Does It with Great Beauty at Second Concert of the Season.

The important number of the second symphony concert was the Hans Huber symphony in E minor, hitherto unheard in Boston, in memory and laudation of the Swiss painter, Arnold Boecklin. He was born and spent many of his 71 years in Basle, of which city the composer, too, was long a resident, but he was also something of a cosmopolitan, and his pictures are known almost the world over. He was one who united German exactitude and emotion with German romance, fancy and reverie, and he loved to people landscapes finished with Dusseldorf precision and faithful in archaeological respect for Grecian architecture and classic scenery with fauns, satyrs, nymphs and demigods, or else to place in an environment of modern sea or shore a mysterious, symbolic or eerie figure of his own imagining. The symphony's first three movements seem to recognize these opposing and yet blending elements of character, and the themes suggested in the first, one strong and one sweet, reappear influentially if not always formally through the whole work. The former has been taken to suggest the man himself, resolute and original in his chosen course, and the other the poetic and gently fantastic spirit which prevails in his art. The opening allegro deals with these variously, to intimate, perhaps, the diversity which flows from the painter's use of the twin characteristics of his art; the scherzo is rhapsodic and excited, as if to correspond with the revelry of the wilder creations of his brush, while the adagio, rich and smooth, in frequent horn color and dreamy wood-wind voices, may stand for the idyllic moods and tranquil scenes of other pictures.

The finale, introduced by the gentler of the original themes, owns a frank intention to make musical deductions from a number of Boecklin's most expressive pictures, each variation being designated by its name. Many phrases of the painter's art are illustrated, and the paintings themselves are known, in photographic reproductions at least, the world over. They range from the remote and melancholy beauty of "The Ocean's Stillness" and "The Night," to the airy lightness of "The Fleeting Nymph," the reflective strains of the "Hermit Playing at a Madonna Shrine," the strongly straining pulses of "Prometheus" and the eager restlessness of the "Bacchanale." All these sketches are short, but significant, and they typify the moods of their subjects perfectly and affectionately. The whole symphony was splendidly read, and its color and movement were appreciatively diversified. A softer touch, however, would have become some of the idyls well, and a longer suspension at the end of each variation would not have been amiss, as each represents an independent and isolated vision, and does not merely make one more in a string of thematic evolutions. The symphony was easy to follow and understand, and it was evidently much enjoyed.

The concert began cheerily with the "Roman Carnival" overture of "Berlioz, which tells its story well—the half-pastoral opening with its pipings, the long central scheme, mirth and mischief and masked love-making, and the final emphasis of the peasant Saltarello, which has been gradually rising assertively from the first. The orchestra also played the "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" of Saint-Saëns, than which they do nothing of its picturesque kind better—never failing to bring out the busy, fine spun figure of the flax spinning away from the twirling distaff, the heavy rebellious grumbling of the enslaved Hercules, the piquant sarcasm of the oboe-comments of Omphale, and the finale dwindling away to nothingness of the thread as its last mite is drawn.

The only other number was the second violin-cello concerto by Rubinstein, keyed in D minor, and dexterously constructed to show both virtuosity and artistry. It runs straight on unbrokenly, but the conventional changes of movement are made and cadenzas indicative of their approach are set in the usual places. The allegros offer opportunity for executive display, while the andante makes the place for sentiment and long-drawn grace of tone and phrasing, so that the player only needs a few dramatic passages to be able to develop the whole range of his skill at a single sitting. Miss Elsa Ruegger, the young Swiss 'cellist who visited this country a couple of years ago, performed it beautifully. Her tone, which is sufficiently ample and searching, is happily free from the nasality too common in the 'cello, and her lowest registers are quietly firm and positive, with no smarting assertiveness. Her phrasing is distinguished and her execution almost as facile as a violinist's, and gratifyingly simple, effortless and refined. She had a warm double recall, which a little ad captandum exaggeration of her elegant reserve might easily have multiplied.

The next programme will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Concerto for piano-forte in E-flat.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Kaiser-march.....Wagner
Soloist: Mr. Frederic Lamond, the Scotch pianist, who is to make his debut.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS—Three very desirable seats in lower balcony, second row, at much less than auction price. $17 each. Sold separately if desired. Address W. O. G., Boston Transcript.

FOR SALE

2 SYM. REHEARSAL For Season
Price $23 a Seat. Less than auction price. Good position
Address S. J. D., Boston Transcript
24[A] o 24

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Hector Berlioz: Overture, "Le Carnaval romain," opus 9.
Anton Rubinstein: Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, opus 96.
Camille Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Hans Huber: Symphony No. 2, in E minor, opus 115.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Miss Elsa Ruegger was the solo 'cellist.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" was played with exquisite finish, if at what one is forced to fancy a slower tempo than the composer's; at least, the tempo at which it was taken last Saturday evening does not give much color of probability to Berlioz's story of his experience with a military band in Paris, if it is really the right one. The story, as told by Berlioz, goes that the bandmaster had arranged the overture for wind instruments, and invited the composer to hear a final rehearsal of it; Berlioz told him that his tempo was too slow, to which the bandmaster replied that wind instruments could play it no faster. "Give me your baton," said Berlioz; and began to conduct the work himself at the right tempo. "There, that is what I want," said he, after it was over. The bandmaster said he could not have believed it possible, but, now that he had seen it done, he would always do it in the same way in future. Then, retaking his baton, he began to have the band play it over again. But the band absolutely could not play it at that rapid tempo under his conducting; every time Berlioz himself took the baton, they played it all right; but they could not do it for the bandmaster! It should be said, however, for Mr. Gericke that he made more effect with the composition at his tempo than anyone else I have heard who took it as slow as he; he did not let his moderate tempo pull the music to pieces.

But it would be stretching a point to call the performance of Saint-Saëns's "Omphale" effective. As an exhibition of deft and highly polished technique, it was wonderful; but there was no Omphale to it, and not overmuch Hercules!

Hans Huber's "Böcklin" symphony, has been spoken of for some time as an important novelty. It is rather curious, though, that a work, written (or, at least, produced) when the composer was well over forty-five, should have been the first means of making his name known to most people; few composers of importance in history have made themselves known to the world at large by so mature works! No doubt Hans Huber has been known to musicians here for a good while; but I doubt if many "average music-lovers" had ever heard of him until they saw his name on the advance programme, week before last.

Now that the symphony has been heard here, one can say distinctly that no one would have mistaken it for anything but a mature work; young musicians do not write like that, the symphony shows none of the vices of youthfulness. There are some works about which one dares to speak quite plainly and unreservedly even after but a single hearing. This E-minor symphony of Huber's is one of them. To me the most striking thing about it is the orchestration; I cannot remember ever hearing a new orchestral composition before (except by Richard Wagner or Hector Berlioz) the instrumentation of which seemed at once so modern and so inveterately euphonious; there is a considerable variety of color in it, but not one harsh-sounding measure. There is no garishness, no glare to it; which may be, after all, but another way of saying that there are no high lights. Still, beautiful colors are beautiful colors, and that is something; to be sure, a kaleidoscopic arrangement of the most beautiful colors in the world does not necessarily constitute beautiful coloring, and I am by no means sure that Huber's skill in producing entrancing orchestral tints entitles him to the name of a great orchestral colorist—indeed, I rather fancy it does not. I found that, before the symphony was over, I began to get pretty tired of that perpetual richness of tone, in spite of its undeniable variety; it seemed to lack character, and I would have given something for a measure or two of Tchaikovsky's downright stridency.

As for the other characteristics of the symphony, the work seemed to me decidedly well written (although one cannot really judge of this sort of thing at a single dash), to bear the ear marks of musicianly parentage. It is certainly conceived and carried out in the modern spirit; it belongs unmistakably to the present. Yet one might suspect at moments that the composer paid more deference to the "amenities" of musical expression than most of his noteworthy contemporaries; such very nice consideration for the listener's feelings smacks just a wee bit of old-time manners. But, when one comes to consider the musical stuff out of which the work is made, the material of which it is built, then do one's eyes stare in astonishment! Excepting one or two phrases in the Scherzo and the Finale, I do not think there is a moment in the whole symphony which our excellent Mr. Napier Lothian could not match from his (presumably extant) collection of "incidental music" used to accompany more or less melodramatic plays for the last two or three decades at the Boston Theatre. Listening to the work, one soon found one's self longing for something to look at—a sunset, a prismatic fountain, some fireworks, anything bright and attractive to the eye—to furnish a hook whereon to hang all that ear-pleasing euphony. The music did not seem somehow able to stand alone. One understood the fine reports of the work that have come here from Germany, where critics evidently still keep up their old-time fondness for good boys, and overflow with praise of composers who do nothing shocking. Well, considering that the aristocracy of German musical criticism has done its best to lay out cold every new man who has had anything to say, for over a hundred years, it is comforting to reflect that this same aristocracy has a good word for somebody! And he who has its good word surely does not need mine. At all events, I do not think Mr. Huber himself could have wished for a finer performance of his symphony than it got last Saturday evening.

For once I have to thank a 'cellist for choosing one concerto rather than another. Fully as I am persuaded of the truth that every 'cello concerto belongs properly to a by-gone period, this one of Rubinstein's struck me last Saturday as peculiarly enjoyable. Nor do I think that Miss Ruegger's playing was the only reason. Anton Rubinstein has always been something of a puzzle. A man of most tremendous and almost arrogant individuality as a pianist, as a composer he had hardly any outline at all; he almost totally lacked musical profile. Moreover, he was one of those lazy hard workers from whom not very much is to be expected. He would cover reams and reams of music-paper with notes, and imagine himself uncomfortably busy; but, beyond the physical labor of writing note-heads and tails, the amount of real work he did was not overwhelming. A more slovenly composer never made a name for himself in this world! But he did have a talent for writing very lovely themes now and then; what he did with them afterwards was seldom remarkable, but he certainly could write pretty tunes. And this 'cello concerto of his is full of them. Now, it is generally pleasant to hear pretty tunes; especially is it pleasant when they come upon you as a welcome surprise in a composition which you have looked upon with dread, as sure to fill your soul full of dark despair. And nothing in the whole range of music (barring, perhaps, a "whole" Bach suite) looks so terrifying on a programme as a 'cello concerto. Imagine a man who has just screwed up his courage to drink a tumbler of extract of quassia, and finds that it tastes like lemonade! That is the way I felt on Saturday evening, when Miss Ruegger had led me half way through Rubinstein's concerto. Miss Ruegger's playing was certainly very beautiful indeed; her bravura is wonderfully secure and clean-cut; if it does not sound well, it may be a consolation to some listeners to remember that, ever since the violoncello came into use, virtuoso 'cellists have been trying their best to make bravura passages sound well on the instrument, and have invariably failed. Some persons might think the trick worth giving up, as impossible; but no, hope springs eternal in the etc., etc. Miss Ruegger's tone is warm beauty itself, and her phrasing exceedingly graceful and rational. In a word, she made a very fine impression indeed.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 3, in F major; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E-flat major; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Juan"; Wagner, Kaisermarsch. Mr. Eric Lamond will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

SANDERS THEATRE
The Boston Symphony Orchestra
70 Performers.
MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

TEN CONCERTS

Thursday Evenings, October 30, November 6, December 4, December 18, January 8, January 22, February 12, March 12, April 2, April 23, at 7.30.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Miss HELEN HENSCHER, the Misses CAROL NI, Miss WINIFRED SMITH, Mr. ANTON VON ROOY, Mme. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, RAOUL PUGNO, Mr. CARL STASNY, GEORGE W. PROCTOR, Miss MAUD MCCARTHY, Mr. ADOLF BACK, and others to be announced.

Season Tickets for the ten concerts, $7.50, on sale at the University Bookstore, Harvard.

2 REHEARSAL SEATS In D D on Floor Are FOR SALE for $60 for the week. Please address K. M. N., Boston Transcript.

Symphonies Season tickets $15 upward. Single tickets $1.00 and $1.50. MISS GORING, Music Hall Building.

2 Symphony Concert Seats In Choice Location, may be bought for $20 each by addressing T. N. L., Boston Transcript.

SATURDAY NIGHT'S SYMPHONY LEANED TOWARDS SWITZERLAND.

The programme:—

Overture, "Carnaval Romain".....Belioz
Concerto for violoncello.....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale,"

Saint-Saens.

Symphony in E minor. (First time.) Hans Huber
A concert that leaned decidedly towards Switzerland. A Swiss painter was glorified by a Swiss musician in a Swiss symphony, and a Swiss violoncellist was the soloist of the occasion. Nevertheless the first scene was laid in Rome. The "Roman Carnival" overture wears well. Belioz never achieved anything more genuinely rollicking than the Salterello which portrays the revelry of the Roman populace. The contrasts, too, are very effective, and the tender English horn melody was given perfectly, with all its pensive character well brought out. The work was taken rather sedately at first (in the chromatic rushes, for example), but its final climax was splendidly wrought up.

Now came Miss Elsa Ruegger with Rubinstein's D minor violoncello concerto. It is not a very distinguished work. Rubinstein used to complain of his anomalous position in art and life, saying: "The Russians call me a German, the Germans call me a Russian; the Christians call me a Jew, the Jews call me a Christian!" The Germans admired the Russian character of this violoncello concerto, but the Muscovite scarcely peeps out at all save in the last movement. There is considerable "padding" in the work, as there is in too many of Rubinstein's compositions. The man could sometimes touch the heights of genius, but he was never a severe enough critic of his own work, and many a noble passage is spoiled by a prosaic context in his sonata forms. The "Ocean Symphony," for example, reaches a very high plane in its first, and sometimes in its second movement, but the work as a whole leaves the impression of mediocrity. Thus it is with this violoncello concerto; there are elegant passages in the slow movement that are most impressive; the folksong character of the beginning of the finale is very attractive; but at the end one has lost all enthusiasm.

Elsa Ruegger played with artistic ease, and conquered many difficulties without seeming effort; she gave some broad C-string work, her intonation was excellent, double-stopping and scale passages were clean and pure, her cadenza-playing was brilliant, and, if she had the misfortune to break a string, the accident happened at the very best possible place, between two movements. There was, however, little of abandon in her work; one always felt a reserve and calmness that militated against any excitement on the part of the auditor. That there were no lapses of intonation after adding a new string to the 'cello speaks much for the surety of the artist. But, after all, it would take a phenomenon to astonish the Bostonian in a 'cello work, for we have an artist who is the peer of almost every visiting soloist on this instrument, in the ranks of our own symphony orchestra. Miss Ruegger had two recalls at the close of the concerto.

Now came "Omphale's Wheel" as symphonized by St. Saens. The wheel was not a chainless, as Hercules found out to his cost; Hercules, who resigned from his club and sat by the fireside, spinning yarns to the mocking oboe-laughter of Miss Omphale, afterwards Mme. Hercules. It was a pleasant number, not requiring deep thought, its pictures being recognizable without any effort. The salient points were remarkable shading (a final "ppppp" pushed to the invisible, or inaudible, point) and charming oboe playing by Mr. Longy. The revolving figures ("Oh, how the wheel becomes it!") were daintiness personified. No wonder then that the pretty number won the chief applause of the evening.

Less easily followed, because attempting a much more varied task, was Huber's symphony, which followed. There is a proverb about the hangman coming to be hanged; in this case the painter came to be tone-painted, for Huber has made his symphony into a portrayal of the Swiss artist, Arnold Boecklin; which is about as successful as if Reinecke should portray Whistler. The first movement of the work was as abstruse as Brahms, but without the coherency of the great symphonist. Development was there in all profusion, and so involved at times that the movement became a musico-mathematical problem. Some of the figures were not attractive, but that mattered little, since your true pedant can make a sonata-allegro out of figures taken from Schmitt's Five-Finger Exercises. There was, therefore, plenty of skill and little of inspiration apparent.

Matters improved with the succeeding movements. The eerie character of the scherzo was attractive in its restlessness and quaint syncopations. The adagio was serene and dignified, in good contrast with the preceding movement. It was a little too long, a fault that could be more strongly emphasized in connection with the first movement. Your modern orchestral composer requires as much room to turn round in as a seven-masted schooner.

The variations of the finale seemed the best part of the work. They gave a succession of moods inspired by various pictures of Boecklin. They did not actually represent these paintings, however; to turn music into a panorama would be impossible; we regarded the sub-titles (the titles of some of the painter's most famous works) as merely suggestive of the source of inspiration of the composer, and no more "programme music" than the finale of the "heroic" symphony; the work remained a subjective, rather than objective, piece of music.

The performance was excellent. One might say an especial word about the effective flute playing, the violin obligato, the massive effect of the organ; but where all was well done even this might be invid-

42 hearing; if it was not at all thrilling, it certainly was interesting.
Louis C. Wilson.

Photo by Lützel, Munich.

FREDERIC LAMOND

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante.

III. Poco allegretto.

IV. Allegro.

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in E flat major, No. 5, for PIANOFORTE
op. 73.

I. Allegro.

II. Adagio un poco moto.

III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. LENAU).

WAGNER,

KAISERMARSCH.

Soloist:

Mr. FREDERIC LAMOND.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

ious. The symphony certainly deserved a hearing; if it was not at all thrilling, it certainly was interesting.
Louis C. Elson.

Photo by Lützel, Munich.

FREDERIC LAMOND

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante.

III. Poco allegretto.

IV. Allegro.

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in E flat major, No. 5, for PIANOFORTE

op. 73.

I. Allegro.

II. Adagio un poco moto.

III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. I. ENAU).

WAGNER,

KAISERMARSCH.

Soloist:

Mr. FREDERIC LAMOND.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Long Programme Was Rather Trying for One Sitting.

A Brahms Symphony, a Beethoven Concerto and a Strauss Tone-Complication Problem, Plus a Wagner March — Mr. Lamond a Master of the Keyboard.

In performance the third symphony programme proved neither felicitous nor judicious. It extended to nearly two hours, and all that time attention was kept at stretch and strain, without any period of real relaxation, tending to a weary headache for conscientious listeners. A Brahms symphony, a Beethoven concerto and a Strauss tone-complication problem, plus a Wagner march, are altogether too much for one sitting. There was a certain approximate relief in the slow movement of the symphony; but, after all, one cannot repose contentedly and thoughtlessly upon its blandness; reflection and analysis must still be unremitted and the mind gets no actual rest. It might be thought that some new freshness and buoyancy must come into the rondo of the concerto. But this movement was not exhilarating—certainly it had no gay glitter—as Mr. Lamond played it, although it was cheery enough.

Indeed, that pianist, while evidently a master of the keyboard, appeared to be rather an artist of sterling sense than of quick sensibility. He has, like Pugno, the air of a doctor or professor than an artist. He is of medium height, stocky and sturdy, but with a pianistic shock of hair. He played—if it may be said without offence—as one might expect a Scotchman to play, intellectually and didactically, but not eloquently or emotionally. Charles Reade says in "Christie Johnstone": "The Scotch are icebergs, with volcanoes underneath; thaw the Scotch ice, which is very cold, and you shall get to the Scotch fire, warmer than any sun of Italy or Spain."

Well, Mr. Lamond did not chill with any obvious ice; but he did not thaw enough for one to feel fire.

His readings were broad and firm in the opening, smooth and steady in the andante, distinct and elegant in the rondo, while his ornamentation throughout the whole work, especially in his scales and trills, was bright, definite and easily swift. But he rarely passed beyond earnest emphasis into enthusiasm, and seldom arrived quite at the climax which the hearer craved and which he seemed to be preparing and promising. Yet the cadenza was well wrought.

It was intellectual, sincere, substantial, finely educated playing, but it was not ardent or persuasive. The choice of that great concerto—"The Emperor"—bespoke the true musicianly spirit, which aims at nothing less than the best; and the faithful, modest, consistent performance showed how truly the player honored the master. Yet, if a little rashness could now and then have broken in upon so much reason, how much better it would have been. He had a day he was accused of playing it tediously and forcibly as to be even rough, vehement.

The orchestra did finely all the evening, their best work coming, naturally enough, in the symphony and concertos, while they were fresh and unperturbed by the scores with which they had yet to struggle. The Strauss "Don Juan" remains the same exciting, exasperating confusion of old. That commentators have evolved from it so many stated formulas is but a new exemplification of what human imagination can do. The whole thing seems only a wad, erratic revelry, as purposeless and devoid of fixed shape as a life tossed into a chaos of passions and distractions, drawn, controlled, delighted and afflicted from moment to moment, and ending profitless and hopeless when the inevitable crush of catastrophe comes. We cannot see the value or the use of such a composition. One may be curious to hear it as an "up-to-date" thing which must be talked about. But the closest study which the listener can give it brings no permanent good or pleasure; and one cannot trust himself to its tumultuous billows as he can to the strong, steady, though fast rising, surges of Wagner's music.

And this leads to the usual reflection upon the "Emperor's March," which ended the concert—that it is but bombast; swelling, stately, almost portentous and regal; but still bombast, and saved from descending yet lower by the splendid, opulent and grandiose instrumentation. Which leads one always to think further, what magnificent and unparalleled circus and spectacle music Wagner might have written if he would but have given his mind to it!

No concert next week, but for the following week this programme is set:

Rimsky-Korsakoff....."La Fiancée du Tzar" (First time.)
Brahms.....Concerto for violin
Bizet.....Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4
Soloist, Miss Maud MacCarthy.

The third concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony, No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for piano No. 5.....Beethoven
"Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner

Richard Strauss gives as an explanation of his tone poem, "After Nicolaus Lenau," three excerpts from the dramatic work of the morbid and unfortunate poet, Don Juan in these speeches shows his character. He pursues women, one by one, in the hope of finding at last one woman that will sum up in herself all the desirable qualities of womanhood. His life, then, is a constant pursuit of the ideal. It is needless to say that each of his victims, so eagerly desired, in turn bores and disgusts him. He drinks the cup of pleasure to the lees. At last he is bored beyond endurance by the mere fact of existence; before the end, at the feast, he exclaims to his friend:

"Exhausted is the fuel;
And on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel."
The avenger fights with him, and although Don Juan has him in his power, this bores him, as does life itself, and the sensualist allows himself to be slain. Years before the birth of Richard Strauss, and Lenau went to the madhouse.

the name of Robert Burns wrote from the depths of his own experience:

And petrifies the feeling.
And petrifies the feeling.

And these excerpts from Lenau's poem are enough to furnish the key to Strauss's music. Some of his wild-eyed worshippers, not content with the quotations that serve as mottoes, have invented ingenious analyses, in which we are told the precise meaning of each theme; and how this section represents his passion for a widow and that for a maiden. But did not Strauss himself say the other day that the theme which represents, according to an analyst, Don Juan rushing off to new triumphs, was intended as his drunken entrance into a ball room? And is it not possible that when Strauss wrote down this theme he attached no specific and minute significance to it?

No, there is no need of the showman with blackboard and rod while this music is playing. "Don Juan—after Lenau's poem" is enough; and merely "Don Juan" might serve.

Why should anyone say this tone-poem is formless, incoherent? Simply as a vain and impotent protest against a modern shape and condition and appearance of form; for there must be a certain form, or an impression of form, in deformity itself. But here is music that reminds you constantly of two contending moods: insolent rejoicing in the flush and pride of manhood, which struggles inevitably with loathing and as inevitably is overcome by it at last. There are passionate episodes that may well depict incidents in the tumultuous life of the hero. Nor does it require any gymnastic feat of the imagination to see in the close with that grimly dissonant trumpet thrust the end of Don Juan's, as of every man's, desire.

A daring, brilliant composition: one that paints the hero as might a master's brush on canvas.

How expressive the themes! How daring the treatment of them! What fascinating, irresistible insolence, glowing passion, and then the taste of Dead-Sea fruit!

The performance was superb in pervading spirit, in finesse of detail, in dash and in sonority.

The symphony by Brahms, perhaps the most thoroughly genial as well as most passionate work of that accomplished pessimist, gave much pleasure; and the Kaiser March brought a noisy close.

Mr. Frederic Lamond made his first appearance in this country as a pianist. Never judge a man by his performance of a concerto is a wise saw. He may be a Single-Speech Hamilton, or he may rise in his strength only when he is alone with his audience. Surely Mr. Lamond can play better than he did last night, or else foreign reputation is as the idle wind. His performance was not distinguished by rhythm, color, imagination or the grasp of a master. Seldom if ever was the anticipation of the Rondo first theme so ineffective, and the delivery of the theme itself was muddy. Whenever the pianist should have been leonine, he was platitudinous in a highly respectable and solemn manner. The performance when Mr. Lamond was at his best brought to mind the criticism of a Shakespearean reading in "Great Expectations": "It was massive and concrete." Mr. Lamond was applauded heartily.

Philip Hale.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Friday P. M., Saturday Evening, 31st and 1st

PROGRAMME

Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Mr. FREDERIC LAMOND, Soloist

A limited number of seats at $1.00; others $1.50 and upwards, for sale at

CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE
ADAMS HOUSE
Tel. Ox.—942

TuTh(A) o 28

FOR 2 SYM. REHEARSAL For Season
SALE Price $23 a seat. Less than auction price. Good position.
Address S. J. D., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 29

2 Symphony Concert Seats

In Choice Location, may be bought for $20 each by addressing T. N. L., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 29

2 REHEARSAL SEATS

In D D on Floor Are FOR SALE for $60 for the two. Please address K. M. N., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 29

Symphony Ticket FOR SALE

Because of absence. On lower floor near centre aisle. Address T. S. G., Boston Transcript. (A):

FREDERIC LAMOND,
The Pianist at the Third Symphony Concert.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Johannes Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 80.
Ludwig von Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
Richard Strauss: "Don Juan," tone-poem (after Lenau).
Richard Wagner: Kaisermarsch.

Mr. Frederic Lamond was the pianist.

That was a wonderful performance of the Brahms symphony! Such technical perfection throughout the orchestra, such inviolable smoothness and beauty of tone, are rare. And by what means does Mr. Gericke bring out that "ghost of the first theme" so distinctly at the close of the fourth movement, yet without giving too much substance to its ghostliness? There must have been some trick—wholly legitimated by the result—but I could not make out what it was. If there had been just a thought more of elasticity in some places, the performance would have been ideal; I should like to hear the experiment tried some day of taking the third movement more passionately. It seems at times rather like carrying coals to Newcastle to exercise much self-restraint in playing Brahms; he does a good deal of that sort of thing himself, in his writing. But cannot that sudden burst from F minor into F major in the wood-wind, near the close of the last movement, be made to sound as dramatic as it looks? Undoubtedly it can, and it is hard to see what harm can be done by following so seemingly evident an intention; because a composer has shown himself as hardly ever in the dramatic mood there is no need of tamely slurring over what dramatic moments may be found in his scores—especially as a man so inveterately "querständig" as Brahms can hardly be supposed to be much of a stickler for "propriety." Still, a finer academic performance of a work which, after all, has indubitably a strong academic side, were hard to imagine.

Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" was also splendidly played. Mr. Gericke's well-known fondness for having things "sound well" is by no means wasted on a colorist like Richard Strauss; moreover, there is so much dash and passionate life in the music itself that one can well afford to sacrifice an ounce of fury in the playing to impeccable beauty of sonority. And in this instance full justice was done the dramatic element in the work; the place where it grows "kalt und dunkel . . . auf dem Herd" could not have been made chillier! That is an astonishing stroke of the composer's; to paint in lifelike tone-colors a man of flesh and blood, and then, with one blow, to knock all the flesh and blood out of him, and leave nothing but shivering bones and a vacantly staring skull! How Mozart's Commendatore would have delighted to witness the operation!

At last we have had a worthy performance of Wagner's Kaisermarsch!—from my point of view. Most conductors take the thing too slow; they take all the chivalric life out of it, and make it turgid. A more skilful bit of working-up than Mr. Gericke's treatment of that strange contrapuntal counter-theme which accompanies the second apparition of "Eln' feste Burg"—from its first timid appearance against the working-out of the first march-theme up to where it monopolizes the whole orchestra, except trumpets and trombones—has surely not been heard in Symphony Hall for a good while. Moreover, the march was so played as to sound rich and pulsant, but never noisy. It was shown as the work of a master, not as a mere vulgar holiday show-piece. One more remark concerning Mr. Gericke's tempo. The marking in the score is "Mässiges Marsch-tempo" (or words to that effect; I quote from memory), which would correspond to what used to be known in our army in the days of Hardee's tactics (and may be still, for aught I know) as "common time." Now, most conductors who have given the march here have apparently tried to get something like this "common time" at the rate of four beats to the measure; which proceeding drags out the music to the most doleful (and bombastic) slowness. Moreover, they never got nearer than "something like" common time; their four-beat tempo was somewhere between common time and ordinary quick time. Mr. Gericke pushes the tempo to a rate at which the ear gets the "common time" impression in allabreve (two beats to the measure); perhaps even a thought slower than the military "common time," but more nearly like it than the old way. The musical effect is very much finer, while Wagner's prescribed "mässiges Marsch-tempo" is sufficiently respected.

Mr. Lamond made his first bow before a Boston audience at this concert. I hesitate to say much about him yet, especially as he is soon to give a recital here, the programme of which contains nearly all the familiar old concert hacks—beg pardon, favorites—of robust players. My reason for hesitating is that Mr. Lamond comes to this country armed with a copious set of press-noticees from the other side of the Atlantic, compared to which those brought by all other pianists who have visited this country simply fade into insignificance. Neither Rubinstein, Bülow, D'Albert, nor Paderewski—not to mention others—were spoken of in such sun-outglowing terms by transatlantic critics, as reported by passionate press-agents. Especially is Mr. Lamond heralded as an interpreter of Beethoven, in which line he is reported to do things as new as they are marvellous. Now, no pianist in the world, let alone a Beethoven-player, could wish for a finer chance for shining than is afforded by Beethoven's E-flat major concerto—the most brilliant piece for pianoforte and orchestra ever written by anybody. But, after all the tremendous heralding the pianist had had, it was, to say the least, a surprise to hear him play every page of the concerto in just the most obvious way—which, as is often the case with Beethoven, is by no means always the most distinguished way—with the single exception of the first two measures of the theme of the last movement, which by some magic or other he made quite unrecognizable. It is no particular compliment to Mr. Lamond to say that he knows how to play the pianoforte; undoubtedly he does. He shows, too, now and then a certain vehemence of temperament, which has only the fault of seeming a little too voluntary at times. But in his playing of the concerto last Saturday evening I could find nothing whatever to put him in the class claimed for him by his press notices. Do not mistake my meaning: I have heard the "Emperor" concerto played much worse, more vulgarly; but this is not the sort of implied praise by ricochet that one expects to give a man whom one has been led to look to for something like a new era in Beethoven-playing. Perhaps Mr. Lamond may not know what has been circulated about him by his agents; if so, it is high time for him to see to it that the public at large be not led to expect such Titanic things of him. Why, Rubinstein himself could hardly have played up to the reputation that has been made beforehand for Mr. Lamond.

The next programme, for Friday afternoon, Nov. 14, and Saturday evening, Nov. 15 (there will be neither rehearsal nor concert this week), is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "La Flancée du Tsar" (first time); Brahms, concerto for violin; Bizet, suite "L'Arlésienne" No. 1; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat major. Miss Maud MacCarthy will be the solo violinist. W. F. A.

SANDERS THEATRE CAMBRIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

70 Performers.

MR. WILHELM GERICHKE, Conductor.

TEN CONCERTS

Thursday Evenings, October 30, November 20, December 4, December 18, January 8, January 29, February 12, March 12, April 2, April 23, at 7.45.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Miss HELEN HENSCHKE, the Misses CARBONI, Miss WINIFRED SMITH, Mr. ANTON VON ROOY, Mme. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, Mr. CARL STASNY, Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR, Miss MAUD MACCARTHY, Mr. ADOLF BACK, and others to be announced.

Season Tickets for the ten concerts, $7.50, now on sale at the University Bookstore, Harvard sq. [A]

SYMPHONY 2 VERY DESIRABLE SEATS FLOOR, Centre, $45.00. Singly if desired. P. O. Box 2074, Boston. [A] o 25

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR SALE TWO very desirable Floor Seats for half the concerts, $14 each. Address B. A. O., Boston Transcript. [A]

Symphonies Season tickets $15 upwards—Single tickets $1.00 and $1.50. MISS GORING, 30 Music Hall Building. SW[A] o 25 esent. The program Madame Bernhardt and view.

on was the one given house in Hill street, and included Madame Lerley Rumford, Miss gina Ganz and Mme. t her daughters; Lady ik silk, and wore her er and various orna-string of pearls round ened at the waist by a ord Tweeddale and by er looking very sweet dress covered with dia-s a striking figure in was eclipsed by Mrs. atin with an all round earl points. Mrs. Brad-aven, wore a gorgeous y; she had magnificent her head and on her so did Lady Saltoun. were also many Welsh ead of the stairs added to the most successful f was unable to appear, a severe chill. A tele-room with Mrs. Mackin-er concert although she olias Rink last Satur- ractive soprano, made as a good voice and l after singing "Dich " As an encore she e Rose," accompanied er artistically by Miss e at the concerts.

TS.

Arens Pupil.

o has been a pupil of (having been entrusted Frank J. Benedict, the with pronounced success r. Carl, the organ vir-New Haven Festival. enthusiastically, and the d by the press of New Register said: o at the Fourth Congrega-e of exceptional purity and cordially received yesterday

ID.

y the playing of so, Frederic L l'Albert, was be ne of the forema Brahms. Gre h a brilliant and thirty-four, being avid was his fir f Laurieston par H. C. Cooper in in Frankfort, died piano with and violin with d the good for 1885 to 1886 such world re- Lamond made ember 17, 1885, v and London, Russia (1896), icting marked tual and brill- the fiery style eethoven and opin and the eling technic, lity and ex- r phenome- ys wins for

There is a "Aus dem eight piano op. 2, and will furnish ght on his were sear eaments os and a mys ghly B we say e of t ill thro but ne able they e All

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Brahms' Third Symphony in F Major
—Frederick Larnard, Pianist,
Will Be the Soloist.

Mr. Gerিকে's third programme is straightforward enough, surely. It includes no overture, but it admits for its final number the noisy and pompous, but neither dignified nor ceremonial, "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner. The symphony, which is put at the head of the programme, will be Brahms' third, in F major, and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," will also be performed. The symphony, from having been pronounced when first heard in Boston dry, dull, hard, laborious and ungenial, has come to be regarded with more friendly warmth than almost any of the others which Brahms wrote. It would not be his if it were not more logical than frank, more learned than melodious; but it is seldom abstruse or remote, and the character of each movement is easily grasped and held. The first is strong and broad, and not without a happy coloring: the andante, resting on an oblique contrast of themes and manners, is simple and endearing; the third is slender, light and sweet, with a touch of plaintiveness, and the finale inclines to be grandiose, but changes delicately as it closes from the minor to the major mode.

As for the "Don Juan," it is one of the most puzzling of what Mr. Henderson calls Strauss' "tone riddles." It sets out, apparently, from the chief thoughts of three passages in Lanau's poem, the wide and magical realm of femininity, the flight of the sated mortal from the cloying surfeit of pleasure, and the utter weariness of life when every wish is dead, when the spirit is exhausted and the flame is cold upon the heart's hearth. How much of those fancies is to be found in the extreme elaboration of the composer, and just where, the listener must guess for himself. The score was tremendously discussed when first produced, a decade ago, and it has been frequently heard in Boston since that time. The analysis generally conclude that it should represent a sensuous period succeeded by a sorrowful one, while some have endeavored to identify some special themes—two for Don Juan, one for Zerlina, one for Donna Anna, and one for a carnival of worldly pleasures.

There will be a soloist, but, although, according to the usual habit, this should be a vocalist, another pianist will be heard, the choice having fallen upon Mr. Frederick Larnard. This gentleman, born at Glasgow in 1868, began his musical career at home, his brother being his first teacher. He set out with the piano and organ, with the violin for a secondary interest. He then went to Germany and studied systematically in the Frankfort Conservatory and under private teachers Von Bulow and Liszt being among them. He took up concert work at Berlin in 1885, and has followed it since with distinguished success, having found peculiar favor in Russia and in France. For this Boston appearance he takes the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, in E flat, opus 73, which belongs to its composer's freest, happiest and richest period. It is great and grand, and is to be undertaken by no artist who does not feel himself masterful in the expression of deep, dignified emotion, as well as of stately, noble and worthily wrought art. The solo part presents itself in simple splendor, and never degenerates, even when most brilliant, while the orchestra is a combining and co-operative force, not a mere accompaniment, a purveyor to themes to be adorned and dallied with by the pianoforte.

Mr. Henderson in the New York Sun of Nov. 7 paid this tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its performance on Thursday:

As for Mr. Gerিকে and his men, they were in fine fettle. They played the Brahms symphony with wondrous beauty of tone, with exquisite balance of parts, with delicious voicing of the inner parts, and with an understanding and a feeling that left nothing to be desired. When they came to the Strauss music they played with magnificent spirit, with a brilliant virtuosity that was dazzling, and with a warmth of color and mood seldom shown by this refined and generally repressed orchestra. It was a superb performance, ushering in the seventeenth season in this city in a most inspiring manner.

FOR SYMPHONY SEAT M 15—Centre Aisle, Floor. To be given up after Nov. 14th. Apply by mail to S. B. H., 1684 Beacon St., Brookline. WS[A] n 5

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Two seats in D, on floor, left of centre; will be sold at sacrifice. Address 74 Pleasant street, Brookline, Telephone 551, Brookline. WSto[A] n 5

SYMPHONY CONCERTS Two excellent seats in first balcony, second row, less than cost; sold singly, if desired; $19 each. Address A. F. F., Boston Transcript. [A]

WELCOMED IN NEW YORK.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Inaugurates Its 17th Season with Lamond as Soloist.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 6, 1902. In Carnegie Hall tonight the Boston Symphony orchestra inaugurated its 17th season in New York with a performance in every respect worthy of the brilliant and honorable traditions of the organization. The audience which greeted the orchestra's return was one limited only by the building's capacity, and appreciated in the most intelligent sense the programme matter. In all that was played, it is hard to find an over measure of praise for the work of the men from Boston. Perhaps it is the sufferings of the late Mascagni opera season, but the band in all its departments has never sounded better, more refined or more exquisitely balanced. The soloist was Frederic Lamond, the Scotch pianist, for whom the concert served as an American debut. Mr. Lamond comes to this hearing with unimpeachable credentials, and he was tonight listened to with approval.

by no means always the most distinguished way—with the of the first two measures of the last movement, which or other he made quite unis no particular compliment to say that he knows the pianoforte; undoubtedly he too, now and then a certain temperament, which has of seeming a little too volun in his playing of the con day evening I could find to put him in the class elat his press notices. Do no meaning: I have heard the, certo played much worse, but this is not the sort of r richochet that one expects whom one has been led something like a new era playing. Perhaps Mr. La know what has been circ by his agents; if so, it is h to see to it that the pub led to expect such Titan Why, Rubinstein himself co played up to the reputati made beforehand for Mr. I

The next programme, for noon, Nov. 14, and Saturda 15 (there will be neither re cert this week), is: Rimsky-Planée du Tsar" (first concerto for violin; Bizet, sienne" No. 1; Beethoven, s in B-flat major. Miss M will be the solo violinist.

SANDERS THEATRE

The Boston Symphon

70 Performers
MR. WILHELM GERICKI

TEN CON

Thursday Evenings, October 1, December 4, December 18, January 12, March 12, April 2.

SOLO ARTIST

Miss HELEN HENSCHER, NI, Miss WINIFRED SMITH, ROOY, Mme. BLOOMFIELD CARL STASNY, Mr. GEORGI Miss MAUD MacCARTHY, Mr and others to be announced.

Season Tickets for the ten con on sale at the University Books [A]

SYMPHONY 2 VERY DE
REHEARSALS Singly if de
2074, Boston.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
desirable Floor Seats for half each. Address B. A. O., Boston [A]

Symphonies

Season t —Single
$1.50.
Music H
SW[A]

FREDERIC LAMOND.

NEXT season New York is to enjoy the playing of a very distinguished piano virtuoso, Frederic Lamond, of Scotland. This artist, like d'Albert, was born in Glasgow, and also, like d'Albert, is one of the foremost interpreters of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. Great Britain has never given birth to such a brilliant and scholarly player as Lamond. He is only thirty-four, being born January 28, 1868. His brother David was his first teacher. In 1880 he became organist of Laurieston parish church, and took violin lessons of H. C. Cooper in Glasgow; 1882 saw the young musician in Frankfort, at the Raff Conservatorium, where he studied piano with Schwarz, composition with Urspruch and violin with Heermann. From 1884 to 1885 he enjoyed the good fortune of von Bülow's instruction, and from 1885 to 1886 he was with Liszt at Weimar and Rome.

The fruits of this intense study under such world renowned masters were soon forthcoming. Lamond made a more than successful début at Berlin November 17, 1885, and gave concerts later in Vienna, Glasgow and London. He made Germany his home, traveling to Russia (1896), France (1899), Holland and Belgium, attracting marked critical and public attention by his intellectual and brilliant playing. Lamond is a von Bülow with the fiery style and force of a Rubinstein. He reads Bach, Beethoven and Brahms sympathetically, and in Liszt and Chopin and the newer men he is equally marvelous. A dazzling technique, sonorous tone, great power, musical sensibility and extraordinary memory qualify him as one of our phenomenal modern pianists. And his personality always wins for him the suffrages of his audiences.

He has not been idle in the creative field. There is a Symphony in A, composed 1899; an overture, "Aus dem Schottischen Hochlande" (1895); a piano trio; eight piano pieces, op. 1; a sonata for 'cello and piano, op. 2, and chamber music and songs.

A few of Mr. Lamond's newspaper critiques will furnish interesting reading; besides, they will throw light on his versatile performances in various countries:

We frequently felt last night as if a second Beethoven were seated at the piano, as if there gazed on us from out the lineaments of rhythm and melody a countenance full of infinite pathos and ineffable majesty, as if there spake to us in every tone a mystic speech, unique, unknown to mortal ears. It was thoroughly Beethovenian! We are well aware that when we say this we say a great deal. But we cannot say less. Even today, as we write these lines we feel ourselves still under the immediate influence of that remarkable playing. Every tone of that marvellous music still throbs and thrills in our inmost being, as if we had heard it but now. And every one of yesterday's audience will, I believe, be able to give the same testimony and declare that the impression they received was extraordinary, fascinating, deeply affecting.—Die Allgemeine Zeitung, Munich.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Brahms' Third Symphony in F Major
—Frederick Larnard, Pianist,
Will Be the Soloist.

Mr. Gerlicke's third programme is straightforward enough, surely. It includes no overture, but it admits for its final number the noisy and pompous, but neither dignified nor ceremonial, "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner. The symphony, which is put at the head of the programme, will be Brahms' third, in F major, and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," will also be performed. The symphony, from having been pronounced when first heard in Boston dry, dull, hard, laborious and ungenial, has come to be regarded with more friendly warmth than almost any of the others which Brahms wrote. It would not be his if it were not more logical than frank, more learned than melodious; but it is seldom abstruse or remote, and the character of each movement is easily grasped and held. The first is strong and broad, and not without a happy coloring; the andante, resting on an obvious contrast of themes and manners, is simple and endearing; the third is slender, light and sweet, with a touch of plaintiveness, and the finale inclines to be grandiose, but changes delicately as it closes from the minor to the major mode.

As for the "Don Juan," it is one of the most puzzling of what Mr. Henderson calls Strauss' "tone riddles." It sets out, apparently, from the chief thoughts of three passages in Lanau's poem, the wide and magical realm of femininity, the flight of the sated mortal from the cloying surfeit of pleasure, and the utter weariness of life when every wish is dead, when the spirit is exhausted and the flame is cold upon the heart's hearth. How much of those fancies is to be found in the extreme elaboration of the composer, and just where, the listener must guess for himself. The score was tremendously discussed when first produced, a decade ago, and it has been frequently heard in Boston since that time. The analysis generally conclude that it should represent a sensuous period succeeded by a sorrowful one, while some have endeavored to identify some special themes—two for Don Juan, one for Zerlina, one for Donna Anna, and one for a carnival of worldly pleasures.

There will be a soloist, but, although, according to the usual habit, this should be a vocalist, another pianist will be heard, the choice having fallen upon Mr. Frederick Larnard. This gentleman, born at Glasgow in 1868, began his musical career at home, his brother being his first teacher. He set out with the piano and organ, with the violin for a secondary interest. He then went to Germany and studied systematically in the Frankfort Conservatory and under private teachers Von Bulow and Liszt being among them. He took up concert work at Berlin in 1885, and has followed it since with distinguished success, having found peculiar favor in Russia and in France. For this Boston appearance he takes the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, in E flat, opus 73, which belongs to its composer's freest, happiest and richest period. It is great and grand, and is to be undertaken by no artist who does not feel himself masterful in the expression of deep, dignified emotion, as well as of stately, noble and worthily wrought art. The solo part presents itself in simple splendor, and never degenerates, even when most brilliant, while the orchestra is a combining and co-operative force, not a mere accompaniment, a purveyor to themes to be adorned and dallied with by the pianoforte.

Mr. Henderson in the New York Sun of Nov. 7 paid this tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its performance on Thursday:

As for Mr. Gerlicke and his men, they were in fine fettle. They played the Brahms symphony with wondrous beauty of tone, with exquisite balance of parts, with delicious voicing of the inner parts, and with an understanding and a feeling that left nothing to be desired. When they came to the Strauss music they played with magnificent spirit, with a brilliant virtuosity that was dazzling, and with a warmth of color and mood seldom shown by this refined and generally repressed orchestra. It was a superb performance, ushering in the seventeenth season in this city in a most inspiring manner.

FOR SALE Symphony Seat M 15—Center Aisle, Floor. To be given up after Nov. 14th. Apply by mail to S. B. H., 1684 Beacon St., Brookline. WS[A] n 5

FOR SALE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Two seats in D, on floor, left of centre; will be sold at sacrifice. Address 74 Pleasant street, Brookline, Telephone 551, Brookline. WSto[A] n 5

SYMPHONY CONCERTS Two excellent seats in first balcony, second row, less than cost; sold singly, if desired; $19 each. Address A. F. F., Boston Transcript. [A]

WELCOMED IN NEW YORK.

Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its 17th Season with Lamond as Soloist.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 6, 1902. In Carnegie Hall tonight the Boston Symphony orchestra inaugurated its 17th season in New York with a performance in every respect worthy of the brilliant and honorable traditions of the organization. The audience which greeted the orchestra's return was one limited only by the building's capacity, and appreciated in the most intelligent sense the programme matter. In all that was played, it is hard to find an over measure of praise for the work of the men from Boston. Perhaps it is the sufferings of the late Mascagni opera season, but the band in all its departments has never sounded better, more refined or more exquisitely balanced. The soloist was Frederic Lamond, the Scotch pianist, for whom the concert served as an American debut. Mr. Lamond comes to this hearing with unimpeachable credentials, and he was tonight listened to with approval.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

HANS HUBER'S NEW SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its seventeenth season in New York on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, giving a second concert on Saturday afternoon. In this connection a few statistics will be of interest. The first concert given by the Boston Orchestra in this city was on Feb. 14, 1887; the performance on Thursday evening will be the one thousand nine hundred and ninety-sixth in the twenty-one years of its existence, and its ninety-eighth in New York. These seventeen years have given the orchestra a secure place in the hearts of New York music lovers. Following are the programmes of the two concerts:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90.....Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 15.....Beethoven
Tone-poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Richard Strauss
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major, Op. 72.....Beethoven

Soloist, Mr. Frederic Lamond.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Carnival Roman".....Berlioz
Grand Fantasia in C major, ("Wanderer") Op. 15.....Schubert
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Symphony in E minor, Op. 115, (first time).....Hans Huber

Soloist, Mr. Raoul Pugno.

The symphony of Hans Huber is his third, and is among his latest compositions. It is one of the first of his important works to be heard in this city, where he has hitherto been known chiefly through his smaller pieces for violin, piano, &c. He is a Swiss, fifty years old, a graduate of Leipzig, and now a resident of Basel, where he is the director of a music school. That Herr Huber is inclined toward programme music is shown by the fact that his second symphony is inscribed with the name of William Tell, and that the one to be played by Mr. Gericke this week he intended originally to celebrate the life and work of Arnold Böcklin, the distinguished German painter, who died about two years ago. He thought better of it, apparently, and the symphony now stands without title or suggestion as to its interpretation. Mr. Philip Hale, in his analysis of the composition, has told what the composer's original intentions are supposed to have been. The chief theme of the first movement, reappearing in other parts of the work under different guises, was to be the "Böcklin" theme; others denoted different pictures of the artist, or subjects of which he was fond. The finale is a set of variations that was to be entitled "Metamorphoses, Suggested by Böcklin's Pictures," nine in all. Böcklin was a painter of high imaginative power, fond of the fountains and cypresses of Italy and "the gleaming marbles and golden myths of Greece," of "peopling sea or sky, shore or wood, with creatures of tradition or of sheer imagination," as a recent critic has said of him. It may be understood how his romantic treatment of classical subjects should appeal to the fancy of a composer. It may well be doubted, however, whether the attempt to deliver to a listener an exact transcript through sounds of the many moods of innumerable pictures would not be a burden and a distraction. Herr Huber's discretion is to be commended.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Symphony by Hans Huber Heard Here for the First Time.

A Programme That the Composer Thought Better Of—Mr. Pugno Schubert's Fantasy.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall before an audience as large and as entirely sympathetic as that which heard the concert on Thursday night. That the musical public of New York has unreservedly given itself over to the intelligent appreciation of Mr. Gericke's organization, and relies upon it for some of the most stimulating enjoyment of the musical season, is happily shown by the size of these audiences, which were as numerous as the hall could contain. Their numbers have greatly increased over those of last year, as last year marked a large gain over those of the year before. These facts are significant because of the public understanding they imply of the supreme excellences of the Boston Orchestra, which are unique. The attitude observable at these concerts is not one of indiscriminating surrender, nor of unreserved acceptance of everything that is done, but of candid appraisal, for it is an audience of as fine critical taste as any that listens to orchestral playing anywhere.

The programme yesterday was notable as containing a symphony entirely new to this public, the work of Hans Huber. He is a composer and director living in Basel, Switzerland, from whom nothing of importance has ever been heard here, although this is the third published work in the symphonic form. It is serious music, of ambitious striving, and contains much to interest and, in a few places, really to stir the listener. That it will ever keep a place high among the works of modern composers may be doubted, for with all its ingenuity and fine workmanship, its effectiveness, and formal beauty, it lacks the spark of genius.

As Mr. Philip Hale, in his interesting description of it in the programme book informs us, it was the composer's original intention to make this music a celebration of the genius of the Swiss artist, Arnold Böcklin, who delighted to paint the open air scenes peopled by the Greeks with strange, half-seen beings, and let his imagination run riot in fantasies of the natural beauty and the golden myths of Greece, seen through the eyes of the modern romantic spirit. The symphony was to picture moods summoned up by the pictures of this master, and was thus, so to speak, to be a glorification of his work in tones.

Herr Huber has thought better of it, however, and of all this scheme has left no trace on the printed score, but the inscription of the series of variations which forms the finale, as "Metamorphoses, suggested by pictures by Böcklin." No pictures are specified, but before the composer changed his mind evidently, the industrious analysts gained access more or less accurately to his intentions and have put on record for the benefit of those who set store by verbal interpretation of music, just what pictures the different movements, sections and even some of the themes represent.

It is a little annoying to find that these doctors do not agree; as, for instance, whether one theme of the first movement is the "Böcklin" theme or the "meadow" theme. There would seem to be a difference—at any rate, if musical ideas were really as definitely representative of external things as the programme musicians would have us believe.

Herr Huber has done the wise thing in sweeping away this structure of definite and detailed interpretation—a structure that could in the nature of things be little more than a scaffolding upon which the builder worked—and presenting his symphony, with the exception noted, for what it is as music, and not as an expression of something else that has already been expressed otherwise. There is embarrassment enough when a composer tracks a purely poetic idea along devious paths that the listener must follow to understand him.

When he insists upon a knowledge and appreciation of paintings that are scattered through the public and private galleries of Europe he is really going a step beyond the limits of reason. Must the general audience, who cannot be expected to know all or many of a particular artist's works—especially a trans-Atlantic audience to whom, as a whole, they are quite unfamiliar—first visualize the commentator's descriptions of the pictures, and then turn its attention to fitting this second-hand impression to the music as it is unfolded to the ear?

It was doubtless some such consideration that influenced the composer of the "Böcklin" symphony to let it be, finally, a symphony merely, with but a hint. If the pictures of Böcklin have been serviceable to him in creating moods leading him to self-expression in terms of music, their work is done. The symphony is quite able to stand by itself, and as music it is admirable. It is especially interesting to the student for its ingenious utilization of many technical devices in the elaboration and development of the themes and for the skillful and effective scoring for the orchestra. As we have said, there is something lacking that no technical mastery can compensate for—the touch of sacred fire.

Such, with all the admiration that the symphony can command, is the impression of the whole. It is derived more specifically from the character of some of the thematic material. A considerable part of it is employed to a certain degree in common through the various movements, though with modification and amplification. Much of it is vague in outline and without pregnant significance; the first movement, most elaborate of the four, suffers from this especially. Some of it, as in the scherzo, approaches dangerously near the trivial. The adagio is impressive with a certain largeness of style; in the variations the composer's fancy is delightfully and ingeniously employed.

M. Pugno, the soloist, played Liszt's amplification of Schubert's so-called "Wanderer" fantasy for pianoforte and orchestral accompaniment. It is one of the pieces that has served before to give the most favorable impression of M. Pugno's powers. He plays it with poetry, with a fund of romantic feeling, yet without sentimental exaggeration; and gives a tempestuous and powerfully wrought climax in the last movement. We still miss in this performance one of the most important resources of the pianist's art that is not at M. Pugno's disposition, the graduated scale of dynamic nuance; but there is much to be forgiven him, first for playing this beautiful composition that other pianists neglect unduly, and second for entering so sincerely into its spirit.

The orchestra played Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture with an effulgent brilliancy that did much to beguile the mind as to the essential poverty and vulgarity of the musical ideas of the composition. Yet even such a performance cannot conceal the further fact that even the instrumentation no longer seems what it once did—that its flitter is beginning to show tinsel and its keenness to rasp with a wire edge. There was also Saint-Saens's ingenious symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," exquisitely set forth.

TWO SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS FOR SALE for balance of season for $43 for both. Please address E. D. G., Boston Transcript. 3t[A] n 6

FOR SALE TWO SEATS FOR SAT. EVE. SYMPHONY CONCERTS in a good position may be secured for $19 a seat. Address V. F. R., Boston Transcript. 3t[A] n 6

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS in first row of second balcony are for sale; price $16.50 each. Address L. C. B., Boston Transcript. 3t[A] n 6

Symphony Rehearsal TICKET for sale. Floor W 4. Address V. F. R., Boston Transcript.

FOR SALE SYMPHONY CONCERT 1st BALCONY. At a Bargain. Address A. V. N., Boston Transcript. 4t[A] n 12

FOR SALE SYMPHONY SEAT M, No. 15. This seat is for centre aisle, at a sacrifice. Address 1684 Beacon street, or Phone 306-3, Brookline, Mass. WS[A] n 12

REHEARSAL SEATS W 14 15—Price $32.00 EACH for the seats, as owner cannot use. M. C. J., Boston Transcript. [A]

Symphony Concert SEATS Floor CC 20, 21 for sale for $21 each. Please address H. K. H., Boston Transcript. [A]

2 Sat. Eve. Symphony Concert Seats In first balcony A3, 4, centre, may be secured for $19 each. Address C. K. C., Boston Transcript. [A]

SYMPHONY TICKET FOR SALE. Sat. floor, 12th row, H. H. PIKE, 36 Lee street, Cambridge. [A]

2 BALCONY REHEARSAL SEATS Numbered B 7, 8, left side. Price $31 each. C 2, Herald Office.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS Floor CC 20, 21, for sale. Price $21 each. Please address D 2, Herald Office.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The program for the third Symphony rehearsal and concert had for soloist Mr. Frederic Lamond, who played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for pianoforte. The other numbers were Brahms' third symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." Beethoven's great piano concerto has had but two or three performances in this city in recent years, the work is of such noble proportions for the orchestra as well as the solo instrument that pianists as a rule "shy" at this composition and prefer to be heard in something less profound and more brilliant. Mr. Lamond is credited with being an efficient interpreter of Beethoven, and his efforts in the concerto certainly indicated that the artist was a lover of the master's works, and in this one at least he reflected the composer's ideas simply and without exaggeration.

Mr. Lamond is a serious musician who should appeal to the best musical public. He is entirely free from affectation and his interpretation is scholarly, rather than inspired. His reading of the concerto was wholly appreciative of the part the piano was assigned in the score, and at no time was the soloist unduly in evidence. His technique is of the highest order; he has a beautiful quality in cantabile passages, his style of playing is refined and very graceful and in all ways he appears to be thoroughly equipped for his work. Next week Mr. Lamond will have wider scope in a recital program and the artist's abilities can then be better judged. Mr. Lamond's reception was most cordial from the orchestra as well as auditors.

In the Brahms symphony the peculiar, and at times discordant, cross harmonies of the first movement were given smoothly by the contesting instruments, the tonal values being carefully preserved and the themes carried with just the right predominance as they rose or fell according to the composer's indications. Here the clarinet and oboe appeared advantageously and the setting forth of the so-called "device" was harmoniously accomplished by the brass and wood wind contingents.

In the second and third parts the elaborate variations and the ode syncopated measures, the latter played by the cellos, possibly call for special mention; the first for splendid ensemble work and the latter for the precision in execution. The finale, with its lighter ornamental character that gradually develops into fortissimo passages and then returns to the more joyous theme, was played very sympathetically. Mr. Gericke controlling the band perfectly through all the mazes of lights and shades of the closing movement.

The "Don Juan" poem by Richard Strauss admits of several interpretations, and which one of the series of pictures ascribed to the music is to be considered correct is yet an open question. The work is bold in treatment, chaotic, startling and original in many ways and it was played with due effect. The Wagner "Kaisermarsch" calls for no special mention, the performance being of the usual standard and the number isn't very interesting and hardly deserves its high-sounding title.

There will be no concerts this week. The young American violinist, Miss Maud MacCarthy, will make her appearance as soloist next week. The program will comprise "La Fiancee du Tzar," Rimsky-Korsakoff, first time here; concerto for violin, Brahms; suite, "L'Arlésienne," Bizet, and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

1902
THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 2000th concert last week at Hartford, Conn., Footguard Hall, Nov. 11. This event should have been celebrated with pomp and circumstance in Boston, for it is rare if not unique in the history of orchestras of such rank.

I was present at the 3000th Blise concert in the Concert-Haus, Berlin, on Dec. 12, 1882, and that anniversary was the cause of much eating and drinking as well as music. About 850 of the 3000 concerts corresponded to what we know as Symphony concerts of the most serious nature; 2000 were of a more popular nature; there were 130 "Composers and virtuosos evenings," 10 "monster" concerts; five "Court" concerts, and there was one performance of an oratorio.

FREDERICK LAMOND.

59

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Tzar."
(First time.)

BRAHMS, CONCERTO in D major for VIOLIN, op. 77.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

BIZET, SUITE, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1.
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.

BEETHOVEN, SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.
I. Adagio. — Allegro vivace.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro vivace. — Trio: un poco meno Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

Soloist:

Miss MAUD MacCARTHY.

MAUD MACCARTHY.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Tzar."
(First time.)

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO in D major for VIOLIN, op. 77.

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

BIZET,

SUITE, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1.

I. Prelude.

II. Minuetto.

III. Adagietto.

IV. Carillon.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

I. Adagio. — Allegro vivace.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro vivace. — Trio: un poco meno Allegro.

IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

Soloist:

Miss MAUD MacCARTHY.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Includes a New Overture and Introduces a New Violinist.

The Symphony rehearsal and concert of this week will open with an overture new to Boston, "The Tsar's Fiancee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff. This represents neither programme nor problem, being simply a straight, old-fashioned curtain-raiser, designed to serve the usual purpose of getting an audience into the way of quiet attention before the drama begins, and giving them a taste of what they may expect. This particular opera, composed for Russia, as its title indicates, has had some home success, we understand, but neither its subject nor its score would be likely to carry it beyond the frontier.

The symphony will be Beethoven's fourth, in which a warm, hearty, happy spirit prevails more consistently than in any of his others. It was next after the "Eroica" in order of completion, and it yields nothing to that in fulness, beauty and spontaneity, although it does not repeat its state, majesty of solemn depth.

The other orchestral number will be the favorite suite arranged for the concert room by Bizet from the illustrative music he wrote for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." In this, as the reader may remember, the young Frederi comes to grief through falling in love with a fascinating damsel of Arles, who has an improper and obnoxious past; but he manages to get out of his scrape, after a fashion. The prelude rests chiefly on a traditional rural march theme, with which a pastoral contrast is made, and it is followed by a minuet, a sentimental little adagio and a picturesque, reassuring carillon.

The fourth number will be the Brahms violin concerto in D, written by him in 1877 or '78, produced originally by Joachim in 1879, and for some years used by almost nobody else, although it is now in every virtuoso's repertory. It is difficult, learned and none too well calculated for a display piece, because the solo part is often practically merged in the ensemble, and the player cannot so detach himself from his environment as to give his skill and style so much prominence as they deserve. This week's player will be a stranger—Miss Maud MacCarthy, a young Irish lady, of whose personal charm, true talent and well established art foreign report speaks goldenly. When she first ventured upon a public career her clear insight and her sense of musicianly dignity were much commented upon, as now she is credited with having matured in strength, spirit and art.

NING, NOVEMBER 17, 1902.

adv:

INTEREST AT THE SYMPHONY CENTERED IN VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The concert began with our weekly Russian. Almost each symphony concert now presents something worth while from the land of the Muscovite. Taken as a whole the Russian orchestral school is superior to the new German, for what it lacks in supreme mastery of scoring it makes up for by better coherency and more tangible melody. The Russian composers are so steeped in their wealth of folk-song that they do not discard melody in their advanced orchestral works, and where a Strauss or a Bruckner gives us a glittering array of fragments, a Glazounov or a Rimsky-Korsakoff presents clear themes and something of melodic beauty. This was emphatically the case with the overture which began the concert, "The betrothed of the Tzar," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which won applause almost to the encore point, and deserved it for its pomp and splendor, its brusquerie, and its neat development.

The programme was as follows:

"La Fiancee du Tzar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)

Concerto for Violin.....Brahms
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

Interest centered in the new violinist. Miss Maud MacCarthy is certainly a great artist, although yet very young. One might deem it impossible for a girl not yet 20 to play such a broad work as Brahms' violin concerto; it used to be believed that only veterans could storm those musical heights. But Miss MacCarthy played the ascetic work with something more than mere correctness; she gave breadth and meaning to some of its abstruse points, there was artistic intelligence back of her phenomenal technique. The cadenza of the first movement was full of quaint surprises, but was not as brilliant as the cadenza we have heard in the work in its recent Boston performances. A word of praise is due to the performance of the charming oboe melody of the Adagio, the most directly pleasing part of the whole work. The finale was brilliantly interpreted, but even Miss MacCarthy could not give piquancy where it did not exist: the "Allegro Giocoso" is about as Joco as Hamilton's essay on "Quaternions," or Kant on "Axiomatic Principles."

At the close of the work the wildest enthusiasm burst forth, and the young artist was called and recalled over and over again. She certainly deserved the tribute, although we would rather have heard her in some less phenomenal and more agreeable concertos. The number of great violin concertos, however, is about as restricted as that of great oratorios, there is the Beethoven, that tapers off like a mermaid into a rather inconsequential ending; there is the Medelssohn concerto, the visiting card of many a young violinist; there is the Bruch G-minor, and this sober work of Brahms,—"et volia tout!" Therefore, we must expect ("faute de mieux") to hear the last-named long and complex work more often than we care for. The Brahms symphonies and the two piano-concertos seem to us infinitely more interesting.

The ascetic quality of the concerto was emphasized by bringing the juicy Bizet directly after Brahms,—a busy B of totally different character. Bulow spoke of only three great Bs in music (Each, Beethoven and Brahms), but Nietzsche made exaggerated amends by placing Bizet at the head of the entire modern school. Without going to such hazardous lengths one must confess that Bizet is always thoroughly enjoyable, and if one has read "L'Arlesienne," and remembers the scenes which are illumined by the beautiful music, one recognizes that the Suite is quite as graphic as it is charming.

The March and its variations were given with astonishing vigor. One may remember that this does not exhaust the treatment of the opening theme, for in another part of the work (not given in this first suite) there is an ingenious canon in the octave made out of the melody, and it is also combined with a Farandole very skillfully. The entire suite was played with a heartiness that suited its rustic side perfectly. Would that we might have the tender Idyl given in Boston some time, in French (it never ought to be upset into any other tongue), with the Boston symphony orchestra giving the incidental music!

Now came Beethoven (another of the Bs) in the shape of the fourth symphony, the work which caused Weber to suggest that the composer ought to be confined in a lunatic asylum. One need not chronicle the well-known effects here, but one can praise the canon between clarinette and bassoon (subordinate theme of first movement), the great crescendo at the end of the development with its duet of kettle-drums and violins, the perfect accenting of the syncopations of the minuet, and the clear playing of the contrabasses in the final coda.

This last passage is something phenomenally difficult and one seldom hears it well done. It was this passage that caused Weber to write a sarcastic screed in the "Cecilia" (a musical journal of that time), wherein he pictured the musical instruments coming to life and holding an indignation meeting against the "new composer;" the rioters were finally awed into silence by the threat, spoken by the janitor of the music hall, that if they made any more fuss Mr. Beethoven would write another symphony! Poor Beethoven could not fight, in the Weber style, with a rapier; his only weapon was a club. He responded with oaths and Billingsgate—and went on writing symphonies; giving an equally difficult passage to the contrabasses in his very next work of this form.

Louis C. Elson.

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—First Appearance Here of Miss Maud MacCarthy, Violinist—Mascagni and His Men in Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gerlicke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Betrothal of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Violin concerto.....Brahms
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 1.....Bizet
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

The overture of Rimsky-Korsakoff is a prelude to an opera which was produced at Moscow in 1899. The Russian critics told us at the time that the overture did not correspond to the dramatic quality of the opera itself. It is frankly a theatre overture, and as such it is not to be ranked among the important or the characteristic works of this Russian, who is first of all a colorist. He needs a fantastical subject to quicken his imagination, as Berlioz demanded a great one. Give him Antar in the desert, Sadko fiddling to the dwellers in the palace under the waters of the sea, Scheherazade telling her wondrous and immortal tales; or ask him to put into music the brilliance and rhythm of Spain (as in his Spanish Caprice which richly deserves a performance at these concerts) and he will paint gorgeous orchestral pictures. But here we have something that comes merely before the rise of a curtain which does not rise for us. It is sparkling, entertaining music, deftly put together and agreeably scored; a light overture for once without wet wings.

The suite from "L'Arlésienne" is always welcome, for it is in its way a masterpiece, and it deserves thoughtful and painstaking consideration in the performance.

The Minuetto and the Adagietto were played with exquisite finish and fitting sentiment. The opening theme of the Prelude and the Variations were also admirably played; but the remarkable section of the Prelude that introduces the theme of the poor Innocent, the boy with the sleeping soul, who awakens to intelligence only at the catastrophe, when his brother Frédéric kills himself for love, was without mystery; there was no expression of the twilight of a soul. The music was too much in the open, too much in noon light. I do not refer merely to the absence of saxophone color. I am speaking of the whole effect. Where was that recurring sigh of the clarinet, that should haunt the hearer? Where was the sombre, spectral melody, as the voice of a lamenting ghost? And in the finale of the Prelude, which is developed from the typical theme of Frédéric there should have been more restlessness, more fever in the pace. But as a whole the Suite gave much pleasure.

Miss Maud MacCarthy made her first appearance in Boston. She is a talented young violinist, who evidently has not the fear of Brahms before her eyes, for she played his concerto as though it were really music of flesh and blood, and not cryptic, not something that is only for the elect. She played with an individual warmth that was soon contagious; she played with power, beauty of tone and phrasing, and with a mixture of mature judgment and youthful enthusiasm. If it be true that lost souls who in this world found an unhallowed joy in the music of Richard Strauss, Tchaikowsky and the ultra-modern French and Russian composers will be forced in the next to hear endless repetitions of the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms, then Miss MacCarthy may well be the compassionate spirit who will make the punishment as light as possible. Last night she was recalled again and again.

There is little to be said about a performance of a Beethoven Symphony by this orchestra. Yet when one of these symphonies is not heard too often, there is always something to say about the work itself. Last night one of the chief impressions was that of the supreme power of Beethoven in awakening anticipation, and this by apparently simple means, as in the first movement during the long crescendo that leads to the re-establishment of the chief tonality. No one with all the audacity of modern harmony or legions of instruments has so paralleled in music the uneasy hush before some perturbation of nature.

The program of next Saturday will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; aria from "Hans Heiling," sung by Mr. Van Rooy; Dvorak's Symphonic Variations; Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Charm from "Die Walkure," with Mr. Van Rooy as Wotan.

Philip Hale.

FOR SALE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKET
1st BALCONY. At a Bargain.
Address A. V. N., Boston Transcript. n 12

TWO SYMPHONY In Desirable Location.
REHEARSAL SEATS FOR SALE at a low price.
[A] Address L. R. D., Boston Transcript.

TWO SATURDAY EVENING On Floor for
Symphony Concert Seats
for the remainder of the season for $17.50 each.
[A] Address V. K. R., Boston Transcript.

FOR SALE SYMPHONY SEAT M. No. 15.
This seat is for centre aisle, at a sacrifice. Address 1684 Beacon street, or Phone 306-3, Brookline, Mass. WS[A] n 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS (2). Best location, for sale at a great sacrifice.
Friday concerts. Apply to Miss LENA ROBERTSON, Room 63, No. 8 Beacon st. [A]:

$40 for Symphony Ticket Rehearsal, M 15, floor. Address A. N. K., Boston Transcript. [A]:

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Trans:

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Last Saturday evening came the fourth Symphony concert at Symphony Hall, the programme being as follows:

Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff: Overture to "Zarskaja nevyesta." (First time in Boston.)
Johannes Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 77.
Georges Bizet: Suite, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1.
Ludwig van Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.

Miss Maud MacCarthy was the solo violinist.

A capital programme, one to be enjoyed all through. Rimsky-Korsakoff's new overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Czar," is a brilliant, characteristic comedy overture; not revealing great emotional depth, not even emotional vehemence, but full of charm, elaborate enough to be interesting, spontaneous enough to be sympathetic. The composer is one of the few out-and-out Russians who distil something beside gloom from the national cast of melody, and show us Samoeidic music without her scowl. No Frenchman could be more charming than he, when in the mood, and few Frenchmen so unself-consciously so. Beauty of coloring may be taken as a matter of course; Rimsky-Korsakoff is a tone-painter who has not only a brilliant palette but is a born and bred colorist to boot. The piece was excellently played.

Bizet's first "Arlésienne" suite was exceedingly beautifully played, except in the Andante molto in A-flat major in the Prelude—the "Innocent" theme. Since Mr. Theodore Thomas gave it here, years ago, no one has given this movement quite the acrid-sweet tuberoso aroma he did. To my mind, Mr. Gerlicke does not take it quite slow enough; then, the clarinetist who played the ever-recurring "sigh" found no sigh at all in it, but merely a succession of four notes. The main melody was played on a clarinet instead of a saxophone, which took most of the ghostliness out of it; neither do I think it was wise to give this melody to the first player, and the "sigh" to the second; secondary as the "sigh" may seem, it needs the better playing, the more poetic feeling of the two. As for the saxophone, it is somewhat curious that its tone alone, its peculiar clang-tint, connects the music with the idiot boy in the play; there is nothing in the music itself to express, or suggest, vacancy of any sort. Play the saxophone melody on a clarinet and the movement seems to express, more than anything else, what Mephistopheles says in Gounod's "Faust" (I have only the Italian copy with me to quote from): "E voi fior d'olezzo sottile, tutti vi facela aprir la mia man meledetta!" I cannot help saying all this about the little movement, for it has always seemed to me one of the most original and altogether wonderful things Bizet, or anyone, ever wrote.

But all the rest of the suite was admirably played. Never has the tricky little "waltz-minuet" sounded more deftly nimble; beautiful, too, was the phrasing of the whole expression, in the Adagietto. Carillon, as usual, carried everything before it.

Beethoven's B-flat symphony, too, was superbly given; a wee bit magisterially, perhaps, in the Adagio—there were moments when one could have wished for a little less of self-restraint—but with the finest clearness and grace of phrasing, with due recognition of the high poetic plane on which the music moves.

When I first saw Miss MacCarthy's name down for the Brahms concerto, I felt rather like repeating mentally what a noted young violinist of her sex once said about Beethoven's violin concerto: "Oh! to play the Beethoven concerto you must have gray hair!" And this was pretty much the state of mind in which I awaited Miss MacCarthy's performance last Saturday evening. Not at all the right state of mind, as the young violinist triumphantly proved to me before she had done. Even after the first movement, instead of thinking of gray hair, I could not but recall what a certain noted American musician once said of a performance of Brahms's "Erste Lieder" by a famous baritone: "If he had not sung them with such tremendous expression, there would not have been a dry eye in the house!" To come down to a definite point, there is a vast essential difference between Beethoven and Brahms—although both names begin with B, and both composers join hands with Bach in the late Hans von Bülow's "musical creed." Of course, when I say that there is a vast essential difference between Beethoven and Brahms, I do not mean to emphasize a truism which any conservatory pupil could have enunciated as well as I. I wish to point out a certain psychological difference between the two men, both of whom were exceedingly profound intellectually as well as emotionally, a difference which is revealed by the curious fact that, the profounder Beethoven becomes, the more difficult is his music to conceive and perform aright, whereas, the profounder Brahms gets, the more does his music play itself—that is, the less does it need in the way of interpretation. When Brahms is at his greatest, the best that can be done for him is to play the notes right, with good phrasing and tone, with a certain general fervor, but without any highly specialized emotion; he has this in common with Palestrina, the Gabriellis, Orlando Lasso, and the great sixteenth century contrapuntists in general, that his scores pretty nearly express themselves, and leave comparatively little to be read between the lines. In playing Brahms there is far greater danger of doing too much than too little. With Beethoven, on the other hand, you are beset by the double difficulty of doing enough and doing the right thing, at that. All of which means that Brahms's violin concerto is much more playable by a girl of eighteen than I had at first supposed. Of course, you can say that Miss MacCarthy is a very remarkable girl of eighteen, in which you will be perfectly right; but no girl of eighteen in this world ever carried extraordinariness to the pitch of being eighteen and forty-five at the same time, neither does Miss MacCarthy give any evidence of discontent with her eighteen years; she clearly does not aim at over-maturity yet. If she plays the Brahms concerto wonderfully, it is, among other things, because a girl of eighteen can play it wonderfully.

One's relations to a great composer pass through various normal stages; if the composer be really great, you most probably begin by hating him; then comes better understanding, and, with it, liking; with still greater familiarity comes better liking still; after these stages it is a question of innate sympathy between yourself and him, of spiritual affinity, whether you get any closer to him or not, whether you sound him to his depths or not. As far as concerns Brahms, I am free to admit that it took me six good years to get from the first stage of hating to the second of better understanding and liking; and I may as well admit also that just now I am in the stage of clean daftness, of irresistible and unreasoning infatuation. I cannot see Brahms now otherwise than in an aureola of can-do-no-wrongness; he puts me straight back at sweet sixteen, and then appears to me as the perfectly beautiful prince on a coal-black steed, and all the rest of it. Personally I should be loth to think this late calf-love a sign of senility; but there it is, and I must make the best of it. For the nonce I am Brahms mad, and what I write about him has only the value of enthusiasm; of course I believe fully in my own feelings, but I am not so unconscionable as to ask anyone else to.

Enough that Brahms's violin concerto seemed to me last Saturday evening to take the curse off from its kind as only a work of perfect beauty can. I listened to it with nothing but delight, from beginning to end. And surely the young violinist who played it must have been for something in all this! I never played the violin myself, and know exceedingly little about its technique; I cannot listen to violin playing with the ears of an expert. But I can say that Miss MacCarthy's playing seemed to me exceedingly musicianlike, full of soul, grace, force and beauty. Until someone else shows me the contrary, I shall believe that she played the wondrous concerto just right. If I may venture at all upon a technical point, it is that her tone strikes me as superlatively fine, a tone of luscious richness and warmth produced with an exceptionally light bow-arm (if you don't know what I mean, I can't make it any plainer). The audience rose to her as if by magic; it seemed as if the applause would never cease.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, symphony in A major ("Scotch"); Marschner, aria from "Hans Heiling"; Dvorak, variations; Wagner, Wotan's Farewell and Fire-charm from "Die Walküre." Mr. Anton von Rooy will be the singer.

W. F. A.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss MacCarthy, Irish Violinist,
Wins High Favor.

The "Czar's Betrothed" Overture
Half Threatens to Be Gloomy, but in the End Proves Encouraging
and Bright—Mascagni Concert
Makes Fine Showing.

The "Czar's Betrothed" overture, written about three years ago by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and introduced here last night at the Symphony concert, proved to be just what was expected—a vigorous, substantial preparation for a lyric drama. This, however, in a general way only, for the Russian critics are reported to have said that it does not set exactly the key of the opera. When it begins it half threatens to be gloomy or sad. It opens with some sparse chords in D minor, having a mere thread of connection, and suggesting a sombre mood to come. But the minor tonality means no more than it does in some of the merry peasant songs of the Abruzzi; for a brisk and energetic pace is set at once, and the quality of the music becomes bright, nervous and encouraging. It went well and was liked.

After the overture was placed the great, serious and dignified D major violin concerto of Brahms, the solo player being a most personable Irish girl of 18 years, Miss Maud MacCarthy. What her calibre and her courage might be, was intimated by her choosing this work, so long reserved, as one might say, for Joachim, and only undertaken in Boston heretofore by a few men of established command as violinists. But her confidence and her true-aiming ambition were justified by the performance of this slight girl, unaffected, gentle and quiet almost to reserve in manner, soft and serene, but certain and strong in feeling. She was soon recognized as one who needs no minor commendations, but whose self, with her instrument and her art, would win her acceptance and establish her position. She evidently has not merely a disposition toward musical art; she has talent for it and can exercise power through it.

How the world moves! Today, young folk who half a century ago would have been still bound to technical tutelage in music are executants and interpreters of the great classics. How comes it about? Has there been a change in human fibre and temperament, or does modern study develop them better and facilitate earlier their exercise? Miss MacCarthy has ample technical equipment in ease, breadth and elasticity of bowing, and swiftness, clearness and accuracy of fingering. Her tone is pellucid, but warm, and not coldly clear. She has force, too, although her absolute strength has yet to grow. She makes no apparent effort, she resorts to no trickish display, and she seems bent upon devoting herself and her acquirements to their best uses. There are scores of honorable and beautiful violin writings, every one of which is worth a Symphony place, and would have been far more favorable to virtuosity, but she was ready to waive all their opportunities and to ask consideration only for her artistry, subordinating herself—as Brahms meant his player should—to the service of the concerto as a unified whole. This she did, showing in every page that the music had a meaning for her and making that meaning clear, strong and warm to all good listeners. It was spiritual, no less than intellectual, interpretation, and the form was shapely, symmetrical, elegant and polished. The audience were captivated and gratified, and recalled her five times, while the orchestra, who had been most earnest in praise after the rehearsal, applauded with unanimous enthusiasm.

The "Arlesienne" suite of Bizet, performed with high spirit, brilliant color and romantic expression, followed, and the concert (which was of bearable, but still too protracted length) ended with a full and free reading of Beethoven's fourth symphony, wherein its hearty happiness, noble cheer, tranquil, deep-felt tenderness and wholesome vitality were all made manifest.

This will be the next programme:

Symphony in A major (Scotch).....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Variations.....Dvorak
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charm,"
from "Die Walküre".....Wagner
Soloist, Mr. Anton von Rooy.

ny He 1902-

NY

RICKE, C

NCERT.

BER 22,

Boston Symp

group herewith the three concerts given in Greater New York last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of them, of course, under the direction of William Gericke. What they chiefly emphasize is the fact that we must depend upon these concerts in New York for the only thorough exposition of orchestral tone quality, of orchestral drill and discipline, chiefly through the selection of the proper material and its preparation through rehearsals. It is the only orchestral body that comes to the city that can interpret the highest works, and give to the ear and to the musical intelligence such satisfaction as is necessary for the proper perception of the musical art in that form. If there is anything to be grateful for it is the periodical visit of this superb organization. The programs follow:

New York, Thursday Evening, November 6.

Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90.....Brahms thy and William Shake-ly semi-public this is not and talents in detail, but true, full, rich, even, of ble control. Her diction, German and Italian. anniversary was the pre-medals to all founders of ars service are still active

Faculty Concert.

rection of Dr. Ernst Eber-of this institution occurred oria, a large and fashionably were played by Carl Bruch-oz 'cello; Max Karger, violin, rt Sternberg, and Mme. Marie music, all of which greatly e, the Arensky Quintet, en-s of Miss Beatrice Eberhard,

OUSAND

of
R
N

The New Novel
—BY—

F. HOPKINSON
SMITH

novel depicts the art
uring the last 35 years
ALTER APPLETON CLARK
1.50

RIBNER'S SONS
v York

series of popular volumes ealing in an instructive
nd entertaining manner
with the most important branches of the Art of Music. Each volume illustrated with portraits.
Each 12mo. Net, $1.25.
as was shown

of being eighteen and forty-five at the same time, neither does Miss MacCarthy give any evidence of discontent with her eighteen years; she clearly does not aim at over-maturity yet. If she plays the Brahms concerto wonderfully, it is, among other things, because a girl of eighteen can play it wonderfully.

One's relations to a great composer pass through various normal stages; if the composer be really great, you most probably begin by hating him; then comes better understanding, and, with it, liking; with still greater familiarity comes better liking still; after these stages it is a question of innate sympathy between yourself and him, of spiritual affinity, whether you get any closer to him or not, whether you sound him to his depths or not. As far as concerns Brahms, I am free to admit that it took me six good years to get from the first stage of hating to the second of better understanding and liking; and I may as well admit also that just now I am in the stage of clean daftness, of irresistible and unreasoning infatuation. I cannot see Brahms now otherwise than in an aureola of can-do-no-wrongness; he puts me straight back at sweet sixteen, and then appears to me as the perfectly beautiful prince on a coal-black steed, and all the rest of it. Personally I should be loth to think this late calf-love a sign of senility; but there it is, and I must make the best of it. For the nonce I am Brahms mad, and what I write about him has only the value of enthusiasm; of course I believe fully in my own feelings, but I am not so unconscionable as to ask anyone else to.

Enough that Brahms's violin concerto seemed to me last Saturday evening to take the curse off from its kind as only a work of perfect beauty can. I listened to it with nothing but delight, from beginning to end. And surely the young violinist who played it must have been for something in all this! I never played the violin myself, and know exceedingly little about its technique; I cannot listen to violin playing with the ears of an expert. But I can say that Miss MacCarthy's playing seemed to me exceedingly musicianlike, full of soul, grace, force and beauty. Until someone else shows me the contrary, I shall believe that she played the wondrous concerto just right. If I may venture at all upon a technical point, it is that her tone strikes me as superlatively fine, a tone of luscious richness and warmth produced with an exceptionally light bow-arm (if you don't know what I mean, I can't make it any plainer). The audience rose to her as if by magic; it seemed as if the applause would never cease.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, symphony in A major ("Scotch"); Marschner, aria from "Hans Heiling"; Dvorak, variations; Wagner, Wotan's Farewell and Fire-charm from "Die Walküre." Mr. Anton von Rooy will be the singer.

W. F. A.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kord
Miss MacCarthy, Irish Violinist,
Wins High Favor.

The "Czar's Betrothed" Overture
Half Threatens to Be Gloomy, but
in the End Proves Encouraging
and Bright—Mascagni Concert
Makes Fine Showing.

The "Czar's Betrothed" overture, written about three years ago by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and introduced here last night at the Symphony concert, proved to be just what was expected—a vigorous, substantial preparation for a lyric drama. This, however, in a general way only, for the Russian critics are reported to have said that it does not set exactly the key of the opera. When it begins it half threatens to be gloomy or sad. It opens with some sparse chords in D minor, having a mere thread of connection, and suggesting a sombre mood to come. But the minor tonality means no more than it does in some of the merry peasant songs of the Abruzzi; for a brisk and energetic pace is set at once, and the quality of the music becomes bright, nervous and encouraging. It went well and was liked.

After the overture was placed the great, serious and dignified D major violin concerto of Brahms, the solo player being a most personable Irish girl of 18 years, Miss Maud MacCarthy. What her calibre and her courage might be, was intimated by her choosing this work, so long reserved, as one might say, for Joachim, and only undertaken in Boston heretofore by a few men of established command as violinists. But her confidence and her true-aiming ambition were justified by the performance of this slight girl, unaffected, gentle and quiet almost to reserve in manner, soft and serene, but certain and strong in feeling. She was soon recognized as one who needs no minor commendations, but whose self, with her instrument and her art, would win her acceptance and establish her position. She evidently has not merely a disposition toward musical art; she has talent for it and can exercise power through it.

How the world moves! Today, young folk who half a century ago would have been still bound to technical tutelage in music are executants and interpreters of the great classics. How comes it about? Has there been a change in human fibre and temperament, or does modern study develop them better and facilitate earlier their exercise? Miss MacCarthy has ample technical equipment in ease, breadth and elasticity of bowing, and swiftness, clearness and accuracy of fingering. Her tone is pellucid, but warm, and not coldly clear. She has force, too, although her absolute strength has yet to grow. She makes no apparent effort, she resorts to no trickish display, and she seems bent upon devoting herself and her acquisitions to their best uses. There are scores of honorable and beautiful violin writings, every one of which is worth a Symphony place, and would have been far more favorable to virtuosity, but she was ready to waive all their opportunities and to ask consideration only for her artistry, subordinating herself—as Brahms meant his player should—to the service of the concerto as a unified whole. This she did, showing in every page that the music had a meaning for her and making that meaning clear, strong and warm to all good listeners. It was spiritual, no less than intellectual, interpretation, and the form was shapely, symmetrical, elegant and polished. The audience were captivated and gratified, and recalled her five times, while the orchestra, who had been most earnest in praise after the rehearsal, applauded with unanimous enthusiasm.

The "Arlesienne" suite of Bizet, performed with high spirit, brilliant color and romantic expression, followed, and the concert (which was of bearable, but still too protracted length) ended with a full and free reading of Beethoven's fourth symphony, wherein its hearty happiness, noble cheer, tranquil, deep-felt tenderness and wholesome vitality were all made manifest.

This will be the next programme:
Symphony in A major (Scotch).....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Variations.....Dvorak
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charms"
from "Die Walküre".....Wagner
Soloist, Mr. Anton von Rooy.

Boston Symph

group herewith the three concerts given in Greater New York last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of them, of course, under the direction of William Gericke. What they chiefly emphasize is the fact that we must depend upon these concerts in New York for the only thorough exposition of orchestral tone quality, of orchestral drill and discipline, chiefly through the selection of the proper material and its preparation through rehearsals. It is the only orchestral body that comes to the city that can interpret the highest works, and give to the ear and to the musical intelligence such satisfaction as is necessary for the proper perception of the musical art in that form. If there is anything to be grateful for it is the periodical visit of this superb organization. The programs follow:

New York, Thursday Evening, November 6.

Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90.....Brahms thy and William Shakespeare semi-public this is not and talents in detail, but hoven true, full, rich, even, of trauss ble control. Her diction, oven ngs, is delightful. It is German and Italian. anniversary was the pre-medals to all founders of ven ars service are still active ach

1902-

NY

RICKE, C

NCERT.

BER 22,

Faculty Concert.

rection of Dr. Ernst Eber- of this institution occurred oria, a large and fashionably were played by Carl Bruch- oz 'cello; Max Karger, violin, rt Sternberg, and Mme. Marie music, all of which greatly e, the Arensky Quintet, en- s of Miss Beatrice Eberhard,;

OUSAND

of
R
N

The New Novel
—BY—
F. HOPKINSON
SMITH

novel depicts the art uring the last 35 years
ALTER APPLETON CLARK
1.50

TRIBNER'S SONS
v York

series of popular volumes ealing in an instructive nd entertaining manner with the most important ranches of the Art of Music. Each volume illus- trated with portraits.
Each 12mo. Net, $1.25.
as was shown

of being eighteen and forty-five at the same time, neither does Miss MacCarthy give any evidence of discontent with her eighteen years; she clearly does not aim at over-maturity yet. If she plays the Brahms concerto wonderfully, it is, among other things, because a girl of eighteen can play it wonderfully.

One's relations to a great composer pass through various normal stages; if the composer be really great, you most probably begin by hating him; then comes better understanding, and, with it, liking; with still greater familiarity comes better liking still; after these stages it is a question of innate sympathy between yourself and him, of spiritual affinity, whether you get any closer to him or not, whether you sound him to his depths or not. As far as concerns Brahms, I am free to admit that it took me six good years to get from the first stage of hating to the second of better understanding and liking; and I may as well admit also that just now I am in the stage of clean daftness, of irresistible and unreasoning infatuation. I cannot see Brahms now otherwise than in an aureola of can-do-no-wrongness; he puts me straight back at sweet sixteen, and then appears to me as the perfectly beautiful prince on a coal-black steed, and all the rest of it. Personally I should be loth to think this late calf-love a sign of senility; but there it is, and I must make the best of it. For the nonce I am Brahms mad, and what I write about him has only the value of enthusiasm; of course I believe fully in my own feelings, but I am not so unconscious as to ask anyone else to.

Enough that Brahms's violin concerto seemed to me last Saturday evening to take the curse off from its kind as only a work of perfect beauty can. I listened to it with nothing but delight, from beginning to end. And surely the young violinist who played it must have been for something in all this! I never played the violin myself, and know exceedingly little about its technique; I cannot listen to violin playing with the ears of an expert. But I can say that Miss MacCarthy's playing seemed to me exceedingly musicianlike, full of soul, grace, force and beauty. Until someone else shows me the contrary, I shall believe that she played the wondrous concerto just right. If I may venture at all upon a technical point, it is that her tone strikes me as superlatively fine, a tone of luscious richness and warmth produced with an exceptionally light bow-arm (if you don't know what I mean, I can't make it any plainer). The audience rose to her as if by magic; it seemed as if the applause would never cease.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, symphony in A major ("Scotch"); Marschner, aria from "Hans Heiling"; Dvorak, variations; Wagner, Wotan's Farewell and Fire-charm from "Die Walküre." Mr. Anton von Rooy will be the singer.

W. F. A.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss MacCarthy, Irish Violinist,
Wins High Favor.

The "Czar's Betrothed" Overture
Half Threatens to Be Gloomy, but
in the End Proves Encouraging
and Bright—Mascagni Concert
Makes Fine Showing.

The "Czar's Betrothed" overture, written about three years ago by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and introduced here last night at the Symphony concert, proved to be just what was expected—a vigorous, substantial preparation for a lyric drama. This, however, in a general way only, for the Russian critics are reported to have said that it does not set exactly the key of the opera. When it begins it half threatens to be gloomy or sad. It opens with some sparse chords in D minor, having a mere thread of connection, and suggesting a sombre mood to come. But the minor tonality means no more than it does in some of the merry peasant songs of the Abruzzi; for a brisk and energetic pace is set at once, and the quality of the music becomes bright, nervous and encouraging. It went well and was liked.

After the overture was placed the great, serious and dignified D major violin concerto of Brahms, the solo player being a most personable Irish girl of 18 years, Miss Maud MacCarthy. What her calibre and her courage might be, was intimated by her choosing this work, so long reserved, as one might say, for Joachim, and only undertaken in Boston heretofore by a few men of established command as violinists. But her confidence and her true-aiming ambition were justified by the performance of this slight girl, unaffected, gentle and quiet almost to reserve in manner, soft and serene, but certain and strong in feeling. She was soon recognized as one who needs no minor commendations, but whose self, with her instrument and her art, would win her acceptance and establish her position. She evidently has not merely a disposition toward musical art; she has talent for it and can exercise power through it.

How the world moves! Today, young folk who half a century ago would have been still bound to technical tutelage in music are executants and interpreters of the great classics. How comes it about? Has there been a change in human fibre and temperament, or does modern study develop them better and facilitate earlier their exercise? Miss MacCarthy has ample technical equipment in ease, breadth and elasticity of bowing, and swiftness, clearness and accuracy of fingering. Her tone is pellucid, but warm, and not coldly clear. She has force, too, although her absolute strength has yet to grow. She makes no apparent effort, she resorts to no trickish display, and she seems bent upon devoting herself and her acquirements to their best uses. There are scores of honorable and beautiful violin writings, and is worth a Symphony. have been far more fastidious, but she was ready for their opportunities and era only for her own. nating herself—as Brahms player should—to the concerto as a unified whole showing in every page had a meaning for her meaning clear, strong good listeners. It was than intellectual, interpretation was shapely, elegant and polished. The captivated and gratified her five times, while she had been most earnest the rehearsal, applauding mous enthusiasm.

The "Arlesienne" suite formed with high spirit and romantic expression the concert (which was still too protracted length a full and free reading fourth symphony, where happiness, noble cheer, felt tenderness and were all made manifest. This will be the next Symphony in A major (Scotch) Aria from "Hans Heiling". Variations. "Wotan's Farewell" and "from "Die Walküre". Soloist, Mr. Anton group he given in G by the Bo all of their rection of they chie that we must depend up York for the only thorough tone quality, of orchestra through the selection of preparation through rehearsal interpret the highest work to the musical intelligence necessary for the proper art in that form. If the ganization. The program

Boston

New York, Thursday
Symphony No. 3, in F major

Concerto for Piano, No. 5, in E flat major, op.

73 ..... Beethoven
Tone Poem, Don Juan, op. 20 ..... Richard Strauss
Overture to Leonore, No. 2, in C major, op. 72.. Beethoven
Soloist, Frederic Lamond.

Friday Evening, November 7.

Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major,
op. 72 ..... Beethoven
Overture (Suite) No. 2, in B minor, for Strings,
Flute and Piano accompaniment ..... Bach
Concerto for Violoncello, No. 2, in D minor, op.
96 ..... Rubinstein
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64 ..... Tchaikowsky
Soloist, Elsa Ruegger.

Saturday Afternoon, November 8.

Overture, Carnaval Romain ..... Berlioz
Grand Fantasia in C major (Wanderer), op. 15.. Schubert
Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Symphonic Poem, Le Rouet d'Omphale, in A major, op. 31 ..... Saint-Saëns
Symphony in E minor, op. 115 (first time)... Hans Huber
Soloist, Raoul Pugno.

We may all differ as to the manner in which Mr. Gericke interprets Brahms or what he does with Richard Strauss, or how he discusses Bach or Tchaikowsky. But the very differences of opinion give us cause to reflect upon the variety of sentiment, taste and skill and other influences that make up a judgment upon a musical product. In scanning the criticisms of the papers in this city and across the river in Brooklyn it will be seen that the critics cannot come to any conclusion in a body, and yet there is no final appeal that can dispose of these questions of art, literary or musical criticism. Probably history will finally tell the story, but we cannot wait for that. The fact remains that Mr. Gericke has a magnificent organization, with a luscious tone quality, a powerful quantity for distribution and a reserve which he holds for his ultra-dynamic effects. He reads Brahms with a great deal of interest and intelligence. He gives to Strauss a sound, analytical interpretation, which, though lacking in some breadth and dramatic color, is the only interpretation that we can receive at present that gives us any light into this vast mass of musical idealogy. He gives us a very clear, concise reading of Beethoven, as was shown in the "Leonore" overture, and his Tschaikowsky interpretations are vivid if not glaring, and intellectual if not emotional. In all of this there is a great deal to interest the musical student who has a conscientious desire to enter into the elaborate study of musical interpretation.

When watching the audiences there is no doubt that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives an intense amount of pleasure to the listeners. If they could speak (and they are the ones chiefly interested in this thing) undoubtedly there would be an almost unanimous voice in favor of what Mr. Gericke is doing with the Symphony Orchestra. It may not be critical, it may not be technical, it may be sentimental, it may be emotional, but it is true. It would be the word of truth that would be uttered, free from the polemics of the schools and emancipated from the pedagogy of the restricted investigator.

It is not necessary to enter into any explanation as to what Brahms' F Major Symphony is, for this paper has devoted pages to that; there is no reason whatever, after so many years, to discuss again the motives and actions of the Tschaikowsky E Minor Symphony, or to tell our readers what Beethoven meant with his various "Leonore" overtures, or what Bach intended with his Overture No. 2. The "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss has been analyzed into its microscopic features—the details—over and over, and so have the other works, with the exception of the new symphony of Hans Huber, of which we shall speak later. All of these works have had their standard of criticism and analyses in this paper in years past, and we are on record with respect to them; the people are not interested in rereading what we have stated so frequently. But whatever may have been done regarding these works on the occasion of this visit of the Boston Symphony, there was certainly a greater brilliancy of tone, a more consummate virtuosity, and a greater assurance and confidence in the work of the Orchestra than was ever exhibited in its history in this city. It has reached a stage very near to perfection.

The soloist of the Thursday concert was Frederic Lamond, who played the "Emperor" Con-the violin—Edward Wittstein, jeweler and music dealer, and Russian, both of whom reside about eighteen years old. The tests are Professors Sanford Steinert. Young Wittstein of Wallingford, while his rival Professor Troostwyck.

Sokoloff under his wing a year and for his tuition during that time he worked hard on his violin for a long time, and musicians have attained an excellent development. Sokoloff has been pushed forward in the past year by his sponsors, and is now the favorite in the Yale musical circle. Wittstein had the courage to make decisions favored Sokoloff, and that Wittstein had shown himself a rival, and that he was enabled to have not since been able to do so. Out tonight that the award was made this year. The prize for excellence on the maker is a powerful personal-ty of energetic imagination, of and temperament."—London Review.

elomaniacs.

12mo, - $1.50.
not found a page that is dull."
Tribune.

Chopin.

Man and His Music,
100. WITH PORTRAIT. of distinguished style, of pathy and the most bril-
- New York Times Saturday

Modern Music.

$1.50.
tribution to musical criti-
the American press in

Sons, New York

superb contributions to the tives and forces that en-omposition with its glow-
To appreciate fully the ition, it seems essential to passing knowledge of the within his scope. Mr. Lamond received five recalls.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the violoncellist, played the D minor Rubinstein Concerto, in the Brooklyn concert, one of the matured works of the instrument written by Rubinstein—the op. 96, a well established virtuoso composition. Miss Ruegger is an exceptionally gifted artist of an order that is becoming somewhat rare nowadays, her playing giving us an objective interpretation of one of the best written modern violoncello concertos. In her singing quality she gives the true inner musical motive, for she actually sings upon the strings. Her technique has been advanced since her last visit here, if that were possible, and her bowing has now become scientifically adjusted to the extraordinary demands of her left hand. She was received with remarkable cordiality.

Miss Ruegger is to play throughout the United States.

On Saturday afternoon Raoul Pugno played the Liszt arrangement of Schubert's "Wanderer." In this the great Frenchman again gave the audience an evidence of his remarkable digital dexterity, and of the true gift of musicianship of which he is so lavishly possessed. Mr. Pugno controls the keyboard, and he picks out the lights and shades of a piano composition with the exquisite finish of a water colorist. He plays Liszt with the same absorbed attention as he does Mozart and Grieg and Bach, and he is so thoroughly absorbed in his occupation that it becomes a subjective interpretation with him. He glides over the keyboard with a zephyrlike touch, and yet produces a remarkably powerful tone in the forte passages. The audience seemed to be delighted with his work and it is the audience which must be delighted. It seems, after all, that the audience is the chief consideration in these concerts. Those people who purchase their tickets for concerts, those who give their support through subscriptions are the ones the management and the performers are most anxious to please, because it signifies their maintenance. Unless the audience is satisfied there can be no music. The audience was delighted with Mr. Pugno and therefore the audience will he plays next time, and virtuoso's function.

es for wounded feelings may be possible that the pon as the final arbiter point of view than that from the criticism in the n these concerts of the
that a great deal of reand that our critics are as to write things with not agree, because in all ice was rapturously envorst expression that we uring these concerts was lacking in temperament.
snug little dollars some-he will go ahead in this e certainly wounded, or ment.

OOY, AS WOTAN.
otograph by A. Dupont.

66
in the "Leonore" overture interpretations are vivid intellectual if not emotional great deal to interest the conscientious desire to study of musical interpretation.

When watching the audience that the Boston Symphony orchestra could speak (and they are interested in this thing) understood almost unanimous voice Gericke is doing with this. It may not be critical, it may be sentimental, it may be true. It would be the worst uttered, free from the polemic emancipated from the polemical investigator.

It is not necessary to enter as to what Brahms' Fifth Symphony paper has devoted pages to whatever, after so many years motives and actions of the Symphony, or to tell our meant with his various what Bach intended with his "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss into its microscopic features over, and so have the other tion of the new symphony, we shall speak later. All their standard of criticism in years past, and we are content them; the people are not what we have stated so far may have been done regardless occasion of this visit of there was certainly a great more consummate virtuosity and confidence in the than was ever exhibited in It has reached a stage very certainly and gave us a very deliberate, clear and logical interpretation. Some of the papers referred to the fact that he is a Scotch pianist, but it seems to us that he is a pianist. That unnecessary qualification, brought about by the fact that he was born in Scotland, does not seem to affect the question of Beethoven very much; because Lamond played Beethoven; he did not play Scotch composers' compositions. If his nationality had not been known it would have been very difficult to discover that he was born in Scotland, for he might as well have been born in Ireland, Kamchatka, or in Frankfort-on-the-Main, where he lives. The fact is that Mr. Lamond played the Beethoven E Flat Concerto as a scholarly pianistic virtuoso is expected to do it. His command of the keyboard is remarkably complete, the touch producing all varieties of color and changes—one of the most difficult tests of virtuosity. His passage work was clear and clean, his trills, staccato and legato all superbly developed, and his phrasing was within the traditional methods of the proverbial Beethoven player. If he did not swing us into the uppermost sphere of the emotion in Beethoven, it is probably due to the fact that a classical interpretation of such a work does not permit of it, and that he preferred to play Beethoven as it is written. He evoked from the instrument a superb quality of tone, he demonstrated the power of the bass, the singing quality that can be produced through a Beethoven Concerto, and the rare, silvery, scintillating qualities of the treble. After all (for let us be honest), the pianists are here to see what can be done in the production of fine tone quality, in addition to their interpretation of great compositions; for, were it not for these manufacturers of tone quality we would not hear any of these pianists at all. We would not have heard Mr. Lamond but for the intense desire of learning what American piano tone signifies in its best sense.

The soloist of the Frederic Lamond, who played

It is sufficient to say that in Mr. Lamond we have a legitimate virtuoso of a highly developed order, a man of intellectual grasp, to whom the mere technique of the piano has long been an old story, and who is utilizing it for the purpose of interpreting from his point of view, the compositions which are character and the art the gratifying as this would be, ble for the audience to Böcklin activity in picture book supplies a deficiency, without a knowledge of the in the use of symphony as listener gains a decided instantaneous music itself, and highly colored orchestral work compiled by a master hand.

In short, Huber's Second Symphony in all the meaning him to be within the pale of gifted musical authors of tion, unrestricted by any tendencies, soars in the realm of few contemporaneous reached. As a tribute to the symphony has an enduring depicts, and as a composition order of symphony it occupies among similar works of the, edly and readily adhered to consistently and logically and the orchestral color brush in conformity with the ern orchestra. Most of all Finck is in the habit of saying must first and foremost have as Huber's is full of ideas later symphonic works than sions.

JULIAN PASCAL

JULIAN PASCAL was given his first recital of the season judiciously, being devoid of The pianist was in his best form throughout. The program was Minuetto from op. 31.....

Erlkönig .....
Polonaise .....
Etude in F minor.....
Etude in F sharp.....

67
listen to Mr. Pugno when he plays next time, and that is the chief end of the virtuoso's function.

In these days of damages for wounded feelings arising from criticism, it may be possible that the audience will be looked upon as the final arbiter after all, even from another point of view than that of the box office. Judging from the criticism in the New York daily papers on these concerts of the Boston Orchestra, it seems that a great deal of reserve has been maintained and that our critics are careful not to be so severe as to write things with which the audience does not agree, because in all these instances the audience was rapturously endorsing the soloists. The worst expression that we saw in any of the papers during these concerts was that Mr. Lamond was sadly lacking in temperament. There are five thousand snug little dollars somewhere for Mr. Lamond if he will go ahead in this matter. His feelings were certainly wounded, or else he is sadly lacking in temperament.

ANTON VAN ROOY, AS WOTAN.
From copyrighted photograph by A. Dupont.

ANTON VAN ROOY, BARITONE.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY in A major, "Italian," op. 90.

I. Allegro vivace.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Con moto moderato.

IV. Saltarello. Presto.

BEETHOVEN,

RECITATIVE AND SONG, "To Hope," op. 94.

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS on an original Theme,
op. 78.

WAGNER,

WOTAN'S FAREWELL" and "FIRE-CHARM,"
from "Die Walküre."

Soloist:

Mr. ANTON VAN ROOY.

ANTON VAN ROOY, BARITONE.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY in A major, "Italian," op. 90.

I. Allegro vivace.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Con moto moderato.

IV. Saltarello. Presto.

BEETHOVEN,

RECITATIVE AND SONG, "To Hope," op. 94.

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS on an original Theme,
op. 78.

WAGNER,

WOTAN'S FAREWELL," and "FIRE-CHARM,"
from "Die Walküre."

Soloist:

Mr. ANTON VAN ROOY.

A TRIUMPH FOR VAN ROOY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony in A major, "Italian," op. 90.... Mendelssohn
Recitative and Song, "To Hope," op. 94.... Beethoven
Symphonic Variations on an original Theme, op. 78.... Dvorak
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charms," from "Die Walkure"..... Wagner

A dull programme, for once, and one which left the musician unmoved until its very last number. One might also find fault with the changes made from the announcement of the previous week; many auditors were expecting Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony and an aria from Marschner's seldom heard, "Hans Heiling." As many students "coach up" on the works that they expect to hear at these concerts, it is unfair to these young musicians to make changes unless because of urgent necessity. Perhaps, in this case, a clerical error took place in the announcement, for the preceding programmes had announced Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, but mis-called it the "Scotch."

The "Italian" symphony is not nearly so great a work as the "Scotch"; in the latter there is true local color, and the clarinette theme of the scherzo is the most truly Gaelic touch ever achieved by a German composer (and Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch and Robert Franz, have all attempted Scottish effects), while the virility and contrast of the finale outweighs anything to be found in the Italian symphony.

The work is not characteristically Italian, in spite of its final saltarello; it is elegant music, which never becomes great. Richard Strauss, Charpentier and other moderns have given us an Italy that is much more interesting and a good deal warmer than this polite portrayal of Mendelssohn's. Only three points of the work made any impression upon the reviewer at this concert,—the beautiful viola color in the andante, the fine shorn passages in the scherzo, and the brilliancy of the strings in the finale. Perhaps we ought to add a word of tribute to the well-balanced character of the kettle-drum playing in the finale, for this humble instrument could spoil a good many passages in the saltarello if it became too ambitious. The splendid effect of the string playing in this movement caused the finale to receive much applause; it may have been Mendelssohn's music which won the tribute, but we doubt it.

After this elegance came over-swollen sentiment (not very far removed from bathos) in the shape of Beethoven's hopelessly antiquated song—"To Hope." In this case Hope told a flattering tale that became rather tiresome before its close. Beethoven once declared to his friend Rochlitz that he did not like to compose songs, and the result of this dislike is very apparent in his works in this direction. Outside of "Adelaide" and "An die ferne Geliebte" (and even these are fading a little) there are few songs of the great instrumental master that one cares to hear. We cordially agree with Mr. H. T. Finck that at least two-thirds of Beethoven's songs are unworthy of their composer and that some of them are "poor, childish, empty and mediocre."

Mr. Van Rooy gave a good deal more to the deadly-lively work than there was in it; he sang with magnificent voice and with an earnestness as if he were really moved by the bombastic sentiments of the weak poetry. It was a long-drawn out version of the thought that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," and Mr. Van Rooy made such an effect with it that we believe that he could put up expression—longing, yearning, sorrow and joy—into one of Jordan & Marsh's advertisements if any one would kindly set it to music.

After this came a set of exercises in variation-writing. Dvorak's 27 variations of a theme which he claims as original and which Hanslick states to be a Bohemian folk-song, are an example of what a facile composer can do if he tries. It was a strong example of ingenuity plodding on without the aid of inspiration. It served to give a sort of dress parade of the different departments of our great orchestra, one by one, and it transformed the theme into every conceivable shape from dance to fugue. One felt that Dvorak had no need to stop at Variation No. 27, but could have gone on to No. 127 if he were dared to do so. Seven variations were omitted; it would have been better if the seven had been played and the 20 omitted.

When one compares such "Kapellmeister-musik" with the earnest nationalism of a Smetana, one feels that Dvorak's teacher, although less renowned and certainly less glib than his pupil, had more sincerity and probably more genius. But Dvorak is not to be judged by any such pedantic exhibitions as these variations; that would be rank injustice to the composer of the "New World" symphony.

Then came Wagner "as cold water to a thirsty soul" and the boredom was sponged out and forgotten. Here was a real triumph for Mr. Van Rooy, for the orchestra, for Mr. Gericke, since all united in the great finale to "Die Walkure," as if they loved it. Never has Van Rooy sung better, never have we heard so magnificent a Wotan, and the orchestral support was something that the vocalist could not expect from any opera-house orchestra. It is impossible to convey to any reader who was not present an idea of the glory of this number. Small wonder that the audience at the end were oblivious of trolley and carriages and remained to recall the great artist and to applaud conductor and orchestra. Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Delightful Programme in Which Mr. Van Rooy Sings Nobly.

First Vocalist of the Season Is Baritone of Metropolitan Opera Company, Whose Voice Is Rich, Sympathetic and Satisfying—Scotch Symphony Given.

The Symphony concert last night was of just a good length and altogether delightful, being well balanced in the respective extent of its numbers, which were proportionately divided between instrumental and vocal.

The symphony, which had been misstated in the preliminary announcement, was not the "Scotch," but the "Italian," of Mendelssohn, less frequently played, perhaps, but not less endeared by its companionship of half a century. Its kindly and sympathetic charm—as in "The Hebrides" overture and the "Scotch" symphony—dwells in its beautiful exposition of the composer's sweet and sensitive disposition, which assimilated so easily the fine and poetic characteristics of his environment, expressing in this work his enjoyment of the clear, light, transparent air, the scenic beauty, the free, natural life and the commingling of sober fancy, romantic association, pleasant melancholy and thoughtless, happy abandon that Italy offers. The performance was appreciative, true and elegant. Yet one might query whether any harm could come to the last movement from a sturdier and even rougher emphasis. The saltarello, whatever it may have been at first, was as Mendelssohn knew it, and as one knows it today, a rudely vigorous dance of common folk, contadini or popolani, with an accenting stamp which might almost leave a mark on the spot where the foot falls, while the bystanders cheer on the dancers, much as a "buck and wing" dancer is "patted" and incited in a Juba festival.

The other orchestral number was a majority of the 27 variations composed by Dvorak upon an obvious original theme of only 20 measures. The work, which stands 78th in its author's catalogue, was written in 1877, and has appeared twice in a Symphony programme, the last previous occasion being at the end of 1898. While these variations are wise and learned enough, they aim less at displaying erudition and science than at giving pleasure. Hence, they are distinguished less by diversified thematic treatment than by versatility in tone color and contrasted voicing. Putting aside all consideration of them as examples of academic skill, they are delightful to hear as illustrations of what pleasure from sound a master can give in a series of brief combinations and evolutions. But the work is not allowed to end until it has received its cachet of mastership in a short, strong and luminous fugue finale. The playing was elastic, free and fitting.

For the first time this season the solo numbers introduced a vocalist. This was Mr. Van Rooy, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan company, whom it was gratifying to hear thus early, before his voice should have become tired and possibly hardened and roughened by heavy operatic work and Wagner declamation. At its best it is a rich, satisfying and sympathetic organ, with a suggestion in its timbre that it might be advantageously used as a "basso centrale," in spite of its brilliant and resonant upper register. Mr. Van Rooy's first song was Beethoven's second setting of Tiedge's meditation and ode, "To Hope," supported by Mottl's instrumentation. The singer made much of this, stating the fragmentary introduction reflectively and rendering the poem flowingly and lyrically, without dramatic enforcement, but with justly calm and tender feeling.

For his second selection he went to Wagner, and chose the finale of "Die Walkure," in which Wotan presents himself no more as that wearisome bore, the Wanderer, prating in long stories, but as the father of gods and would-be master of worlds, who yet must bow to the inevitable fate he has provoked and part with all that he most loves and cherishes, and who is for the moment one with whom the beholder can share sorrow, discouragement, faint hope and a last assumption of authority. This personage Mr. Van Rooy presented in his rendering of the scene, which he sang nobly, putting Wagner's "continuous melody" at its best, maintaining a rhythmical movement and yet imparting the dramatic emphasis and indicating "the motive and the cue for action." There was the right pathos in the farewell words, and in the hope that the conquering wooer should be "freer than I, the god." Imperious and severe declamation had its true place and its full measure in the summons and the command to Loge and in the finale conjuration. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra gave the accompaniment and the ensuing fire scene splendidly.

The next concert requires no soloist, and this programme is announced for it: Overture to the opera, "Der Rubin"....D'Albert Fantasy in F minor.....Schubert-Mottl Ein Marchen.....Jos. Suk Symphony No. 2.....Schumann

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Concert of Familiar Orchestral Compositions — Mr. Van Rooy Sings Music of Beethoven and Wagner.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian".....Mendelssohn Song, "To Hope".....Beethoven Symphonic variations.....Dvorak "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm".....Wagner

How much of Italy is there in this Symphony of Mendelssohn? Suppose there were no title. The last movement might easily be recognized as a saltarello; but how about the other movements? The first is light and gay, but there is no geographical or national mood at once established, there is no authoritative characterization. I doubt whether even a tambourine would be of material assistance. It was not necessary for the composer to go to Naples to write the andante. As for the Scherzo, the horns with their pleasant sentimentalism might represent today Germans in Rome, armed with red guide-books and now and then bursting out in songs of the Fatherland, something about the forest, or spring, or the blissfulness of sorrow and longing. The saltarello part was done much better by Berlioz. Compare this symphony, so far as local color is concerned, with a page of Bizet painting in tones a Southern scene, or with Richard Strauss's Italian Suite, or with the suite of Charpentier, and Mendelssohn's music seems without marked distinction, rather tame and drab. Yet the first movement and the Finale are amiable music, pages that may awaken a gentlemanlike joy, and there is no denying the clearness of the musical thought, the purity of expression, the sure and polished workmanship. But we are far from the composer of the "Hebrides" overture and portions of the "Scotch" symphony and the "Walpurgis Night." The symphony was played extremely well, and with the accuracy, the beauty of tone, and the fleetness of light emotion that would have pleased the composer.

Dvorak wrote the theme, 27 variations and the finale of his opus 78 in 22 days. It might have been better for his fame and the enjoyment of audiences if he had spent more time on fewer variations. Mr. Gericke wisely omitted seven of these variations in the performance. The work was written in 1877, but it was not produced till some years afterward. Dvorak says the theme is original; but when the piece was played in Vienna in 1887, Eduard Hanslick said that the theme in rhythm of seven measures was that of a Czech chorus, "Já jsem guslar," and that is about the way the theme sounds. In the variations there is more counterpoint than color, and when Dvorak's music is stripped of its rich orchestral dress, the body itself is seldom of much significance. Perhaps there are some who still regard Dvorak as a composer of the first rank—for all sorts of extravagant things were said about him 20, yes, even 10 years ago, but his glory is steadily and surely fading. Some of his earlier music gives pleasure by rhythm and color; there are two or three songs that will haunt the memory for some years to come; but his day is passing. Smetana was a man of higher imagination, and more discriminative sincerity. There are pages in this theme and variations that are interesting both in rhythm and color; there is no doubt a larger exhibition of technical skill than in preceding works. But the "nature-man" is shown in the Finale where, as if tired with his fugue, he shouts, "Now let's have a dance," and foots it—heavily. And when he is thus honest, he is the most successful. The piece also serves to display the orchestra as a virtuoso.

*** Mr. Van Rooy's performance of Wotan's music in the excerpts from "Die Walkure" was a noble one, a performance long to be remembered. It was dignified, tender, free from extravagance of any kind. It was alive with feeling, yet not too dramatic for the concert stage. I have never heard the music sung so beautifully; with such broad and sustained phrasing, with such varying and always appropriate vocal expression. It was a far finer performance than the one he gave in the opera itself at the Boston Theatre, for he was not in the vein, and his reputation was then justly wondered at and questioned.

It is a pity that he did not sing the aria from "Hans Helling," instead of Beethoven's "To Hope." The words by Tiedge are in the spirit of speeches by Mrs. Haller and the Stranger, the speeches laughed at by Canning and Frere in the "Anti-Jacobin," the speeches that moved so mightily young Arthur Pendennis in calf-love with the play-actress. How could Beethoven set music to such stuff? Yet Mr. Van Rooy sang in appropriately sentimental mood, and there were moments when I should not have been surprised to see him shedding the tear of sensibility.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV 23, 1902.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The German basso, Anton van Rooy, was the soloist at last week's Symphony concerts, his selections being the recitative and song, "To Hope," by Beethoven, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from Wagner's "Die Walkure." Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme completed the program. Mr. van Rooy's splendid interpretation of the Wotan music with the Grau opera company three seasons ago was a feature of the performance, and although the character is less impressive in concert guise the musical demands, if met, are about as satisfactory, and Mr. van Rooy certainly equalled expectations, for the scene was given with telling effect. In the earlier number Beethoven's music was sung with a delicacy and tenderness that showed somewhat the remarkable sweetness of the singer's voice, which though ponderous when required, is capable of expressing the gentler sentiments with exquisite quality of tone and phrasing.

It is rarely that a basso of his power uses the mezzo-voice so true to pitch and thus ability makes Mr van Rooy's performance particularly enjoyable, because the quality of his work is evenly sustained. The vigorous declamations of the Wotan music were given with splendid resonance and warmth of tone and without a suggestion of harshness, and the whole number was sung far more melodiously than is usually heard from German artists. The singer was most cordially received.

Although there were no orchestral novelties on the program the concerts were interesting throughout, the contrasts in selection not running to extremes and being of a nature to please the general public. The beautiful "Italian" symphony by Mendelssohn received a masterly interpretation, the opening movement being notably buoyant in performance, the second part retaining the proper dignity, and the closing movement showing the almost perfect ensemble playing of the band in the wild "saltarello," which in some orchestras is merely an unmelodic tumult. The "Die Walküre" music also deserves mention for its sympathetic rendering.

The Dvorak symphonic variations tax the abilities of every contingent of a band, the rapid changes of the instrumental bodies being so frequent and difficult that the "conversations" are very apt to become muddled phrases. The figurations of the theme were given with precision and clarity, and although the work is chiefly interesting because of its puzzling nature, the interpretation was so smooth that it proved to be very enjoyable.

There will be no soloist this week and the program will be made up as follows: Overture to the opera, "Der Rubin," d'Albert; fantasy in F minor, Schubert; Mottl; "Eln Märchen," J. Suk; symphony No. 2, Schumann.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—First Appearance Here of Miss Maud MacCarthy, Violinist—Mascagni and His Men in Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gerleke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Betrothal of the Tsar".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Violin concerto.....Brahms
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 1.....Bizet
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

The overture of Rimski-Korsakoff is a prelude to an opera which was produced at Moscow in 1899. The Russian critics told us at the time that the overture did not correspond to the dramatic quality of the opera itself. It is frankly a theatre overture, and as such it is not to be ranked among the important or the characteristic works of this Russian, who is first of all a colorist. He needs a fantastical subject to quicken his imagination, as Berlioz demanded a great one. Give him Antar in the desert, Sadko fiddling to the dwellers in the palace under the waters of the sea, Scheherazade telling her wondrous and immortal tales; or ask him to put into music the brilliance and rhythm of Spain (as in his Spanish Caprice which richly deserves a performance at these concerts) and he will paint gorgeous orchestral pictures. But here we have something that comes merely before the rise of a curtain which does not rise for us. It is sparkling, entertaining music; deftly put together and agreeably scored; a light overture for once without wet wings.

The suite from "L'Arlésienne" is always welcome, for it is in its way a masterpiece, and it deserves thoughtful and painstaking consideration in the performance.

The Minuetto and the Adagietto were played with exquisite finish and fitting sentiment. The opening theme of the Prelude and the Variations were also admirably played; but the remarkable section of the Prelude that introduces the theme of the poor Innocent, the boy with the sleeping soul, who awakens to intelligence only at the catastrophe, when his brother Frédéric kills himself for love, was without mystery; there was no expression of the twilight of a soul. The music was too much in the open, too much in noon light. I do not refer merely to the absence of saxophone color. I am speaking of the whole effect. Where was that recurring sigh of the clarinet, that should haunt the hearer? Where was the sombre, spectral melody, as the voice of a lamenting ghost? And in the finale of the Prelude, which is developed from the typical theme of Frédéric there should have been more restlessness, more fever in the pace. But as a whole the Suite gave much pleasure.

Miss Maud MacCarthy made her first appearance in Boston. She is a talented young violinist, who evidently has not the fear of Brahms before her eyes, for she played his concerto as though French and Russian composers will be forced in the next to hear endless repetitions of the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms, then Miss MacCarthy may well be the compassionate spirit who will make the punishment as light as possible. Last night she was recalled again and again.

There is little to be said about a performance of a Beethoven Symphony by this orchestra. Yet when one of these symphonies is not heard too often, there is always something to say about the work itself. Last night one of the chief impressions was that of the supreme power of Beethoven in awakening anticipation, and this by apparently simple means, as in the first movement during the long crescendo that leads to the re-establishment of the chief tonality. No one with all the audacity of modern harmony or legions of instruments has so paralleled in music the uneasy hush before some perturbation of nature.

The program of next Saturday will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; aria from "Hans Heiling," sung by Mr. Van Rooy; Dvorak's Symphonic Variations; Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Charm from "Die Walküre," with Mr. Van Rooy as Wotan.

Philip Hale.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

From:

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The fifth Symphony concert was given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mendelssohn: Symphony in A major, "Italian," op. 90.
Beethoven: Recitative and Song, "To Hope," op. 94.
Dvorak: Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, op. 78.
Wagner: "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charms," from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Anton van Rooy was the singer. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony might well have been entitled, "Impressions of a Foreigner in Italy"; whatever his appreciation of the beauties of Italian scenery and art may have been, he had none whatever of Italian music, abominating the good therein perhaps even more heartily than the bad. The curious part of the symphony is that, excepting the theme of the last movement, there is nothing in it to correspond to its title. Even though it may reflect certain moods conventionally supposed to be characteristically Italian, the music itself is so inveterately un-Italian in form and especially in feeling that the title seems a misnomer. Mendelssohn brought away with him about as much of the essence of Italy as visitors of distinction generally bring with them from a country of which they have only a few weeks' knowledge. Still, though the music is not Italian, much of it is very charming; the first movement in particular is one of the finest examples of beauty of style, of unflinching felicitousness, that Mendelssohn ever gave to the world. The rest of the work shows the wrinkles of age, save in the ever-beautiful trio of the third movement. The performance by Mr. Gerleke and the orchestra was ideal in every respect, one of the finest ever heard here.

Dvorak's variations are pleasant enough music to hear, though they do not hold the attention very firmly. One is beginning to wonder how much longer Dvorak is destined to last. At times it seems as if the shade of Raff were already beckoning him to a comfortable seat by its side in the shady groves of limbo. Dvorak has all sorts of good qualities though his climaxes (as more than once in these variations) are often alarmingly suggestive of a German peasant's Sunday afternoon "Rauferei." But his style, though far enough from classic, has more of the old in it than of the new. The performance was capital.

Beethoven's "An die Hoffnung" has much that is great in it; the true Beethoven depth and poignancy of feeling, the true Beethoven ideality. I must say I prefer it in its original shape, with pianoforte accompaniment; Mr. Mottl's orchestration is beautiful enough in all conscience, but so radically un-Beethovenish as to seem out of place and intrusive. Mr. Van Rooy sang the song with true devotion, if with what seemed to me an excess of expression. There is a point beyond which poignancy of emotional expression becomes ignoble and maudlin; an artist gains nothing by almost visibly wallowing in his fervor. But, if Mr. Van Rooy's singing of this song was somewhat too much of a good thing, his rendering of "Wotan's Farewell" was both grand in its dramatic totality and exquisitely thought out in detail. Here we have a Wotan who does not invariably bellow, but knows how to color his voice and the phrase to harmonize with the emotion. He was rapturously applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: D'Albert, Overture to the Opera, "Der Rubin"; Schubert-Mottl, Fantasy in F minor; Jos. Suk, Eln Märchen; Schumann, Symphony, No. 2.
W. F. A.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

FOR SALE, One Seat in Row CC, on Floor

Address H. W. E., Boston Transcript. n 28

WANTED Seats for SYMPHONY CONCERT Saturday, Nov. 20, either 4 or 2 seats, floor or first balcony. Address F. K. D., Boston Transcript.

FOR SYMPHONY TICKET SALE For Saturday evening concerts, on floor—L. Price, $20. R. O. O., Boston Transcript. [A]

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS FOR SALE—Two excellent seats on floor, Address L. M. L., Boston Transcript. n 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

It Includes the First Vocal Music of the Season, Mr. Van Rooy Being the Singer.

For the first time this season, a Symphony programme includes vocal music, two opera selections being promised for Mr. Van Rooy, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan company. These selections are of quite opposite character. One is taken from Wagner, as might be expected, and is "Wotan's Farewell," with the relative fine music from the finale of "The Valkyrie." The other was to come from the old-fashioned, but still popular romantic opera of Marschner, "Hans Heiling," and show that gnome-king pleading for the love and faith of the mortal maiden with whom he had fallen in love. But, although Mr. Van Rooy picked out his songs for himself some months ago, he has just decided to withdraw this air and to substitute for it Beethoven's "An die Hoffnung."

The programme begins with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which is a familiar friend to all concert-goers, and the set of symphonic variations by Dvorak will constitute the fourth number.

NO MODERN MUSIC MASTERS A PLEA FOR THE CLASSICAL

By WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In these days of noise and orchestral turmoil it is a pleasure to turn back to the works of the classics to find in them peace, contentment and real beauty of form and expression.

I suppose it is because the present generation is fed so heartily upon modern music that they have no taste for the serenely beautiful of the older writers. Their palates must be tempted with more and more highly seasoned dishes with every musical offering. But where is it all to end? To what is this ever-increasing crescendo to lead? Will there be others following in the wake of the present day symbolists who will go even further than the Richard Strauss of the present?

I am a lover of the classics. There is a sweetness in Haydn, a strength in Beethoven, a beauty in Mozart and an intoxication in Schumann that is worth all of these latter-day musical saints, with their turmoils and strife.

Then, too, we of today have grown out of the olden time places for music. Now we cannot build a place too large, and when we get it built we cannot get music loud enough for it. A flute is a beautiful instrument, but its beauty is lost if it be played in a ten-acre lot. The oboe is full of charm and individuality, but it is robbed of all that makes it attractive if drowned in a roar of brass.

When we first played in New York our concerts were given in the old Steinway Hall. That was a well-nigh perfect place for orchestral music. It was not necessary to have a band of 150 men to be heard, nor to bombard the ears of our listeners with brassy thunderbolts to make "effects." There was an intimacy about these concerts that was delightful. I remember at one of the early concerts playing Beethoven's beautiful eighth symphony. Why, it was as if the master himself were speaking to us. We felt almost as if we were in a drawing-room full of friends and that we could nudge them with our elbows.

I know I have been criticised for my conversation, but I cannot help it. It has always seemed to me that the best is never too good to offer, and that if we can play the best acceptably we can do no better service to our friends.

Some day I think we shall tire of the hot spices and rich sauces with which we garnish our musical dishes, and long for something deeper and truer, something calmer; and then we shall remember that in by-gone days there was music worth listening to. And we shall get down the dusty folios and find inscribed upon them the names of Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn and the rest of the gods, and in their beauties we shall forget the banalities of the present.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The German basso, Anton van Rooy, was the soloist at last week's Symphony concerts, his selections being the recitative and song, "To Hope," by Beethoven, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from Wagner's "Die Walkure." Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme completed the program. Mr van Rooy's splendid interpretation of the Wotan music with the Grau opera company three seasons ago was a feature of the performance, and although the character is less impressive in concert guise the musical demands, if met, are about as satisfactory, and Mr van Rooy certainly equalled expectations, for the scene was given with telling effect. In the earlier number Beethoven's music was sung with a delicacy and tenderness that showed somewhat the remarkable sweetness of the singer's voice, which though ponderous when required, is capable of expressing the gentler sentiments with exquisite quality of tone and phrasing.

It is rarely that a basso of his power uses the mezzo-voice so true to pitch and thus ability makes Mr van Rooy's performance particularly enjoyable, because the quality of his work is evenly sustained. The vigorous declamations of the Wotan music were given with splendid resonance and warmth of tone and without a suggestion of harshness, and the whole number was sung far more melodiously than is usually heard from German artists. The singer was most cordially received.

Although there were no orchestral novelties on the program the concerts were interesting throughout, the contrasts in selection not running to extremes and being of a nature to please the general public. The beautiful "Italian" symphony by Mendelssohn received a masterly interpretation, the opening movement being notably buoyant in performance, the second part retaining the proper dignity, and the closing movement showing the almost perfect ensemble playing of the band in the wild "saltarello," which in some orchestras is merely an unmelodic tumult. The "Die Walkure" music also deserves mention for its sympathetic rendering.

The Dvorak symphonic variations tax the abilities of every contingent of a band, the rapid changes of the instrumental bodies being so frequent and difficult that the "conversations" are very apt to become muddled phrases. The figurations of the theme were given with precision and clarity, and although the work is chiefly interesting because of its puzzling nature, the interpretation was so smooth that it proved to be very enjoyable.

There will be no soloist this week and the program will be made up as follows: Overture to the opera, "Der Rubin," d'Albert; fantasy in F minor, Schubert-Mottl; "Ein Marchen," J. Suk; symphony No. 2, Schumann.

Mr. HAROLD

The Pianoforte

For many years the seats in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra have not been sold at the public auctions. Even at the rehearsals themselves no tickets are issued for these seats, but all are sold as admissions at the door. There are exactly 505 seats, and when these are gone the doors are closed. There is just this number of seats, and no one may stand.

It is seldom, indeed, that there are not 505 people on hand for these "rush" seats. Generally there are several hundred more than this number, and in instances not more than half the number of people who desire admission to the balcony can be accommodated.

The seats are sold at the door, and only one. This is to stand in line, and then when the doors are opened to pass through the turnstile one person at a time. When 505 people have passed through no others may pass.

It is no unusual thing to see people standing in line as early as 8:30 in the morning on the day of an afternoon rehearsal. The first to come take a position nearest the door, and those who follow stand in line behind them. The line zig-zags across and down the several wide steps which will hold several hundred people. Then it winds out, up Huntington av. the people standing in single file.

The soloist at the concert and the program to be rendered has, of course, the effect of making the crowds larger or smaller. Several times when there has been a great attraction the line has extended down the avenue, past the Children's hospital and around the corner of Gainsboro st. a whole long block away. Of course in these instances several hundred people have been unable to gain admission.

Last Friday there were between 50 and 75 people in line who were unable to gain admission to the hall. These were turned away and there was no other opportunity for them to secure seats. This was an unusually small number.

There have been several occasions when there have been more than twice as many people in line as eventually were admitted. Once several years ago, when the concerts and rehearsals were given in the old Music hall, there were more than 1000 people turned away. Meibach was the soloist.

As a rule the crowd does not begin to gather until 10 or 10:30 in the morning. Wrapped in their heaviest clothing and furs, scores of people have to wait three hours before the doors are opened. Many of them bring portable camp stools and books to read to pass away the time. Many also bring lunches, and the Symphony hall steps on some Friday noons take on the appearance of a picnicking place.

If it were not for these admissions to the balcony, the charge for which is a quarter, many people would be unable to ever hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. And at these morning seances on the hall steps there is doubtless gathered together as ardent a party of genuine music lovers as that which sits comfortably in season ticket seats in the more desirable portions of the hall.

MUSIC LOVERS STAND IN LINE

Must any Hundred "Rush" for Symphony Rehearsals, but Only the First 505 Can be Admitted.

CROWD WAITING FOR THE DOORS TO OPEN FOR A FRIDAY REHEARSAL AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                 |   |
|-----------------|---|
| D'ALBERT,       | OVERTURE to the OPERA, "The Ruby."  |
| SCHUBERT-MOTTL, | FANTASIA in F minor, op. 103.I. Allegro molto moderato.II. Largo maestoso.III. Allegro vivace.IV. Tempo primo.  |
| JOS. SUK,       | SUITE, "A Fairy Tale," op. 16.I. Love and grief of the Royal Children.II. Intermezzo. Folk Dance.III. Intermezzo. Funeral March.IV. Queen Runa's Curse. — Triumph of Love.(First time.) |
| SCHUMANN,       | SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.I. Sostenuto assai. — Allegro ma non troppo.II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio I. and Trio II.III. Adagio espressivo.IV. Allegro molto vivace.            |

MUSIC LOVERS STAND IN LINE

Many first Hundred "Rush" for Symphony Rehearsals, but Only the First 505 Can be Admitted.

CROWD WAITING FOR THE DOORS TO OPEN FOR A FRIDAY REHEARSAL AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'ALBERT,

OVERTURE to the OPERA, "The Ruby."

SCHUBERT-MOTTI,

FANTASIA in F minor, op. 103.

- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Largo maestoso.
- III. Allegro vivace.
- IV. Tempo primo.

JOS. SUK,

SUITE, "A Fairy Tale," op. 16.

- I. Love and grief of the Royal Children.
- II. Intermezzo. Folk Dance.
- III. Intermezzo. Funeral March.
- IV. Queen Runa's Curse. — Triumph of Love.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

- I. Sostenuto assai. — Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio I. and Trio II.
- III. Adagio espressivo.
- IV. Allegro molto vivace.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A New Suite, "A Fairy Tale," by a Bohemian, Josef Suk—As Son-in-Law of Dvorak, He Follows in His Footsteps.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....D'Albert
Fantasia in F minor.....Schubert-Mottl
Suite, "A Fairy Tale".....Suk
Symphony in C No. 2.....Schumann

Josef Suk, now in his 28th year, is the second violinist of the celebrated Bohemian String Quartet. He is also the son-in-law of Dvorak. He is also a composer. A graduate of the Prague Conservatory and a pupil of his father-in-law, he has written a Symphony, overtures, suites, chamber music and songs and piano pieces.

He took the material for this suite, "A Fairy Story," from the incidental music he wrote for a dramatic legend, "Raduz and Mahulena," which was produced at Prague in 1898. The suite was first played in 1901 at Heidelberg. It has been played at Chicago, New York and Cincinnati.

There is no need of telling the fairy story today, for the suite in the concert hall is without minute reference to stage action or incident and no especial emotion is aroused or confirmed by music suited to the scene. It is enough to say that "The Love and Grief of the Royal Children" is pictured; there is a polka which is followed by a funeral march; and in the Finale the curses of the wicked Queen come to nought and there is the apotheosis, the Triumph of Love.

Suk is loyal to Dvorak in this suite. He has studied well his lessons and has remembered as well as respected his teacher. Dvorak did this sort of thing better; and in his earlier years, at least, he had a more spontaneous flow of melody and more ideas. The first movement of Suk's suite is not distinguished by themes or by development. The announcement of the monarch's death is the most significant passage. The rest of the movement is without character. The polka is a polka fast enough, but it is not an irresistible, contagious dance. Smetana and Dvorak and an outsider named Rubinstein have left delightful examples of the abandon of the polka, which in its reckless pride must have a touch of vulgarity. Now there is the coarseness of strength and there is the coarseness of weakness. Suk errs on the side of weakness. Nor is the Funeral March one for a king, even in a fairy tale. The last movement is perhaps the most striking, but here, too, there was disappointment. A young man who has evidently studied earnestly and has some native talent, born of an eminently musical race, uses a large orchestra for the expression of his thoughts, brings out all the colors that should be used, invents his typical themes, goes to work—and what is the result? That which appears plausible in the score is without effect in the actual performance. There is no page of marked and original beauty; there is no haunting orchestral expression; you feel that the young man knows the use of his tools, but he has not created rich material on which to employ these tools. Compare with this long suite Smetana's "Visegrad" or "Moldau"; and you will recognize at once the difference between a poet and a man of industry, both Bohemians; the former for years was poor, obscure, sick, and at last deaf and mad; the latter was blessed with many advantages. But Smetana dreamed wondrous dreams and told them to the world by his orchestra.

D'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby," a fairy opera, is Wagnerian in expression and not without charming orchestral effects. The subject is an Eastern one, but there is little of Baghdad in the music. Some of the Russians, as Rimsky-Korsakoff in his "Scheherazade," have been more fortunate in persuading us occidentals that they have pictured the East in music. D'Albert's Eastern city is not over an hour from Bayreuth.

Schubert's Fantasia in its original form has gone the way of all flesh, and Mottl's orchestration is as the careful clothing of a corpse.

So that the Adagio and the second trio of the Scherzo in Schumann's Symphony triumphed easily. And there are few Adagios to be compared with this dramatic song of Schumann. If he had only had the courage to cut out that meaningless and incongruous little contrapuntal episode, too deliberately contrapuntal.

No composer could have felt aggrieved last night or complained that he was misunderstood. Mr. Gericke was impartial in his efforts and his sympathy. D'Albert's music was often splendidly sonorous merely through the wealth of orchestral tone. And what there is in Suk's suite was surely brought to the light. But there is so little that will bear the light.

Philip Hale.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Fairy-Tale Music Has a Large Showing, and an Unfamiliar Composer Will Be Heard.

Music for two "Maerchen," or fairy tales, will be heard at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert. To begin with, the first number will be L'Albert's prelude from the incidental music which he wrote for a comedy by Fr. Bebbel, who called it "The Ruby" and laid its scene in Bagdad, filling it with oriental personages, incidents, traditions, customs and credences. This prelude, which begins slowly and languorously, offers many changes of tempo and of mood, and seems to be colored generously picturesque, according to the fashions which the western mind has contrived for expressing its notions of eastern sentiment and fantasy.

The other, which is longer and more important, comes from the hand of Josef Suk, a prominent young Bohemian violinist and composer, born about 28 years ago, and a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a special pupil of Dvorak. He has been introduced to Chicago by Mr. Theodore Thomas through the medium of the suite that Mr. Gericke is now to present, which bears the opus number 16.

and is entitled "Ein Mäerchen." The Bohemian poet, Zeyer, wrote for the stage a kind of Arabian Night fairy play, which he called "Raduz and Mahulena," and for which Suk composed the relative music, subsequently revised and arranged by him in this concert suite, which bears the same name. This is the legend:

The Prince Raduz and the Princess Mahulena are happily in love, but their joy is soon interrupted and clouded by the death of his father. The introduction implies how their mutual content passes into a troublous condition, and is called "The Love and the Woe of the Royal Children." The general festivity, represented by an introduction leading to a folk-dance, both in an allegro polka measure, is followed by an interlude and the "mourning music," which comes in an andante sostenuto. As if the present grief were not enough, Queen Runa, the princess' mother, who is bitterly and cruelly opposed to the match, and appears to be a bad lot every way, emits severe and dreadful curses, which the favorable supernal powers proceed to thwart, so that peace, joy and good fortune are assured the princely pair. Wherefore the finale is named "Queen Runa's Curse and Love's Triumph." Such a tale might well touch the sympathies of both poet and composer, and the score seems to be filled with bright thoughts, quaint and felicitous fancies and rich-colored and ornate instrumentation.

Between these two pieces of play-book music will be placed Mottl's erudite, skilful, and always approved orchestral arrangement of Schubert's F minor fantasy, opus 103.

The symphony, put at the end of the programme, will be Schumann's second. This, composed during a long period of physical suffering and spiritual trouble, shows the struggle in which its author was involved, by its restless changefulness, its sudden alternation of moods, its shifting thought, and its grim determination to "win out" to freedom and safety. The first movement is not easy to get into touch with and to follow, for it is erratic, sudden, and apparently contradictory; but progress with even step is easier after that. The scherzo, peculiar in having two trios, has its more comfortable and lighter episodes, the adagio is beautiful, peaceful and deep, and the finale has encouragement, confidence and the ordered strength of successfully asserted self-control, and new command of external conditions.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV 30, 1902.

SIXTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Last week's Symphony program was the first of the season in which there was no soloist, the selections being as follows: Prelude to D'Albert's opera, "The Ruby"; fantasia in F minor, Schubert-Mottl; suite, "A Fairy Tale," Josef Suk, first time here, and Schumann's second symphony. The fantastic prelude is a pleasing bit of orchestration, oriental in character, with charming arpeggios for strings, and later for the harp, forming the background for the extension of three themes, motifs used in the opera. The piece was given very smoothly, the earlier passages by the brass instruments being of beautiful quality, the string and harp arpeggios clear and in perfect accord, and the slow tempo at the close displaying the precision in ensemble playing which is so noticeable under Mr Gericke's conductorship.

The Schubert-Mottl fantasia was received with great favor, the romantic quality of the composition apparently appealing to the auditors more successfully than did the operatic prelude of D'Albert. The woodwinds practically carried off the honors in the fantasia, with the clarinets and flutes, which are very prominent in the score, in the lead. The themes in the second part were admirably set forth by the whole orchestra, and in the lively third movement, with its dainty scherzo, the strings were all that one could wish, and throughout the whole work the strange modulations were given smoothly and not made unduly discordant; even in the fortissimo passages.

"A Fairy Tale," by Josef Suk, was not all sunshine and will-o'-the-wisp reveals, for the first movement represented love and grief, and the third movement was a funeral march. The other two parts, though, were of a joyous character. The various themes cleverly suggest persons and incidents in the legend, and in the opening movement there is a peculiar style of rhythm and some phrasing given the clarinet that is very odd and quite original in treatment. In the first part the solo violin passages were skilfully played by Mr Kneisel, and the long sustained tremolo work of all the violin contingent reflected great credit upon that competent body. The weird horn phrases and the odd clarinet measures were excellent in tonality, and the broader themes of the funeral march comprising the third movement were splendidly resonant and sonorous. This latter part is very elaborately orchestrated, and the mournful intermittent melody introduced by the cellos is singularly interesting. It was excellently played. The contrasts of the choral and the march were preserved well by the different contingents.

In the folk dance, the second part of the suite, the orchestra played superbly. The vivacious harmonies are pretty evenly distributed for the different instruments and the interpretations were delightful throughout. The closing movement depicts the triumph of love over an evil spell, a conflict in fortissimo ending in pianissimo and representing the victory of the tender passion. The different themes are chiefly made up of earlier motifs and their new combinations are very cleverly orchestrated. This final part was satisfactorily illustrated and at the close there was a prompt expression of appreciation from the audience. A sympathetic interpretation of the Schumann symphony closed the program. The difficult second movement, with its rapid rhythms, was played unusually well.

This week's program will contain two novelties, the overture to "Les Francs Juges," Berlioz, and Vincent d'Indy's suite op 24. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, playing Bach's A minor violin concerto. The concerts will close with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Balance season, 3 seats, 1st balcony, 2nd row, left centre, near corner. Best situation for seeing and hearing. Price moderate, especially if taken together. Address R. A. K., Boston Transcript. [A]

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Eugen D'Albert: Prelude to "Der Rubin."
Franz Schubert: Fantasia in F minor, opus 103.
(Scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
Josef Suk: Suite, "A Fairy Tale," opus 16.
(First time in Boston.)
Robert Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61.

D'Albert's "Rubin" prelude sounds better and better, the more one hears it. For one thing, what a brilliant imitation of Berlioz the lively movement is, and how few composers have imitated Berlioz in anything but instrumentation! The thing has the true romantic coloring, a poetic flavor such as one does not too often meet with. Neither does the music take itself too seriously; it bears in mind the Oriental quality of the text of the opera, and adapts itself to that. It was beautifully played.

As for Schubert's F minor Fantasia, in Mottl's orchestral dress, Oh, come, now! There is no sane writing about that sort of thing; outside of the cloud-land of boredom it does not exist. "It seems to me that one must be very German, to enjoy the whole of Schubert," said some one once to Hans von Bülow. "What do you mean by 'very German'?" counter-questoned that great man, "do you mean, impervious to ennui?" Probably no composer of really first-rate genius in the whole list could be so terrific a bore, when he gave his mind to it, as Franz Schubert. In this Fantasia he surpasses himself. It makes you want to throw hard, sharp, hurting things at conductor, orchestra, ushers, everybody. Perhaps something penal might be done with it; then its "hidden use" might be made manifest.

Josef Suk's Suite is one of those compositions that make you sympathize with the traditional Englishman listening to an American joke. You have a sort of helpless feeling, and do not know whether to laugh or cry. You are perfectly willing to do either, whichever will best please the composer; but you are not sure which he expects of you. In other words, "it is a composition to make a programme-book an unmixed blessing." I wish I had read Mr. Hale's description of the play, to which this suite originally served as incidental music, before hearing the music itself—which I unluckily did not. Had I done so, I might have got a more definite, certainly a more lasting, impression from the music. As it is, on reading the description next morning, what impression I got has become singularly muddled. I took the title—"A Fairy Tale"—quite innocently, expecting some of that rather grown-up sort of children's music to which the modern romantic school from Schumann up, has accustomed us. I was even prepared for a Humperdinckian fulness of nursery orchestration. Listening to the new composition in this frame of mind, I found it very charming indeed; now and then, to be sure, I might be moved to stare a little at a certain portentiousness in the style; but I did not let that disturb me overmuch, for I remembered that we were in the twentieth century, and that, in our modern children's music, even the smallest babykin cannot have a touch of tummy-ache without the orchestra's feeling a pang as when a giant dies. When it came to the funeral march, I detected what seemed to me so thoroughly genial a vein of farce-comedy that I began to think Mr. Suk a very superior person indeed. And now I take up Mr. Hale's programme-book, and find to my astonishment that there are ninety-nine chances to one that the whole thing is meant quite seriously, even "hoch-poetisch!" Mr. Oskar Nedbal helps Mr. Hale to speak of "original harmonic reconstruction"; egad, if he means some of the harmonies in the funeral march, he is right enough! There is one of the spots where I thought the laugh came in; and now I verily believe I ought to have cried—especially as it was evident to the meanest comprehension that any old-school harmony teacher would have boo-hoed outright. Oh, why did I not look first, and see what emotion I was expected to thrill with? As it is, I cannot give any intelligent criticism of this composition; I must wait till I hear it again. For one thing, it struck me as being very beautifully scored indeed, with something more and higher than mere routine skill, with a true and even original ear for tone-coloring.

By hard and earnest listening one could see that the first two movements of Schumann's C major symphony were exquisitely played; but the non-acoustics of the hall prevented their making any effect whatever. With the Adagio it was better in one way; still worse in another; the music here is so broadly written that it could not help producing some effect, even though the thin, juiceless tone of the orchestra made that effect just the wrong one. Many parts of the Finale are more brilliantly, I had almost said, more normally scored, and this movement was the only really effective one. But it is much to be feared that Symphony Hall has put virtually the whole of Schumann's orchestral works out of court; they are as good as dead for Boston.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture to "Les Francs-Juges," Opus 3 (first time at these concerts); Bach, concerto for violin and orchestra, in A minor; Vincent d'Indy, suite, Opus 24 (first time at these concerts); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the solo violinist.

W. F. A.

Symphony Concerts 2 SEATS FIRST ROW FIRST BALCONY for sale balance of season. H. E. S., 3700 Washington St. Tel. 561-6. 3t[A]: d 18

SYMPHONY CONCERTS—3 Seats First Balcony, Second Row, Left Centre, near corner; desirable for seeing and hearing; $20 each; less if taken together. Address R. A. K., Boston Transcript. [A]:

BOSTON MUSIC LOVERS HEAR WORK OF NEW COMPOSER.

Overture to the opera, "Der Rubin".....D'Albert Fantasy in F minor.....Schubert-Mottl
Eln Marchen.....Jos. Suk
Symphony No. 2.....Schumann

A purely orchestral programme. We might have these more frequently, for our orchestra is brilliant enough to give its concerts without the aid of assisting artists save those which unite with it in concertos, and our public is so earnest in its orchestral studies that the absence of soloists is not felt in this city as it is elsewhere.

D'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby" was finely played and the important harp part lost nothing in the hands of Mr. Schuecker. But it is an Arabian subject treated in a German fashion; a Teutonic Oriental is not the acme of fitness. Rubinstein was the only northern composer who managed to catch something of the tropical glow in operatic work (and in cantata as well), and his "Feramors" music is much more striking than this prelude. We understand that the scientists are beginning to manufacture artificial rubies at present; possibly this is one of them.

Some of Schubert's music is fading a little, and the Fantasia in F minor begins to call rather for the blue pencil than for orchestral extension and elaboration. Nevertheless it has its moments of great beauty and, were it less ambitious, it would be a great work. It received a most worthy interpretation and the excellent clarinet-playing and the brilliant trills of the deepest strings were technical points to dwell upon with enthusiasm.

After this a brand-new Bohemian composer made his first bow to a Boston public. Joseph Suk's "Fairy Tale" was a mixture of Grieg and Humperdinck, and had several "Peer Gint-y" touches without, however, attaining the directness of the Norwegian's story.

Suk is a young man, and a Bohemian, which makes many future musical successes probable, but he has been grasped by the demon of modern orchestration, and his fairy story is not always enhanced by the search after striking tone-color. There were some romantic effects in the opening movement, picturing the love and grief of the royal children. The love-motive (for this modern work must needs have these clues) was delightfully performed by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and was a theme of true poetic spirit. The grief of the same couple was ushered in by the ugly tones of the muted horns, which were very much in evidence during the last part of this movement. Even harmonics upon the violins were employed at the close of this movement, and showed that the composer had studied his Wagner.

The second movement was a polka (the "pulka" was invented in Bohemia), and was tuneful and very intelligible. There is nothing of loftiness or of subtlety in a polka, and its marked rhythm idealizes far less poetically than the loftier strains of the polonaise, or the dreamy swing of the waltz. There was, however, a bluff heartiness in the chief orchestral treatments of the movement, and it may stand as the polka outside of the ball-room.

The third movement was a funeral march which contained some original touches, but was scarcely as lofty as a Smetana would have made it. The final movement, however, gave a fine climax to the work, and the working up of the motives in this was the best part of the work. Altogether, if one does not find the inspiration of Smetana's national music in this work of his follower, one does discover a mastery of the modern orchestra and enough of romance and poetry to promise good things.

The second Schumann symphony is not counted the finest of the five (counting the "overture, scherzo and finale" as a symphony without a slow movement), yet its finale is grand enough to carry it to the greatest success. Heard directly after a modern work, Schumann's faults of scoring were emphasized. One noticed, for example, the lack of orchestral contrast between the chief and the subordinate theme, in the first movement, and the simplicity of wood-wind color when it was employed. But one also noticed more melody, more thought, more romance, in each movement, than one gets in a dozen works of the most recent manufacture.

The scherzo is impetuous but not playful. Its two trios afford a double contrast that is always effective. One wonders why Beethoven did not think of this form after using a single trio twice over, as he did in the scherzo of the seventh symphony or the minuet of the fourth. And how much deeper that adagio is than the lace-handkerchief adagios that Mendelssohn gave in his symphonies; sincerity does manage to win, over elegance, in the long run.

But the true Schumann is only fully revealed in the finale. Here there is struggle, titanic combat, and final victory. The dual Schumann is here clearly recognized. Not a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde duality, but two oppositional natures in one man, nevertheless. A bold and audacious character, and a shy and timid one. Schumann called the radical—"Florestan," and named the poetic dreamer—"Eusebius." One finds the former in the chief theme of this rondo, and the latter in that ineffably sweet countertheme that follows the pauses in the tumult.

The interpretation was a noble one; we could have wished for a little longer hold upon the impressive pauses above-mentioned, but the bold syncopations (and Schumann was the most extensive syncopationist, short of "rag-time" writers, that ever existed) were finely caught up, and those odd triplets of half-notes were finely accentuated even to their final tumultuous appearance as a kettle-drum solo. And the strings played—but it is unnecessary to rhapsodize about the strings in our orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

FRANZ KNEISEL.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |             |   |
|-------------|---|
| BERLIOZ,    | OVERTURE, "Les Francs Juges." op. 3.(First time at these concerts.)   |
| J. S. BACH, | CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,No. 1.I. Allegro ma non troppo.II. Andante.III. Allegro assai.Cadenza by HELLMESBERGER.(First time at these concerts.) |
| LISZT,      | SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament andTriumph."  |
| BEETHOVEN,  | SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55I. Allegro con brio.II. Marcia Funebre: Adagio assai.III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.IV. Finale: Allegro molto.               |

Soloist:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

FRANZ KNEISEL.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE, "Les Francs Juges." op. 3.
(First time at these concerts.)

J. S. BACH,

CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,
No. 1.

I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro assai.

Cadenza by HELLMESBERGER.

(First time at these concerts.)

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55

I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia Funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Franklin Dec 8, 1902

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventh symphony concert was given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Hector Berlioz: Overture to "Les Francs-Juges," opus 3.

(First time at these concerts.)

Johann Sebastian Bach: Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in A minor.

(First time at these concerts.)

Franz Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Ludwig van Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the solo violinist.

When Berlioz's "Francs-Juges" overture was first given in this city—at an Orchestral Union Concert, under Mr. Carl Zerrahn, on Feb. 14, 1866—the late John Sullivan Dwight wrote of it:

"But the novelty and point of curiosity this time was the famous Overture by Berlioz, 'Les Francs-Juges.' . . . The opening is certainly impressive and the thing grows with real positiveness of purpose. You can imagine the prisoner led in blindfolded, his horror when he sees the awful preparations of the court, the sinking of his heart at the relentless 'No!' of his judges, solemnly and terribly conveyed by those blasts of trombones, ophicleid, etc., and there is much of logical and interesting working up of themes, as well as coloring. But long before the end it seemed to have become senseless and insufferable noise. We felt as if it were the rankest materialism in Art, materialism without the charm of aught naive, spontaneous or honest. Still we can endure the noise again, for the sake of more closely noting its original points, particularly the instrumentation. We hope it will be repeated some day, so that it may be better known."

I remember this performance quite well; and I doubt whether many of us Bostonians have heard another since—until last Saturday evening. My reason for quoting Dwight's criticism is the curiously different way he looked at the work from that of most musicians today. To him the damning point in the overture was a "materialism without the charm of aught naive, spontaneous or honest." And, by the way, what eternal youth in criticism has not that seeing naught of honesty in those with whom we differ! Dwight saw no honesty in Berlioz; it was not a year ago that I found a more modern critic deploring the "insincerity" of Mendelssohn (in his "Elijah"). But, as I have said, this is by the way. My main point is this: I am pretty sure that the damning item most musicians found last Saturday evening in the "Francs-Juges" was by no means a lack of honest naiveté, nor a too gross materialism, but simply the ridiculously trivial second theme—a tune one would have thought inspired by Pleyel, filtered through Heinrich Marschner. Of course, we know it was not so inspired; for, as Mr. Hale tells us, Berlioz wrote it before he ever came to Paris, and that was before he had had anything to do with Weber's music (so, a fortiori, he could not have had anything to do with Marschner's).

The rest of the overture is not bad at all. True, one could easily account for Berlioz's enthusiasm for it cooling off a bit in later years—after "Le Roi Lear," "Benvenuto Cellini," and "Le Carnaval romain." But there is a deal of force in it nevertheless. One thing, however, could not but strike me last Saturday evening; the overture was played for the most part in the wrong spirit, as if it had been what Dwight called it, a "logical and interesting working up of themes," instead of a piece of sheer musical romantic melodrama. Its fundamental inspiration is really of the rankest 1830 sort; it is a musical counterpart of the elder Dumas's "Tour de Nesle" and other Porte-Saint-Martin (we should say, Bowery) melodramas. It should be played with an enormous "panache," with eyes in fine frenzy rolling, with a charcoal-burner faith in the dramatic efficacy of goosellesh. Then might that niminy-piminy little second theme put on quite a different air; look at it a minute, and you will see that this theme impersonates the white-robed persecuted heroine of melodrama, that remarkable young person whose soul is made of blanc liquide. Now, a clever actress can make that heroine very impressive indeed, can turn her inherent ridiculousness to a source of endless delicious tears—on Browning's principle, perhaps, that "The histrionic truth is in the natural lie." And I have a strong suspicion that a born melodramatic conductor can do as much with this second theme of Berlioz's. Mr. Gericke throws his whole weight in quite another direction, upon the points which this overture undoubtedly has in common with reputable works in that form in the German repertory; and that is just where he loses the whole gist of the thing. What the "Francs-Juges" overture has in common with reputable classic compositions is of very secondary importance; its true gist lies in its differences from them. Play it in the dare-devil spirit in which it was written, and I will go ball that that second theme will not remind you of the virtuous Pleyel—no matter how much it may make you weep for persecuted virtue in the abstract. It is well to remember at times that you do not improve a sow's ear by trying to make a silk purse out of it; and a good sow's ear may be a capital thing in its way.

Liszt's "Tasso" was very beautifully played, in one sense; in another, not so well by a good deal. With all the wondrous beauty of color, clearness of phrasing, elegance, balance, the performance sounded in the main rather apologetic than otherwise. It seemed to say: "See, this music of Liszt's is not the incoherent stuff you may have thought it; it has form, coherency, common sense!" But come, now, seriously: who in this year of grace 1902 cares a jot whether Franz Liszt had form, coherency and common sense or not? Liszt was a wild and woolly—no, I mean, a wild and long-haired romanticist of the 1830 period, and we care a great deal more about his wildness and his long hair and his romanticism than we do about his music's virtues.

The "Eroica" was admirably, wonderfully played; with both clearness and power. Especially grand was the rendering of the Funeral March; here is a movement whose weightful message can be imparted, is even best imparted, without screaming! And note that both Berlioz's "Frances-Juges" and Liszt's "Tasso" were played just as admirably, in just the same spirit. Mr. Gerike did them too much honor.

Mr. Kneisel had a happy inspiration in selecting the Bach A minor concerto for performance. In the first place, the orchestral score is one of the most nearly complete Bach ever wrote, and requires comparatively little done to it to make it fit for performance—which little Mr. Kneisel himself did with excellent musician-like judgment and savoir faire. In the next (and most important) place, Bach's melodic style renders his music more germane to performance by a solo instrument (notably, a solo violin) than any written since his day, save by Mozart or Haydn. In this concerto the solo violin does not seem a weakly, unwelcome intruder, a parvenu in high orchestral society who has to be handled with gloves, but the veritable master of the whole situation. The beauty of the work is beyond words; such a combination of robustness and delicacy, of strength and facile gentleness, is hardly to be found in our more strenuous days. Then take the lordly high-breeding of the thing; it makes you feel old Johann Sebastian to have been one of those "truly great" who do not take things seriously. Note, for instance, how Hellmesberger's cadenza did not injure it a jot! How many modern compositions of the rank and calibre of this concerto are there, think you, to which a Hellmesberger could write a fitting cadenza? But this one of Bach's endures it well; it has the noblesse oblige of a Russian grandee, who gives cordial welcome to any guest who is only properly dressed, and treats him as an equal as long as he is under his roof. Write a cadenza elegantly, and a Bach concerto welcomes it, without asking about its "profundity"—it itself has profundity enough for both! Mr. Kneisel's playing of the concerto seemed to me perfect in every respect; he is to me the ideal Bach player. I have heard and read of late no end about the indignity it is to Bach to play him "with academic stiffness," of how it belittles him to show anything of the "pigtail" in your playing. With which I heartily agree, as far as regards academic stiffness; I would no more have Bach played with academic, or any other kind of, stiffness than I would Chopin. But, when it comes to the "pigtail," I object; Bach wore a pigtail, he wrote with a pigtail, and I would have him played with a pigtail. (Of course, when I say that Bach wore a pigtail, I know perfectly well that he wore nothing of the sort, but a full-bottomed, Louis XIV. wig; but the principle is the same.) I have no sympathy with putting a later-nineteenth-century spirit into Bach's music, with playing him as if he were Chopin, or Liszt, or Tchaikovsky. I wish him played with a pigtail—only, with a pigtail as to the manner born, with a pigtail elegantly worn, a pigtail of which the wearer is himself unconscious. Mr. Kneisel fills that bill, to my mind, better than anyone else I have heard—not excepting the very greatest. He was applauded and recalled as he deserved.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony No. 10, in D major; Tchaikovsky, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor; César Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Liszt, march of the Holy Three Kings, from "Christus" (first time). Mr. Harold Randolph will be the pianist.

Rehearsal and concert come on Friday, Dec. 19, and Saturday, Dec. 20; there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week.

W. F. A.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The seventh Symphony program opened with the overture to "The Fehmic Judges," by Berlioz, the A minor violin concerto by Bach following with Mr Franz Kneisel as soloist. These two numbers were given for the first time at these concerts. The other selections were the Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mr Kneisel played the Bach concerto effectively, but the work is of so serious, or rather so formal, in nature that aside from the cadenza in the last movement there is little to attract the general ear. Its themes are simple in character, the figurations are less showy than is usually the case in violin concertos, and its general structure shows a contrast of light matter given to the solo instrument with a background of more solid figures for the accompaniment by the orchestra. The violin part is almost continuous and is generally conventional in style.

In the first movement Mr Kneisel's impeccable fingering made the moderate passages delightful to the ear, although not appealing to one's emotions, and the scholarly and serious interpretation was received with due respect and mild enthusiasm by the auditors. The second part, which was broader in scope and more brilliant in style, was more warmly appreciated, and in the finale the difficult cadenza aroused some real enthusiasm. Mr Kneisel's work in sustained melody, while playing chord passages for accompaniment, was very artistic, and, in fact, he illumined a rather dry musical subject by his skill as a performer.

The Berlioz overture is a tremendously effective work, opening with a passionate display in fortissimo between the brasses and bassoons followed at intervals by striking orchestral effects in which figure peculiar counter themes and ascending passages, broken accompaniments by the strings against the melody played by the wood winds, a solo, pianissimo, for the bass drum and a finale in crescendo that is rather startling in its nature. The piece is really "a hymn of despair" vividly depicted in tone coloring, which though three-quarters of a century old, holds its place successfully with scores of the present day. The D-flat major phrases were splendidly set forth by the bassoons and brasses, the oboes and flutes sang their quaint little measures with due mournful suggestiveness, the various string bodies "shuddered" sympathetically and the big bass drum was heard to special advantage as a solo instrument, being pounded pianissimo. The finale, though tremendously complicated in its scoring, showed the ability of each contingent to be of the highest order for the rude, passionate music was played with an intensity, precision and authority that made the close of the overture overwhelmingly vivid in illustrating Berlioz' ideas.

"Tasso," Liszt's symphonic poem, with its sad, wailing phrases and tragic motifs of the first part and the joyous, triumphant tone of the finale, received an adequate interpretation, and the

FRANZ KNEISEL'S TRIUMPH AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, "Les Francs Juges," op. 3....Berlioz
(First time at these concerts.)

Concerto in A minor, for Violin and Orchestra .....J. S. Bach
No. 1. ....Dec 8. 02

I. Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Adante.

III. Allegro assai.

Cadenza by Hellmesberger.

(First time at these concerts.)

Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph".....Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica.".....Liszt

op. 55.....Beethoven

An interesting programme, but too long, and not always in best contrast; the grief of Tasso, for example, somewhat neutralized the effect of the sorrow of Beethoven's Funeral March, and the bombast of the Fehmic judges detracted a little from the pomp of the Tassonian triumph. But there was much to praise and to enjoy in the two hours of music of Saturday.

Music mutates quite as much as the times" are said to do in the old Latin proverb. It sounded strange to read (in the programme book) that Berlioz once thought the overture to the "Fehmic Judges" full of terror. To the modern auditor this work seemed to have something of the circus sawdust attached to it, and contained many tawdry moments. In its best effects it was something like Meyerbeer's "Benediction of the Polgnards," from "The Hugenots." Berlioz himself has been far more "terrifying" in the orgie that ends the Childe Harold Symphony, and especially in the "March to Execution" of the "Symphonie Fantastique." But at the time that the overture was composed all this roar of brasses, the sharp contrasts, the strange interruptions, the sudden outbursts, the muffled taps of bass drum, were new, and this mixture of pain, pathos and truculence was wonderful pioneer work for a young composer who had only arrived at his Op. 3.

It was a strange contrast to go from this sensational picture to the cool, clear counterpoint of Bach. Mr. Kneisel deserves thanks from every music-lover for bringing to our concert platform a worthy addition to the scant repertoire of violin concertos. It must be borne in mind, however, that "concerto," with Bach, has not the same meaning as with the 19th century composers. With Mozart ever-welcome "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven was given in the usual artistic manner; the contrasts in the first movement being admirably balanced, the funeral march showing an impressive solemnity and the charming scherzo being delightfully vivacious in character, with a glorious outburst of melody and the end of the work.

The orchestra will be away this week. Next week's program will have Mr Harold Randolph as soloist in Tschalkowsky's B flat minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral selections will be Haydn's D major symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" and the "March of the Holy Three Kings" from Liszt's oratorio, "Christ."

the concerto began to be a three-movement sonata for orchestra combined with one or more solo instruments; but with Handel and Bach the concerto was still a free species of chamber music, built on contrapuntal lines.

Naturally, therefore, this work was retouched before coming to the symphonic stage, and to Hellmesberger, and to Mr. Kneisel himself, much praise must be given for the careful manner (worthy of Robert Franz) in which the additions have been made. Add to this the fact that Mr. Kneisel was just the artist to perform such a work, just the man who could appreciate and portray its refinement and its intellectuality, and we can readily see that this was the most successful part of a fine concert.

We have never heard our great concertmeister play so gloriously; he seemed to love the work, to be in his chosen element. The cadenza was full of great difficulties, but these were never obtruded to public notice; they were conquered so that one thought of the music, not of the virtuosity of the performer. So that, for once, a cadenza became a pleasure.

The whole idea of the cadenza is a bad inheritance from older days. In the Mozartean epoch it was customary to make a great deal out of the improvisational powers of an artist, and in a concerto he was obliged to display these to the utmost by taking some figures of the work and developing them with all possible virtuosity. In later times the improvisation disappeared and a carefully prepared display of technique took its place. It is a significant straw that Beethoven, in his fourth piano-concerto, prayed that the cadenza might be made short; in his fifth command "make no cadenza here but go right on"; that Brahms twice avoided the cadenza; that even Mendelssohn took it away from its regular place in the coda, in his violin concerto.

This particular cadenza was not unlike Bach's Chaconne, in its chords, its harmonized effects (for viola alone), and its broad work upon the G string. The double-stopping was remarkable, and as regards purity of tone, of intonation, of phrasing, criticism of the severest kind could not find a flaw, and the artist was recalled over and over again, and was given a laurel wreath, which he had fairly won.

"Tasso" was given with great brilliancy. Liszt, having at last come out from under the Wagner shadow, begins to impress one as a great modern composer. He has all the orchestral glow of a Berlioz and considerably more cohesiveness and melody. The work of the bass-clarinete was exquisitely clear-toned in this number, and the climax of triumph was splendidly wrought up by the orchestra. Time is settling accounts in this matter; once upon a time Raff and even Gade had the public ear more frequently than Liszt; now Liszt is growing while the others are fading very fast.

It may sound very heterodox to say it, but the "Heroic" symphony is an unequal work, and some parts of it are also fading. The trio of the funeral march does not seem much stronger than the trio in Chopin's similar march, which is the greatest piano "Marcia Funebre," as this one of Beethoven is the greatest for orchestra—the "Siegfried Funeral Music" not being a march in the true sense of the word. The finale is not exactly a "most lame and impotent conclusion," but it is not inspiring and not especially fitting. If the ghastly scherzo of the fifth symphony were in the "heroic" it would fit better, and if the lofty finale of the fifth symphony ended the "heroic" instead, one would not be quite so mystified regarding its meaning. The first entrance of the heroic trombones into symphonic music took place in the fifth symphony finale.

The reading was excellent. Mr. Gerlicke gets over that "crux" of the entrance of the horn on the tonic against the harmony of violins on the dominant chord, by causing the latter to play down to an inaudible point, so that one only hears the horn. With all due respect for this reading, we believe that it would be better to grasp the nettle and allow the conflicting harmonies to sound. Beethoven may have meant to indicate that his hero was untrammelled by rule and could defy even the laws of harmony, or he may have intended some other expression of unconventionality, but he certainly desired the two warring harmonies to sound out, just as much as Richard Strauss intended two opposing chords to be heard at the end of his "Zarathustra."

One may chronicle the excellent oboe-playing in the funeral march, the almost perfect horn-playing in the Scherzo-trio, and the pizzicato syncopations of the finale, and may rejoice that Beethoven's love of Liberty led him to write such noble movements as the first three of the "Heroic Symphony."

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

FOR SALE, One Seat in Row CC, on Floor

Address H. W. E., Boston Transcript.
FM[A]

n 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

An Early and Unfamiliar Berlioz Overture Will Be Revived in the Concert of Saturday.

Among the very first compositions of Hector Berlioz were two dramatic overtures, "Waverley" and "Les Francs Juges," the former plainly derived from Scott's novel and the other probably suggested by the scene of the Vehmgericht in his "Anne of Geierstein," that dread secret tribunal being the equivalent of the Free Judges, whose sessions were held in many parts of Europe, their sentences and executions being never divulged. At the outset of his career Berlioz laid down the theory that every composition should have its acknowledged plan and programme, by which to follow it understandingly. In "Waverley" the course of the story is obvious enough, but in "Les Francs Juges" there are only suggestion and allegory. The sustained adagio at the beginning may symbolize the solemnity, silence and mystery of the court revealed to the accused when he is allowed to free his eyes and consider his surroundings. This opening is in F minor, resolving into a majestic theme in D flat, which may forecast the attitude of the court. Various important changes of mood and mode follow, which can be interpreted as the agonized petitions of the prisoner, their curt, harsh denials, the more pitiful consideration of his state and the clear, resolute ultimate decision. But fancy must draw from what one has read or heard of those strange courts and compose his own imaginary scenes by what the music gives him. The scheme is broad and minute, and indicates that from the outset of his career Berlioz had an almost unique mastery of instrumental values; for it is full of special instructions, marking strong contrasts between the personal attributes and attitudes expressed in the different treatment of the several choirs, and dwelling particularly on the effects provided for the drums, cymbals, etc. The overture is often heard in Europe, but no Boston performance is noticed since one in 1866.

A suite by Vincent d'Indy was announced for this programme, but it has been withdrawn in favor of Liszt's poem "Tasso," originally intended for the pianoforte and then rewritten for orchestra. Liszt's purpose was, as he has said, to depict the sad and bitter episodes of Tasso's life, followed by those when favor and honor were bestowed upon him, and finally to represent the apotheosis of his genius. At first the idea is of Tasso's shade still dwelling as a power and inspiration in Venice, for a gondolier theme, upon which the bard of the wharf and the boat were wont to improvise their paraphrases of his cantos, is its informing feature. Then come intimations of festivity and joy at Ferrara, through which the poet passes, solitary, sad and bowed down, soon to meet success and reward at Rome. The finale stands for triumph, but in rather a blaring and pompous style.

Mr. Kneisel will be the soloist, and play Bach's first violin concerto with orchestra, and the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven.

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

An Extravagant Overture by Berlioz at the Symphony Concert—Mr. Kneisel Soloist—Mr. Kocian's Violin Recital in the Afternoon.

The seventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gerlicke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture: "The Fehmle Judges".....Berlioz
Concerto in A minor for violin.....Bach
Symphonic Poem: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph".....Liszt
Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven

It is easy to say that the overture to "The Fehmle Judges" is one of the sins of Berlioz's youth. It is something more than that. It gives an insight into the character of this extraordinary man; it is a note to the history of romanticism, which was influenced mightily by the thought of Napoleon, Scott, and Byron; and it well deserved a performance by the Symphony Orchestra. (Both this overture and Bach's concerto were played for the first time at these concerts.)

This overture was written for an opera which never was given, and we know little about the subject of the story except that the Fehmle Judges were introduced in some way or another. The libretto had nothing to do with Scott's "Anne of Geierstein," which was not published until 1829, the year after the overture was first performed. From fragments preserved we know that the libretto was full of horrors; there was a tyrant, there was an abducted maiden beloved by the exiled Prince, etc., etc. No doubt the story would be heartily laughed at in this calmer age.

But Berlioz took it all seriously. Here was a chance for him to shock the professors, to frighten women, to make an opera-audience sit up. He himself wrote to the librettist that there was nothing so "terribly frightful" as this overture. "It is a hymn to despair, but the most despairing despair that one can imagine, horrible and tender." He dwelt on the horror of it. And the overture did make a sensation at the time. Even the orchestral players were astonished and half-frightened while they rehearsed it, and when they played it in concert. But remember all this was in 1828, and since then we have all supped full of musical horrors.

Today the overture seems for the most part a curious mixture of the bombastic and the weakly trivial. But in 1828 Lara and the Corsair were heroes; young men scowled at the world and scorned conventional success and accompanying respectability; they assumed an "air fatal"; revolutionary theories charged the air they breathed; there was a wild desire to do something new, strange, monstrous.

There was the sublime, pathetic foolishness of youth. There was the extravagance in beliefs, theories, love, which after all enters into the savor of life.

And this overture was typical of the Berlioz of that period. He learned to express himself with more force; he mastered the resources of the orchestra so that all who came after him, Wagner, Liszt, Richard Strauss, the ultra-modern Russians, all, are his disciples; he was disillusionized in certain ways; he knew sorrow and neglect and scorn; but even in the darkest days, just before his death, he had the same extravagant enthusiasm for art, as he understood it, as when, not yet intimately acquainted with his own genius, he wrote the overture to "The Fehmle Judges." And we remember this when we find nearly 75 years after the first performance that the music is not nearly so intense as Berlioz thought it; when we are tempted to smile at the passages that struck terror at the famous declamation of the brass or at the solo for the big drum; when we are inclined to yawn at passages that were to him tender.

Bach's concerto is an excellent work of its kind, and it was played by Mr. Kneisel with the beauty of tone and the general display of taste that have long marked his performance. Whether the work be wholly suitable for a great concert hall and with the accompaniment of such a body of strings is another question. It was written as chamber music for the pleasure of a Prince who was musical and has his own small band. Some insist, as in Leipzig, that a piano should assist the accompanying strings, otherwise the music sounds thin and incomplete. Mr. Kneisel realized the danger and strengthened the accompaniment where there was need. The introduction of any cadenza in a work of this nature is a subject for discussion. Mr. Kneisel played the cadenza by Hellmesberger, and played it exquisitely. What charm there was in the two fast movements—and they might well have gone at a still faster pace—was rather in the performance than in the music itself. The allegros of Bach's period sound more and more alike as the years roll on. The slow movements, many of them, still hold their beauty. Mr. Kneisel was heartily applauded and a wreath was handed to him.

Liszt's "Tasso" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony are well-known to all concert-goers and do not call for extended comment. There are touches of Meyerbeer in the "Tasso," but they do no serious injury. The work is one of Liszt's best, and it is full of beauties. The scene at Ferrara is one of courtly elegance; the pathos of the lament is moving and free from suspicion of insincerity, which is not always true of Liszt, who had a talent for self-deception. There is a breath of inspiration throughout the piece.

Beethoven himself warned conductors against putting his "Eroica" as the final number. Yet the mighty music made its way last night. The performance of the orchestra, both in the symphony and in "Tasso," was, indeed, worthy of its great reputation.

This week the orchestra will show to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities that there are advantages, after all, in dwelling in Boston. There will therefore be no concerts here on Friday and Saturday. The program for Dec. 19, 20 will include Haydn's Symphony in D minor, No. 10, Tschalkowsky's concerto in B flat minor for piano (Mr. Harold Randolph of Baltimore, pianist); César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eclides"; and the March of the Three Kings from Liszt's "Christ" (first time). P. Hall

SYMPHONY PLAYS IN THE DARK.

Then Bounds on as the Lights Come up After a "Tunnel."

[SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 13, 1902.

LIKE other things bred in the classic atmosphere of Boston, the concerts of its Symphony orchestra are entertainments whose every detail is so settled and finished as to seem ordered by immutable laws—presided over by Nature herself.

Nothing "happens" at Boston orchestra concerts—and this fact serves to distinguish today's matinee in Carnegie Hall from its long line of predecessors. For something really happened. The lights suddenly went out at a critical point in the performance and left the audience and orchestra in total darkness.

And yet this, which might have been an accident to most orchestras, was only an incident to the men from Boston. By good fortune, the darkness supervened near the end of a glowing period in the last movement of the Schumann symphony; the band finished clearly the bar and a half which concluded the phrase, paused composedly as if for a hyper-eloquent rest, and resumed at the moment the light returned. The audience filled the hall with encouraging hand-clapping.

Mr. Gericke and his men were in too fine feather to be disturbed by such a superficial happening, and they proceeded from good work to better, and thence to a close of superb excellence. The weather is certainly no factor in the musical totals which these artists place to their credit here. Neither has it any effect on their audiences. The tone of the wind instruments and the "bite" of the strings were as bright and crisp and excellent as on a summer day, and there were few vacant seats to testify to either dampened or frozen ardor.

The programme consisted of Schumann's second symphony in C major, opus 61; Beethoven's "An Die Hoffnung"—a song with orchestra, opus 99; some symphonies, variations to an old theme by Dvorak—opus 78 and "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure."

THE SYMPHONY'S 100TH.

Boston Orchestra's Centennial Performance in New York Is Remarkable for Coincidences.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 11, 1902. Among those who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall, tonight, there was doubtless more than one person with whom remained recollections of the first night concert of this organization, in Steinway Hall, 17 years ago, when as the opening number (it was Weber's "Oberon" overture) the audience rose to its feet and fairly cheered. It had listened to ensemble playing which at that time was unexampled in New York concert annals. The conductor on that occasion was William Gericke, the soloist was Franz Kneisel and the solo work performed was Bach's first violin concerto.

The reminiscence has a special point in the fact that at tonight's affair—the 100th concert which the men from Boston have given before this public—the conductor, the soloist and the solo work were the same. The tangible results of these 17 seasons of concert giving were eloquently demonstrated by the cultivated audience which crowded the house, whom no severity of weather could keep away, and by the press of carriages extending for blocks outside. The selection and arrangement of the programme matter, the mood of the conductor and his band, and the sympathetic attitude of the audience were among the greater factors in an entertainment which can be ranked as among the finest the organization has ever given here.

THE reverential and intelligent attitude of the audience at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home at Symphony Hall, Boston, must act as an inspiration to the players, and certainly the performance of Beethoven's

BOSTON Fourth Symphony—the B flat major—on last Saturday, in that city, made such an impression. It

SYMPHONY. actually appears as if the Boston players and audiences are not getting tired of Beethoven yet, and the sale of tickets for Mr. Lamond's Beethoven recital at Steinert Hall, announced to take place last night, too late for any review here, indicates a deep interest in the kind of program he announces. There was considerable music in that man Beethoven, and he died only as early as 1827—within the period when many men and women now living must have been born—and his music is not obsolete outside of certain professional critical circles in the city of New York, who go so far as to tell us that a Beethoven recital—a rare event anyway—is too much for the musical digestion. Well, that cannot be helped. People who suffer from chronic indigestion and who have become hypochondriacs and cynics have no business to criticise anyway, even if paid. Enthusiasm and criticism are not adjustable, yet at the same time a morbid dislike of the beautiful, brought about by distressful physical conditions, is not conducive for a proper assimilation of Beethoven, although it might be cured by listening attentively to American comic operas, which have their function, too.

Boston is critical in its musical apperceptions. The people—the audience—which support the music becomes appreciative when good work is done, and it is not considered bad form or an evidence of musical ignorance when the people applaud. Here in New York applause is criticised when it does not appeal to the critics' dyspepsia; in Boston the critics give the audience freedom to applaud without censure. Discrimination is based upon knowledge or feeling, but the critic is not the judge of this, for he is not supposed to feel as a critic. He must know and record his impressions;

SYMPHONY PLAYS IN THE DARK.

Then Bounds on as the Lights Come up After a "Tunnel."

[SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 13, 1902.

LIKE other things bred in the classic atmosphere of Boston, the concerts of its Symphony orchestra are entertainments whose every detail is so settled and finished as to seem ordered by immutable laws—presided over by Nature herself.

Nothing "happens" at Boston orchestra concerts—and this fact serves to distinguish today's matinee in Carnegie Hall from its long line of predecessors. For something really happened. The lights suddenly went out at a critical point in the performance and left the audience and orchestra in total darkness.

And yet this, which might have been an accident to most orchestras, was only an incident to the men from Boston. By good fortune, the darkness supervened near the end of a glowing period in the last movement of the Schumann symphony; the band finished clearly the bar and a half which concluded the phrase, paused composedly as if for a hyper-eloquent rest, and resumed at the moment the light returned. The audience filled the hall with encouraging hand-clapping.

Mr. Gericke and his men were in too fine feather to be disturbed by such a superficial happening, and they proceeded from good work to better, and thence to a close of superb excellence. The weather is certainly no factor in the musical totals which these artists place to their credit here. Neither has it any effect on their audiences. The tone of the wind instruments and the "bite" of the strings were as bright and crisp and excellent as on a summer day, and there were few vacant seats to testify to either dampened or frozen ardor.

The programme consisted of Schumann's second symphony in C major, opus 61; Beethoven's "An Die Hoffnung"—a song with orchestra, opus 99; some symphonies, variations to an old theme by Dvorak—opus 78 and "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm from "Die Walkure."

THE SYMPHONY'S 100TH.

Boston Orchestra's Centennial Performance in New York Is Remarkable for Coincidences.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 11, 1902. Among those who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall, tonight, there was doubtless more than one person with whom remained recollections of the first night concert of this organization, in Steinway Hall, 17 years ago, when as the opening number (it was Weber's "Oberon" overture) the audience rose to its feet and fairly cheered. It had listened to ensemble playing which at that time was unexampled in New York concert annals. The conductor on that occasion was William Gericke, the soloist was Franz Kneisel and the solo work performed was Bach's first violin concerto.

The reminiscence has a special point in the fact that at tonight's affair—the 100th concert which the men from Boston have given before this public—the conductor, the soloist and the solo work were the same. The tangible results of these 17 seasons of concert giving were eloquently demonstrated by the cultivated audience which crowded the house, whom no severity of weather could keep away, and by the press of carriages extending for blocks outside. The selection and arrangement of the programme matter, the mood of the conductor and his band, and the sympathetic attitude of the audience were among the greater factors in an entertainment which can be ranked as among the finest the organization has ever given here.

THE reverential and intelligent attitude of the audience at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home at Symphony Hall, Boston, must act as an inspiration to the players, and certainly the performance of Beethoven's

BOSTON Fourth Symphony—the B flat major—on last Saturday, in that city, made such an impression. It

SYMPHONY. actually appears as if the Boston players and audiences are not getting tired of Beethoven yet, and the sale of tickets for Mr. Lamond's Beethoven recital at Steinert Hall, announced to take place last night, too late for any review here, indicates a deep interest in the kind of program he announces. There was considerable music in that man Beethoven, and he died only as early as 1827—within the period when many men and women now living must have been born—and his music is not obsolete outside of certain professional critical circles in the city of New York, who go so far as to tell us that a Beethoven recital—a rare event anyway—is too much for the musical digestion. Well, that cannot be helped. People who suffer from chronic indigestion and who have become hypochondriacs and cynics have no business to criticise anyway, even if paid. Enthusiasm and criticism are not adjustable, yet at the same time a morbid dislike of the beautiful, brought about by distressful physical conditions, is not conducive for a proper assimilation of Beethoven, although it might be cured by listening attentively to American comic operas, which have their function, too.

Boston is critical in its musical apperceptions. The people—the audience—which support the music becomes appreciative when good work is done, and it is not considered bad form or an evidence of musical ignorance when the people applaud. Here in New York applause is criticised when it does not appeal to the critics' dyspepsia; in Boston the critics give the audience freedom to applaud without censure. Discrimination is based upon knowledge or feeling, but the critic is not the judge of this, for he is not supposed to feel as a critic. He must know and record his impressions;

the artists and the audience feel they know that knowledge is no knowledge if it conflicts with the critic's knowledge here in New York. There must be thematic coincidence here; otherwise the jig is up.

Miss Maud MacCarthy, the violin soloist, played the Brahms Violin Concerto and received six encores. The rules do not permit encore playing, and the rules are proper. The audience admired Miss MacCarthy because she is musical; because she has feeling; because she sings on the violin when Brahms allows her to do so; because she has acquired through application a thoroughgoing technique, and plays octaves and thirds and staccato and legato, and all the violin pyrotechnics, too, and does so very excellently. The Brahms Concerto is a standard on the repertory of the violin, and it has been discussed pro and con, and the Brahmsites adore it, the neutrals try to find some refreshing episodes before the last movement is reached, and the antis simply annihilate it. There are some lights in the many shades, but as a work of musical force it seems to want in the inspiration outside of the magnificence of its masterful development. There are Mendelssohnian suggestions in it, and as Brahms is dead this can be said without fear of a libel suit. The Bizet Suite "L'Arlésienne," which was delightfully performed, has sufficient thematic material in it to make a number of Puccini and Mascagni operas, but that is far as we dare go nowadays. It is dangerous to call attention to unconscious imitations when the imitators are alive; besides that, they and their friends might become ill from subsequent dinners filled with expletives which certainly do not aid digestion.

The concert opened with Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Philip Hale calls it a theatre overture, and so it is; but it is not even interesting as such. It should be heard with the opera and there do its function. He is a pupil of Balakireff and is the successor of Anton Rubinstein as director of the Imperial Conservatory at St. Petersburg. He has been in this country, but not professionally as a musician, coming in 1862 as a marine officer. Cesar Cui, another renowned Russian composer, is a Russian general officer.

This week the Boston Symphony will play Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony—A major—although not in the military sense. Orchestral variations of Dvorák will be heard before Wagner's "Walküre" excerpts close the concert.

Why cannot New York get such a series of educational and artistic concerts? What is the difficulty? Why is there no systematically rehearsed orchestra here, which will aid the musicians materially and spiritually and give us the best in the music art, as we should hear it and as it is heard under Gericke in Boston with the help of such men as Kneisel, and Loeffler, and Adamowski, and Vicenszi, and Bareuther, and others, all men now thoroughly identified with the musical destiny of Boston's artistic community. Herman Hans Wetzler is endeavoring to build up an orchestral cult here, and there is much to that young, gifted and energetic conductor. There are also others here who have the intellectual and artistic materials, but they have no orchestras at command. Mr. Wetzler deserves the approval and support of the whole musical life of New York, for he is endeavoring to bring order out of the chaos here and give us something at least analogous to what other cities have. The Philharmonic did wonders under Paur, and we shall await until later days what it will accomplish under its latest auspices.

It is interesting to observe that the 2,000th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last week, and it happened to be at Hartford, Conn. Philip Hale suggested that this concert should have taken place at Boston. Why not New York? But then it is too late for that, and we bespeak now the 3,000th concert of the Boston Symphony.

TWO FRIDAY REHEARSAL (SYM.)

SEATS, Numbered LL27, 28, for sale. Price $35 for the pair. Address E. M. O., Boston Transcript. [A]

TICKET FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

MM 28, $16. Address S. B. H., 99 Pinckney street. WS[A]: d 10

F. F. 15, 16, REHEARSAL SEATS

MAY BE BOUGHT FOR $27 EACH by addressing B. E. R., Boston Transcript. (A)

the artists and the audience feel they know that knowledge is no knowledge if it conflicts with the critic's knowledge here in New York. There must be thematic coincidence here; otherwise the jig is up.

Miss Maud MacCarthy, the violin soloist, played the Brahms Violin Concerto and received six encores. The rules do not permit encore playing, and the rules are proper. The audience admired Miss MacCarthy because she is musical; because she has feeling; because she sings on the violin when Brahms allows her to do so; because she has acquired through application a thoroughgoing technique, and plays octaves and thirds and staccato and legato, and all the violin pyrotechnics, too, and does so very excellently. The Brahms Concerto is a standard on the repertory of the violin, and it has been discussed pro and con, and the Brahmsites adore it, the neutrals try to find some refreshing episodes before the last movement is reached, and the antis simply annihilate it. There are some lights in the many shades, but as a work of musical force it seems to want in the inspiration outside of the magnificence of its masterful development. There are Mendelssohnian suggestions in it, and as Brahms is dead this can be said without fear of a libel suit. The Bizet Suite "L'Arlésienne," which was delightfully performed, has sufficient thematic material in it to make a number of Puccini and Mascagni operas, but that is far as we dare go nowadays. It is dangerous to call attention to unconscious imitations when the imitators are alive; besides that, they and their friends might become ill from subsequent dinners filled with expletives which certainly do not aid digestion.

The concert opened with Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," and Philip Hale calls it a theatre overture, and so it is; but it is not even interesting as such. It should be heard with the opera and there do its function. He is a pupil of Balakireff and is the successor of Anton Rubinstein as director of the Imperial Conservatory at St. Petersburg. He has been in this country, but not professionally as a musician, coming in 1862 as a marine officer. Cesar Cui, another renowned Russian composer, is a Russian general officer.

97
This week the Boston Symphony will play Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony—A major—although not in the military sense. Orchestral variations of Dvorák will be heard before Wagner's "Walküre" excerpts close the concert.

Why cannot New York get such a series of educational and artistic concerts? What is the difficulty? Why is there no systematically rehearsed orchestra here, which will aid the musicians materially and spiritually and give us the best in the music art, as we should hear it and as it is heard under Gericke in Boston with the help of such men as Kneisel, and Loeffler, and Adamowski, and Vicenszi, and Bareuther, and others, all men now thoroughly identified with the musical destiny of Boston's artistic community. Herman Hans Wetzler is endeavoring to build up an orchestral cult here, and there is much to that young, gifted and energetic conductor. There are also others here who have the intellectual and artistic materials, but they have no orchestras at command. Mr. Wetzler deserves the approval and support of the whole musical life of New York, for he is endeavoring to bring order out of the chaos here and give us something at least analogous to what other cities have. The Philharmonic did wonders under Paur, and we shall await until later days what it will accomplish under its latest auspices.

It is interesting to observe that the 2,000th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last week, and it happened to be at Hartford, Conn. Philip Hale suggested that this concert should have taken place at Boston. Why not New York? But then it is too late for that, and we bespeak now the 3,000th concert of the Boston Symphony.

TWO FRIDAY REHEARSAL (SYM.)

SEATS, Numbered LL27, 28, for sale. Price $35 for the pair. Address E. M. O., Boston Transcript.
[A]

TICKET FOR
SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

MM 28, $16. Address S. B. H., 99 Pinekney street.
WS[A]: d 10

F. F. 15, 16, REHEARSAL SEATS

MAY BE BOUGHT FOR $27 EACH by addressing B. E. R., Boston Transcript.
(A)

MR. HAROLD RANDOLPH,
Director of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore.

99

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, (B. & H. No. 10.)

- I. Adagio. Allegro spiritoso.
- II. Capriccio. Largo.
- III. Menuetto, Allegretto. Trio.
- IV. Finale. Allegro con spirito.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23.

- I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.
- III. Allegro con fuoco.

CÆSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Eolides."

LISZT,

MARCH OF THE HOLY THREE KINGS, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
(First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD RANDOLPH.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MR. HAROLD RANDOLPH.
Director of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, (B. & H. No. 10.)

- I. Adagio. Allegro spiritoso.
- II. Capriccio. Largo.
- III. Menuetto, Allegretto, Trio.
- IV. Finale. Allegro con spirito.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23.

- I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.
- III. Allegro con fuoco.

CÆSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Eolides."

LISZT,

MARCH OF THE HOLY THREE KINGS, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
(First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD RANDOLPH.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Mr Harold Randolph, an American pianist of marked ability, made his first appearance here with the Symphony orchestra at last week's concerts, playing the solo part in Tschalkowsky's B flat minor concerto for pianoforte. The orchestral selections were Haydn's D major symphony; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae," and the march of the Three Holy Kings from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus." Although Mr Randolph is a comparative stranger to Symphony patrons in this city he has already gained favorable recognition elsewhere with our Boston orchestra, and also at concerts here with the Kneisel quartet, and his performances of the Tschalkowsky concerto gave pleasing evidence that the performer was a man of high attainments and that there are Americans who deserve to rank with many artists from abroad whose fame is more universal, but whose abilities are no greater than those displayed by some of our native pianists.

Mr Randolph's interpretation of the Tschalkowsky number, though lacking somewhat in barbaric suggestiveness in the first movement, was nevertheless a splendid exposition of the score, consistent and brilliant, and without self-assertiveness. The soloist played without attempting to make his individuality prominent; he was at all times the interpreter. The melody in the opening movement was given very beautifully, the variations in rhythm and tempo harmonizing perfectly with the orchestral accompaniment, and in the cadenza, which bristles with difficulties in chord runs and arpeggios, the pianist displayed a technique of the highest order.

Throughout the more melodic parts of the score the cantabile quality of Mr Randolph's playing was exquisite, and this was very noticeable in the legato measures of the lullaby in the second movement. The ferocity of the last movement was somewhat tempered by the performer, probably by reason of his reading of the score, for he frequently played fortissimo passages with powerful effect; but the characteristics of the finale were generally observed and each received due recognition. The orchestral assistance was of a nature to inspire an artist to do his best, for Mr Gericke's forces certainly maintained the high standard usually associated with their work. Mr Randolph was rapturously applauded at the end of each movement, and recalled several times at the close of his performance.

The Haydn symphony was opened in a spirited manner, the second movement was given with all the poetic imagery required, the jovial nature of the minuetto was charmingly shown, and the fanciful finale went with splendid verve. The violin figures in the last movement were features in a thoroughly enjoyable performance. The brief excerpt from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus," called for no special ability on the part of the orchestra, and the number was played conscientiously, with the proper suggestions of mysticism and devotion. In Cesar Franck's symphonic poem the short couplets and varying themes were played with admirable precision, the ensemble work of the orchestra being in perfect form throughout.

This week's program will have Mr Horatio Parker as soloist, playing the organ part in his concerto for organ and orchestra. The other numbers will be three movements from "Romeo and Juliet," by Berlioz, and Brahms' first symphony.

Dec 4. 1912

The program of the eighth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in D (B. & H., 10)....Haydn
Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor.....
.....Tschalkowsky
Symphonic Poem "The Aeolidae"..
.....Franck
March of the Three Holy Kings
from "Christus".....Liszt

The orchestra returned from its second trip with fresh laurels. In New York, although the weather was most disagreeable, the hall was twice crowded, and the critics, whether or not they rolled one eye toward Mr. Walter Damrosch while they regarded Mr Gericke with the other, vied in expressions of admiration and affection for the band of superb players, Mr. Kneisel as soloist, and Mr. Gericke, who next to Mr. Higginson and through Mr Higginson is the founder of this splendid and renowned society.

The 100th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York was given on Thursday, Dec. 11, at Carnegie Hall, and Mr. Kneisel played Bach's concerto in A minor. The first appearance of the orchestra in New York was at Steinert Hall on Feb. 14, 1887, when the program was as follows: Overture to "Oberon;" Beethoven's concerto for violin (Mr. Kneisel); Handel's Largo; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Mr. Gericke was the conductor.

It is the custom to present a somewhat lighter program than usual at the concert that follows immediately the concerts of the trips. The orchestra deserves this consideration, and the audience does not lose by it. This season of the year the conductor often arranges a program that suits the joyous week and looks for something Christmasly, to use a good old obsolete adjective. There is little orchestral music that is specifically Christmasly. There is the beautifully naive page of Handel in "The Messiah"; there is the more elaborate and less realistic Christmas Pastoral of Bach; but these should not be repeated continually, and I fear that Mr. Harry Rowe Shelley's overture "Santa Claus" would hardly fill the bill. Mr. Gericke went to Liszt's "Christus" and found there two orchestral pieces: "The Shepherds' Song" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings."

Whichever one had been played, the audience would surely have yearned for the other not yet heard. Liszt is a dazzling figure in the history of music. The innate nobility, generosity and humanity of the man are more and more appreciated. His boldness and originality as a musician are more and more recognized. He and Berlioz gave the impetus to the modern movement, and 50 years ago he was doing many things much better—O so much better!—than composers of today, who are doing in their way the same things with shrieks of "Look at this" and self-appreciative patting of the head. But often when Liszt entered the door of the church he began to babble and chatter in ecstasy that was really an attack of the vapors. Then the expression of his emotion is artificial, his pathos is bathos, and the incense has the old familiar smell of the footlights. Better his bombast, however, than his simulated simplicity.

A Symphony by Haydn was appropriate, for in the lively movements is unpremeditated jollity, the gaiety that needs no stimulant, no spur.

César Franck's "The Aeolidae" may not be one of his strongest works, but it is charming in the infinite harmonic variety, and it is characteristic of the composer. We know little of the tastes of Franck. We know that he looked something like an honest country notary, that his heart was that of a little child, that his life was devoted to his family, which included his pupils, and the church in which he devoutly worshipped as organist and man. We are also told that, like some others deeply absorbed, he wore his trousers at half-mast. We are not instructed as to his favorites among authors, painters, musicians, or whether he were happier in town or country. He did not write music from the view-point of a landscapist, as Mendelssohn in his "Hebrides" overture and in the Scotch Symphony. And in this Symphonic poem there is more the delight of a composer playing with a whispering, caressing theme, the breath of a soft wind, and watching its freakish metamorphoses, than any attempt at pictorial delineation. Perhaps the work is first of all a tour de force; but it is of rare kaleidoscopic beauty, with the endless succession and rearrangement of exquisite tints and figures.

The concerto by Tschalkowsky must still be reckoned among the great works of that master and among the few great piano concertos of the world. That it was produced for the first time in this city must always be a plume in the musical cap of the town, although Von Buelow's choice of a birthplace for it was perhaps accidental. Mr. Harold Randolph of Baltimore was known here as a sound, musical pianist, more at home, we all thought, in the chamber than in the brilliant concert hall. His spirited performance of the concerto was, therefore, the more of a surprise. The concerto is not a work to submit tamely to scholastic treatment, nor will it be won by merely a soothing appeal. It needs a hot-blooded master. In connection with Mr. Randolph's performance, it is interesting to note that he has studied solely in this country.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Harold Randolph, Soloist, Plays a Piano Concerto by Tschalkowsky, and a Liszt March Has Its First Hearing.

The eighth symphony programme leads off with Haydn's 10th symphony, which, being posthumously given to the world, has never yet been included among his most familiar ones. It is characteristically pleasant and companionable, and by no means long. Its nominal key is D, and the first movement passes conventionally enough from adagio to allegro spiritoso. The slow movement is a largo, but is in the score entitled, oddly enough, a "capriccio." The regulation minuet stands in the third place, and then there is an allegro spiritoso for the finale. The second number is to be Tschalkowsky's first pianoforte concerto (in B flat minor), the solo part being assumed by Mr. Harold Randolph, who is not a stranger to the Boston musical public. The concerto is thought by many to be akin in temperament and sentiment to its author's sixth or "pathetic" symphony—this, at least, in its opening movement, which begins with an andante molto maestoso for the orchestra, preparing the way for the solo instrument. The second movement has gentle and thoughtful themes and is marked for expressive and moderate playing. But the third movement shows the composer's national temperament the most and gives it scope, being wilder, swifter and more forceful, and resting mainly on two folk-theses, one of song character and the other in dance cast.

Cesar Franck's orchestral poem, "Les Eolides," or "The Zephyrs," then follows to receive its second Boston hearing. It is all in a single movement of gracious and delicate beauty, inspired and informed chiefly by one phrase of a few notes that move upward like a rising sigh. The last number will be an excerpt from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus," which was heard as a whole in New York in November, 1889, and has been honored as representing at its best whatever there was of the religious and churchly in Liszt's nature. This extract ends the first part, and is called "The March of the Three Holy Kings." It is more than a mere march, as the word is generally taken, because it depicts the journey of the Kings, the guidance of the prophetic star, their arrival, homage and tribute, and their more pompous salutation and departure. These things are only suggested in the varying tonality, melody and motion of the music, and not by dramatic devices such as belong to the secular and theatrical symphonic poem. The first intimation of the royal caravan's progress falls into C minor and E flat, from which there is a transition into D flat, with cool high flute figures and shimmering broken chords for strings, when the star shines out and goes on before. The adoration and bestowal of gifts are indicated through transitions which reach an episode illuminated with solo passages in F sharp, and other changes of mode and feeling lead to the finale, which is set in the more grandiose and resonant key of C, as becomes its more stately form.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Trans:

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The eighth symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Josef Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 10).

Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Piano-forte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 23.

César Franck: Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides."

Franz Liszt: March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus."

(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Harold Randolph was the pianist.

The Haydn symphony was admirably, beautifully played. One can hear this sort of thing too often; but once in a while it is a delight. Haydn probably marks the point of time when musical feeling was the farthest removed from that of our own day, when music was most habitually content to express the comfortable optimism of a good digestion and—I had almost said an easy conscience, but I believe that nearly all consciences were rather easy then, so this would not be particularizing. Indeed, Haydn's musical suggestiveness is more limited to a sound stomach with "set fair" barometer than even Mendelssohn's; for his often invades the domain of weak nerves, and Haydn's nerves are of steel. Haydn's expression within these somewhat narrow limits is singularly varied, running all the way from peasant artlessness to Heliconian ecstasy; it, however, seldom has the characteristic marks of high breeding, seldom acquires the elegance of some of his French contemporaries—Rameau, for instance. If you wish to see the two men in the strongest contrast, watch their behavior on the common ground of the minuet. In Rameau's minuets you find actual Watteau pictures set to music; they speak eloquently of the ballroom—either between four walls or transported into the open air; they are all cultivated grace, powder and patches. Haydn's speak just as plainly of the Sunday "Tanzboden"—the dancing ground of peasants of a Sunday afternoon; the grace is there, but somewhat modified by heavy shoes. One composer is no more refined, in the last analysis, than the other; but one is of the court, the other of the people. Only, now and then Haydn rises to a higher poetic level than his courtly contemporary.

César Franck's "Eolides" was, to my apprehension, as ill played as the Haydn symphony was well. In other words, it was played in too much the same way and spirit. Imagine the daughters of Æolus clad in Louis XV. (or, if you please, Kaiser Franz) costume, pacing a stately minuet, while thinking of something else! The stiff dress does not fit; the hapless Æolides have lost their power of charming, have no skill at ballroom small talk, blunder in their courtesies, in a word, fall flat. These sisters can disport themselves at ease only in flowing robes, at the very latest, of the David period, of the Directoire. Note that I am not at all particular about the dress being authentically Greek; no doubt, the Directoire costume would fit even better; but it must not be Kaiser Franz and Papa Haydn.

Liszt's March of the Three Holy Kings sounds less—what shall I call it? say, as the French do, "raffinée" than many of his later, and would-be-greater, things. It might well be called exceedingly good Santa Claus music; gorgeous as possible, and with a certain childlike quality perceptible beneath its superficial affectation. I know few things by Liszt which are so agreeable to the ear at a first hearing; this, to be sure, is a dubious compliment, but one says what pretty things one can.

Mr. Harold Randolph took the hall fairly by storm. One who owed him a grudge might call it indecent to take a peaceful audience so by surprise; but I owe him none (far from it!) and can congratulate him from the bottom of my heart. Of course, we here in Boston could not well keep tally of Mr. Randolph's doings in Baltimore; we could judge only by what he had shown us of himself here. We knew him as an excellent pianist, free from tricks, modest, perfectly sincere, and possessed of a strongly characterized sense for rhythm. When he played Beethoven's G major concerto here, some years ago, he won a succès d'estime fairly and squarely—but nothing more. His appearances with the Kniesel Quartet were decidedly in his favor as a musician; but I doubt if anyone thought of him as a concert pianist, by the modern standard, save by courtesy. If there was a musician in Boston who did not stare at seeing him down on the programme for Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor concerto, I do not know that musician. One's first impulse was to say: "Allons donc!" But we should all have remembered one good rule of prognosticating criticism; "Never trust a musician who has a fine sense for rhythm!" This is a virtue without which no performer ever stood long on the top of the heap (even if he had had the luck to get thither), and it may prove the parent of all sorts of other virtues to its possessor. A man may stay modestly, and apparently hopelessly, in the background for years; if he has a really strong inborn sense for rhythm, don't you trust him; he may spring up and walk firmly to the head of the class at any moment when you least expect it. No, honestly, we have hitherto known only Mr. Randolph the pupa; we now greet him as the imago, or perfect lepidopter.

Remember that Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor is as ultra-romantic a concerto as any ever written. Intellectually, it does not present such a task to the player who would conceive it totally as many another, say, not to leave the purely romantic field, as Liszt's A major; but it is solely and simply romantic in its essence, as extravagantly so in its expression as any going, even barbaric in some of its moods. Moreover, the demands it makes upon virtuosity are inexorable. In fine, though the work is by no means difficult to understand, it can be understood only through the sympathetic feelings; take it in the wrong spirit, and you kill it as dead as anything ever written can be killed.

In those first few measures of swept-chord accompaniment Mr. Randolph seemed a bit nervous, taking the tempo a little over-fast; but when the theme came his way, this nervousness was thrown off, and we all began to feel that the pianist was tuned to the right pitch. His sheer physical strength and weight, too, were much in his favor; few players make themselves heard so plainly as he through that gorgeous circus-tune in the united strings, with trombones in the background. By the time he had got to the first Allegro, his triumph was a foregone conclusion. I cannot remember the second movement's being played more delightfully by anyone; Mr. Randolph gave it all its poetry, all its peculiar weirdness of flavor. A good deal in this movement has always sounded to me like highly idealized Christmas music; be it said, in passing, that Mr. Randolph's technique showed itself as competent in fine lace-work as in the stronger bravura of the first movement. Upon the whole, what especially characterized his playing in this second movement was charm, a certain "spirituel" quality which is not easy to describe. In the finale he rose to all emergencies. Indeed, his performance of the whole concerto was in every way a self-justifying one; it showed the work in its true light, with none of its colors dimmed, with all its native eloquence retained. I heard people whispering of "Southern blood" in the lobby; well, call it Southern blood if you will, I call it talent. I surely do not know why a Southerner should be especially fitted by birthright to comprehend Tchaikovsky; but to talent it must come quite natural. Mr. Randolph was recalled and clapped as he deserved to be.

The next programme is: Horatio Parker, concerto for organ and orchestra (first time); Berlioz, three movements from "Roméo et Juliette"; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor. Mr. Horatio Parker will be the organist. W. F. A.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Randolph of Baltimore Plays His Concerto Finely.

The Boston Debut of the Pianist Was a Most Successful One—He Was Recalled Several Times—March from Liszt's "Christus" an Agreeable Novelty.

The eighth Symphony concert was of comfortable length, agreeable constitution and generally entertaining. It offered one number previously unheard in Boston, and it introduced as soloist Mr. Harold Randolph, the Baltimore pianist, who had assisted the Kneisels and appeared with the orchestra in Sanders Theatre, but now made his Boston debut. A clear-minded, sure, earnest and potential artist, he is a living proof of what high attainments are possible to the energetic, persistent and enthusiastic American who makes full use of the advantages to be found in his own country. He chose Tchaikovsky's first concerto, in B flat minor, opus 23, which is fairly well known here in Boston, the last previous performance being Mr. Slivinski's of a couple of seasons ago. It is an exacting composition, although it sounds no depth of passion, ascends no lofty heights and moves no strong emotional thrill.

Its three movements are pronounced individual—the first being stately, grandiose, declamatory and almost majestic; the second, beginning slowly and calmer, with lulling and pastoral moods, and then changing to the gamesome and gay, and the third being instinct with Slavonic moods, notions and tempers.

Mr. Randolph showed himself quite equal to the entire work, rendering each movement truly "by quality and kind." His physical and nervous strength was ready, sufficient and tenacious, he kept the piano prominent, as it should be, without ever allowing it to become protuberant, and the almost fiercely wrought up cadenzas of the allegros went to splendid climaxes. His attitude and presentment were intellectual, sincere and virile—dignified and firm in the first movement, sufficient in bravura of virtuosity for the ornateness of the second, which asks a lucid, rather than a brilliant manner, and spirited and vehement for the third. It was an honorable and edifying performance, and he was urgently recalled several times.

The "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's "Christus," which was put at the end of the evening, made a pleasant impression and justified the good things which have been said of its serious and respectful spirit. The different episodes which it means to illustrate—the progress, arrival, homage and departure of the kings—were plain in the construction and the reading, although one couldn't help thinking that these monarchs could hardly have gone down to their homes by that other way without detection by Herod, if they had been accompanied by such sonorously jubilant strains.

Cesar Franck's "Eolides," played for the second time, displayed the frail beauty of its brief and delicate themes, but would have gained much, to our thinking, if it had been played vastly softer, whether so prescribed in the score or not. Some passages, especially, were so positive and full-toned that they seemed to have come from stronger lungs than one imagines zephyrs to possess.

Haydn's D-major symphony, refreshingly cheerful, melodious and light-poised, began the evening happily.

The next programme names the first symphony of Brahms, three movements from the "Roméo and Juliet" of Berlioz, and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Dr. Horatio Parker, who will himself be the organist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Haydn—Symphony No. 10, in D major.
Tchaikowsky—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor.

Mr. Harold Randolph, soloist.

Caesar Franck—Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides."

Liszt—March of the Holy Three Kings, from the Oratorio "Christ." (First time.)

The Haydn Symphony, No. 10, of the Breitkopf and Haertel catalogue, was one of the Paris set, which preceded, and did not equal, the London symphonies of this master. There was one interesting point in the work—the anticipation of the modern waltz in the trio of the minuet. The waltz is the daughter of the minuet of Schubert. The audience might easily have danced to these tripping measures of Haydn. Another noticeable point of the work was the virility with which Mr. Gericke invested it. He evidently has no belief in the "Papa Haydn" vein, and he reads the works of this composer with especial strength.

The chief glory of the concert was the Tchaikowsky concerto. One may agree with Nicholas Rubinstein that the work is not "klaviermaessig" ("pianistic") even in its revised version, but the vigor of its thoughts, the striking character of its themes, the enthusiasm that seems to run all through its measures, these points far outweigh any such technical flaws. And the work had an enthusiastic interpreter in Mr. Harold Randolph, who won an unmitigated success and was applauded to the echo after each movement, and recalled several times at the end.

Familiarity by no means breeds contempt in the case of this concerto. Each repeated hearing reveals new beauties in the glorious work and it shone with especial splendor coming after the formal and genteel phrases of the Haydn symphony. An unrelieved succession of Haydn might drive a man to drink, or to Richard Strauss, and the freedom of Tchaikowsky was refreshing as a contrast. And besides, this Russian work is our own Boston concerto, having had its first hearing in this city, and won its first success here.

Mr. Randolph is a pianist (sometimes a fortissimist) of much surety and brilliancy. His octave and wrist-action is very brilliant, and he is always clear in his phrasing. There was much romance in the second movement, both in the music and its interpretation, and the excellent flute-playing also deserves recognition. The Slav burst out with his "Para Domoi" ("let us get home") in the finale, which was built upon the firm foundation of the folk-song. Yet the Russians found Tchaikowsky not Russian enough! There was an abandon, a heartiness, a brilliancy in the movement that caused real excitement on the part of the public and the outburst at the end was very spontaneous. Mr. Randolph may well feel gratified by the success of his symphonic debut.

Cesar Franck's "Eolides" was well played. It is a very extended piece of figure development, much of it being spun out of two notes. It does not suit to the climate of Boston, where we are acquainted with the most robust daughter of Aeolus, the east wind, for in this work all the breezes seem to be zephyrs. A Berlioz might have taken the motto—"Blow winds, and crack your cheeks," and developed a hurricane out of the simple figures, but Franck adopts a much milder course. The composition was very interesting if not at all exciting, and it was clearly and gracefully played.

Liszt's "March of the Three Kings," from "Christus," was tangible and intelligible, as we find all the orchestral works of this composer to be. In this respect Liszt might be a model to those moderns who revel in complexity and dissonance without rhyme or reason, often giving discord merely for discord's sake. There was a barbaric splendor in the work, and its pizzicati effects were impressive and attractive.

It will be seen that the concert presented the old and the new in vivid contrast. Mr. Gericke has written an article recently which emphasizes his predilection for the conservative side of music and his lack of sympathy with the ultra-modern. He therefore deserves the more credit for so conscientiously interpreting the most recent and most radical orchestral compositions. His opinion, however, is decidedly at variance with that of many of the men whom he leads. One of the most prominent of these recently said to the present writer: "I wish that I might never be obliged to hear a Mozart symphony again!" Some of the most dismal and cacophonous specimens of music have been created by members of the orchestra, and performed by it, too, again and again! The house is divided against itself. Yet Mrs. Partington's endeavor to sweep back the Atlantic ocean, when the tide rose over her doorstep, was not more futile than the attempt to make anything like permanent pabulum of Haydn or Mozart would be.

Delightful and glorious moments one may find in their works, as one may find great beauties in Spenser or Pope, but the third part of "The Creation," and many parts of "Don Giovanni" and "The Magic Flute" require either the blue pencil or great patience on the part of the auditor. Music is not founded upon immutable laws, but changes from epoch to epoch, according to the aesthetic needs of man; Pope Pius IV. thought the angels of Heaven sang music like Palestrina's Mass of Pope Marcellus, yet the modern auditor would find but little emotional power in it; Haydn was once thought overlaid with complexities, yet no musician of the present day will find him so; each epoch has a right to demand its own specific, which, of course, need not abolish the enjoyment of music which does not come quite so close to its emotions. In middle paths lies safety; let us realize that some part of Haydn and Mozart has faded, and that some part of modern impressionism in music is rubbish.

Louis C. Elson.

TWO SYM. REHEARSAL SEATS

For $15.00 each, in first balcony, centre of Row G. Address F. W. M., Boston Transcript. [A]

HORATIO W. PARKER

107

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HORATIO PARKER,

CONCERTO in E flat for ORGAN and ORCHESTRA.
op. 55.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante.
- III. Allegretto ma ben marcato.
- IV. Allegro moderato, molto risoluto.
(First time.)

BERLIOZ.

THREE MOVEMENTS from the DRAMATIC SYMPHONY "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17.

- I. Romeo alone: Grand Fête at Capulet's house. Andante malinconico e sostenuto.—Larghetto espressivo.—Allegro
- II. Love Scene: Adagio.
- III. Queen Mab, Scherzo: Prestissimo.—Trio: Allegretto.

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.

- I. Un poco sostenuto. — Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Un poco Allegretto e grazioso. — L'Istesso tempo.
- IV. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist:

Mr. HORATIO PARKER.

HORATIO W. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HORATIO PARKER, CONCERTO in E flat for ORGAN and ORCHESTRA, op. 55.
 I. Allegro moderato.
 II. Andante.
 III. Allegretto ma ben marcato.
 IV. Allegro moderato, molto risoluto.
 (First time.)

BERLIOZ. THREE MOVEMENTS from the DRAMATIC SYMPHONY "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17.
 I. Romeo alone: Grand Fête at Capulet's house. Andante malinconico e sostenuto.—Larghetto espressivo.—Allegro
 II. Love Scene: Adagio.
 III. Queen Mab, Scherzo: Prestissimo.—Trio: Allegretto.

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.
 I. Un poco sostenuto. — Allegro.
 II. Andante sostenuto.
 III. Un poco Allegretto e grazioso. — I. Istesso tempo.
 IV. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist:

Mr. HORATIO PARKER.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The ninth symphony concert was given last Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the programme being as follows:

Horatio Parker: Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, in E-flat major, opus 55.
(First time in Boston.)

Hector Berlioz: Two Movements from the Dramatic Symphony, "Roméo et Juliette," opus 17.

Johannes Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.

Mr. Horatio Parker was the organist.

An interesting and not untimely book might be written on "The Passing of the Solo Performer." The closing chapters might have titles not unlike some of those in Carlyle's "French Revolution," in which, after being carried through various phases of the "Lion's" downfall, we come upon the "Lion Sprawling* His Last." Ever since the solo performer came in competitive contact with the orchestra, he has been leading a harder and harder life, his struggle for survival has been against more and more oppressive odds. In only one of his avatars has fate been kind to him; as pianist, he still has the march of progress on his side. Let composers increase the power of the orchestra as they will, let them make it a more and more formidable chorus to the solo performer's small piping, pianoforte builders have kept up with them, and furnished the pianist with a mighty weapon, wielding which he can laugh even the most Straussian orchestra to scorn. But players on other instruments have not had the pianist's luck; no ingenuity has rendered their pipes or fiddles more stentorian than of yore, and, as everything in this world is relative, their several voices have become more and more like that of Conscience—interesting to the owner mainly.

One would have thought, though, that the organist had a tolerably doughty instrument to look to, to enable him to meet the orchestra in fierce concerto struggle for supremacy with some chances of success. What other engine of sound, or combined engines of sound, cannot the full organ (well mixed) crash out? Yet the solo organist's outlook here is even worse than that of all the others put together; he has, to be sure, a by no means despicable power of noise-producing on his side; but the orchestra, if it cannot drown him out, can still make him ridiculous; most especially can it make him ridiculous as protagonist, as "star."

Imagine for a moment a tongue-tied, semi-articulate actor starring it with a company, every member of which was a finished elocutionist; just fancy the contrast between his unintelligible mumbling and their clean-cut speech! And he, too, in the principal part! Now, that is exactly the position the organ is in, as a solo instrument against an orchestral accompaniment. The organ is semi-articulate, mumbles its phrases; the orchestra speaks distinctly, that all may understand what it says. Think of the solecism: the organ, without real accent, absolutely impersonal, doing "leading business" with a chorus of sharply defined personalities! 'Tis make the gods roar.

Not that it is absolutely incomprehensible that organists should still write concertos. It is just as comprehensible as that certain singers should give recitals—to remind the public of their existence. The organist lives a life apart, almost out of communion with the rest of the musical world; if he did not do something to refresh his colleagues' memory, not to mention the public's, he would be clean forgotten. Moreover, he has naturally become to a certain extent wedded to his peculiar instrument, and grown used to its fallings—just as one gets used to a sister's deafness or a brother's hare lip. He even persuades himself in time that the noise he makes on his pet instrument really is music; so it is quite natural that he should expect others to think it so, too. It was once, why should it not be music still? Well, it would be, if the world had not moved in the last two centuries or so. But the world has, and what the organist does on the organ has so few points of contact with what we call music today that it is singularly puzzling—notably when brought into immediate contrast with the doings of an orchestra.

So why need I say anything about Mr. Parker's new concerto? There are indubitably clever things in it; notably clever is his omitting all the wood-wind group from his orchestra—to save the organ from too ruinous rivalry with instruments of nearly its own quality of tone. There are musical ideas in the work; that technique, too, is evident for which the composer is now famous in two hemispheres. But it was not in the cards to write music that anyone (but an organist) would care to listen to; one must have drunk the rum of organ all his life, have got to the point of worshipping anything with a crank to it, to accept such a solecism as that!

The performance of the two movements from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" (Balcony Scene and Queen Mab) was simply exquisite. Saving one bit of phrasing in the love theme of the 'celli, I could see nothing in it that was not perfect. And this point might well be discussed; the phrasing was not necessarily bad because I did not like it. Only it is always dangerous not to let the listener know—by hook or by crook—exactly when you come to the end of a retard, and take up the original tempo again; there are cases which are exceedingly puzzling; the beginning of the second theme (in A-flat major, I think) in Chopin's B-flat minor scherzo is one of the most so, I know; not one pianist in twenty makes it sound to others as he himself hears it. And I am by no means sure that this love theme of Berlioz's is not an instance of much the same thing. But let this pass.

These "Roméo et Juliette" movements are in one way calculated to set the seeker after musical cause and effect a-thinking. Remember that they are of the most delicate poetic texture imaginable; nothing more exquisite in its way exists in orchestral music. Now, consider these two points: Mr. Emil Paur, who, with all his great artistic virtues, was not especially noted for delicacy, qui n'en abusait pas, as the French say, conducted these movements absolutely superbly; Mr. Gericke, who is by no means top-heavy with romanticism, conducts them just as well—and they are as essentially romantic as they are delicate. How do you explain this? By the movements being easy to conduct? No, they are known the musical world over as especially difficult, as taking a great deal of "rendering." In Mr. Paur's case, I never could explain it; in Mr. Gericke's, I think his strong rhythmic sense may have something to do with it, for Berlioz looked upon rhythm with a different eye from most of his fellow romanticists, and would probably have agreed better on the subject with Mendelssohn than with Liszt; great definiteness of rhythm is an essential part of his musical scheme. And, where Mr. Gericke's strong rhythmic sense estranges him somewhat from composers like Liszt or César Franck, it makes him hand in hand with Berlioz.

The Brahms C minor came too late in the evening; that is a work for which one must be fresh. I do not know whether the first movement's sounding a bit slow and heavy was my fault or that of the performance; but the three others were surely grandly played.

The next programme is: Rubinstein, "Ocean" symphony (four movements); Dvorak, "Inflammatus," from "Stabat Mater"; Loeffler, two poems for orchestra; Elgar, "Sea Pictures"; Wagner, prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan und Isolde." Madame Kirkby Lunn will be the singer.

W. F. A.

AT THE SYMPHONY

The feature of the ninth Symphony concert last evening was the initial performance of an organ concerto by Horatio Parker, written in Munich and Paris about a year ago. The composer is well known here, for he was born in Newton and educated musically in this city before going to Munich to complete his studies. He was for some years organist of Trinity Church and at present is professor of music in Yale University.

Mr. Parker, in his concerto heard last evening, has given the solo instrument but little prominence; the work itself might well be called a fantasia for orchestra with organ obligato. There are four short movements, the third suggesting a scherzo, being the most pleasing of any from the organist's standpoint, though there is some effective writing in the second movement which is like the so-called Romance. The last movement gives the organ more individual prominence, in a sort of fugato, the coda introducing a short cadenza for pedals. The instrumentation is for the most part effective, and in general upon a first hearing the work impresses one as being the work of an intelligent musician. Mr. Parker played the solo part in admirable manner, though his registration failed to show the diapasons in the organ as well as one could desire. The composer was much applauded at the close of the performance and several times recalled.

The orchestral numbers were the "Love Scene" and Scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and Brahms's symphony No.

1. in C minor, Op. 68. The two movements from the Berlioz symphony were superbly played and made a delightful impression upon the audience. These excerpts are perhaps the best of the whole work which may be classed among the greatest of what Berlioz has given to the world.

Brahms's C minor symphony though a master work, does not to many possess the interest of the second in D major or the fourth in E minor. It was admirably given in every way.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert this week will include four movements of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, "Inflammatus" from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," two orchestral poems by Loeffler, "Sea Pictures" by Edward Elgar and "Introduction and Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Mms. Kirby Lunn will be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Concerto for Organ and Orchestra (first time).

Mr. Horatio Parker, soloist.

Two Movements from "Romeo and Juliet."

Symphony No. 1..... Brahms

An organ concerto! These are as rare as white blackbirds. It is very difficult to blend the more aggressive organ stops with the tones of the orchestra, yet Guilmant and Rheinberger have succeeded in doing so, and Mr. Parker also achieved considerable success in doing this with the concerto of this concert. He chose his supporting orchestra with a view to its non-interference with the solo instrument. The wood-wind was absent altogether, since it resembled the organ effects too closely. Harp was used and formed a strong contrast with the organ, and the solo violin effects were also a good foil to the chief instrument.

The organ is the best sounding instrument in Symphony hall, and it was acoustically better than the orchestra on this occasion. The ensemble was excellent, thanks to Mr. Parker's musicianly playing, to Mr. Gericke's leadership, and to the movable console-desk with its manuals and pedals, the latter especially making it possible for the organist to be in touch with the conductor at all times.

The work did not lean towards virtuosity or brilliancy of technique, and there was scarcely as much variety of registration as might have been expected, but, per contra, there was some charming scoring in the diminished orchestra, and the concerto was scholarly, as every composition by Mr. Parker seems to be. The second movement gave some interesting obligato work to the solo violin, which was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel.

The allegretto had some very dainty moments and gave the solo instrument prominence, but presented nothing which the orchestra could not have given better than its rival—the organ. There was some ingenious use of the kettle-drums made in this portion of the work. The finale was contrapuntal in most of its treatment and had some difficult pedalling. It was less effective, however, than the earlier movements of the composition. The composer is to be praised for his conciseness; in these days of musical prolixity it is pleasant to find a concerto of modest dimensions.

As Mr. Parker was in thorough accord with conductor and orchestra and, barring the mention of a slight slip in the third movement no adverse comment was possible. He was deservedly recalled over and again after he had concluded the work.

Then came two movements of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. The balcony scene and "Queen Mab" were the two selections given. The love episode wears well; the passionate violoncello that is enamored of a violin (with an added flute) still charms the modern auditor, but the spasmodic interruptions make the scene somewhat less simple than the Gounod confectionery upon the same subject; Ah, Romeo! Romeo, wherefore art thou, Berlioz!

But when it comes to "Queen Mab" the composer's foot is upon his native heath and he gives a tricky bit of orchestration that causes Mercutio's little picture to become the salient point of this Gallicized version of Shakespeare. It evidently suited the mood of the orchestra and it displayed the skill of the strings in a memorable manner, nor may the perfect playing of the English horn go unrecorded.

There was a great contrast between the complexity of Berlioz and the complexity of Brahms. The first used all the glow of high orchestral colors, the second painted in neutral tints; the former tended to passion and ecstasy, the latter leaned towards austerity. The first movement of the Brahms symphony is so frankly ugly that it seems like a gage of defiance thrown down to the critics, just as Beethoven defied strict tonality in the very first two chords of his first symphony. It is a hard nut to crack, this ascetic movement of Brahms, but it grows more and more interesting with each hearing and it well repays study.

One has not to dig so deep for treasure in the succeeding movements, and the symphony grows more and more noble to its end. The second and third movements become an epitome of the entire work and recapitulates figures and phrases from all of the preceding movements, much as Beethoven did in the finale of his ninth symphony. The absolutely charming themes lead up to a coda that is overwhelming. There are not many such climaxes in music.

The work was read gloriously; Mr. Gericke is the man of men to guide one securely through such labyrinthine paths, and the orchestra are sufficiently steeped in the Brahms spirit to make the playing of such a work a labor of love; wherefore the end crowned the concert.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Concerts 2 SEATS FIRST
ROW FIRST BALCONY for sale balance of season. H. E. S., 3700 Washington St. Tel. 561-6.
3c[A]: d 18

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

In centre of C. C. may be secured for $17 each. Address N. C. F., Boston Transcript. [A]

FOR SALE TWO SAT. SYMPHONY

Seats in first row of second balcony on the side. Price $14 each. Address O. K. A., Boston Transcript. [A]

2 SAT. SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

In First Balcony, on side, numbered A 45, 46, are offered at $16.00 a seat. Address G. V. E., Boston Transcript. [A]

MR. PARKER'S NEW WORK A CONCERTO FOR ORGAN

Journal
First Performance at the 9th Symphony Concert Last Evening.

(By Philip Hale.)

The program of the ninth Symphony concert given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Concerto in E flat for organ and orchestra.....H. Parker
Two movements from "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms

Mr. Horatio Parker began his organ concerto in Munich and completed it in Paris during the winter of 1901-02. It was played last night for the first time. The composer was the organist.

Berlioz wrote strongly long ago against any attempt at blending organ tones with "the divers constituent elements of the orchestra." He gave his reasons at length. He went so far as to declare that there is a secret antipathy between the two musical powers. "Their mission is not the same, their interests are too vast, and too diverse, to be confounded together. Therefore, on almost all these occasions, where this singular connection is attempted, either the organ predominates greatly, or the orchestra, having been raised to an immoderate degree of influence, almost eclipses its adversary."

Since Berlioz wrote these words, the majority of organ builders have steadily endeavored to make their instruments more and more orchestral in quality. The rich, majestic diapason tone, the solemn and crowning characteristic of the organ and that which gives it pontifical pre-eminence, is found only in old organs. The modern diapason has a stringy quality. There are deliberate attempts to imitate the peculiarities of orchestral instruments. And with combination stops and pedals of all kinds, the modern organ is a complex machine which requires so much mechanical attention that the organist must have his mind occupied with everything except the music that is on the rack.

Composers have not stood in awe of Berlioz's opinion. There are works for organ and orchestra by Rheinberger, Prout, Guilmant, Boëllmann, Widor, not to mention others.

Mr. Parker has chosen carefully the contrasting orchestra for his concerto. He uses strings, harp, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba and kettle-drums. No flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons. He deprives himself of these means of coloring.

His concerto is in four movements; there is no pause between the first Allegro and the second movement, an Andante; the third movement is in the nature of an Intermezzo; the Finale begins with an introduction, which is followed by an extended fugato. The themes introduced are developed separately and together. The coda is introduced by a pedal cadenza.

The first movement is by far the best and the most effective. The first broad theme sounds sonorously on the strings against sustained organ chords. The contrasting theme is fresh and charming. The second theme is fluently written, and Mr. Parker, who is always fluent, here says something. The climax is stirring and the whole movement is well knit together, without superfluity, authoritative. And in this movement organ and orchestra work together; they do not seem utterly incongruous forces. The second movement, which may be called a romanza, contains some pretty passages, but it is without special distinction. The rest of the concerto is a disappointment. In the third movement there is an attempt at light treatment of the organ; as though the instrument could reproduce effects of wood-wind. But when the organ is playful it reminds one of Milton's elephant's desire to make mirth for Adam and Eve by unwreathing his lithe proboscis. The music that would fain be tripping or sparkling seems logy. Nor is the finale in the invention of themes or in development and color equal to the first movement. The fugato seems perfunctory and there is nowhere a truly striking passage. After the first movement there is not marked concentration, there is not the suggestion of infinite revision. Too often in sentimental passages there is the thought of the organist who has finished his voluntary and rambles on more or less agreeably until the clergyman appears to begin the service. Nor after the first movement is the organ so slyly contrasted and blended with the orchestra. Mr. Parker played skillfully and was heartily applauded.

Two movements of Berlioz's Symphony were played instead of the three announced. The "Love Scene" is one of the most beautifully romantic pages in the great book of music. It was given to Berlioz to stand near Juliet's balcony and hear the rapturous words of the lovers. The only appropriate commentary to this "Love Scene" would be Shakespeare's text. It would be foolish, however, to discover Berlioz in 1902. This music, written over 60 years ago, is love music for all time. The interpretation last night was punctilious rather than dreamily romantic or wildly passionate. On the other hand, the performance of the "Queen Mab" was generally exquisite. Brahms's Symphony brought the end. There is no disputing its austere nobility and deep thought; but if the concert was too long as originally planned, why could not a movement of Brahms have been omitted in favor of Berlioz? Would there have been a perturbation of Nature in disapproval; would the foundations of Symphony Hall have been shaken?

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Review
Mr. Parker's Organ Concerto Is Both Dignified and Beautiful.

Work Is Not Long, but Is One of Frequent Changes of Key and Tempo, with Powerful and Vigorous Pedal Passages, all Given with Knowledge of Score.

Though an organ be builded never so well and have all the freedom of breath and the celerity of response to touch that pneumatic and electric systems can give, it cannot replace the orchestra or even imitate it more than passably. Its music may be majestic, splendid, suave, tender and delicate; but its pipes can never pulse with the thrill which the breath urged from living human lungs imparts to tubes of wood or brass or silver, and its chords can never impinge upon the ear with the vital sharpness of strings pressed under human fingers and smitten or swept by the bow which a human hand holds and magnetizes. Yet the organ has too great meaning, worth and influential potency to be confined to its primary and peculiar place in church music—still less to be degraded into an expositor of what was never intended to be uttered by its multitudinous voices. Nor need it be kept in the background as a reserve of strength and resonance against some need of other instruments when the resources of their combinations fail to achieve the magnificent climax which the spirits of composer and listener alike demand.

But whoever would write for its best, greatest and most beautiful capabilities, must study and understand it as a unique and multitudinous element to be blended in real essential harmony with all the other integers which the orchestral range includes. He must know when to add to its attack the incisiveness of strings, to its chords the vivifying percussion of the harp, and to its massed tones, the voices of trumpet, horn and tuba, vibratory with the quiver of men's breath—when to make it the dreamer, the singer or the proclaimer, surrounding its voice with emblematic or ornamental figures from other instruments, and when to use it as the river or the sea upon which float other melodies than its own, or as the massive, but not hidden, foundation upon which edifices of grace, elegance, nobility and aspiration stand firm and rise upward exaltingly.

Mr. Horatio Parker, in his concerto, which began the ninth Symphony concert, showed that he knew how to fulfil duty and find delight in writing for the organ—that he could utilize it by blending it with all the band, could isolate and individualize it, could make it a harmonious and kindly adjunct or a stately and commanding, but not overbearing, leader, and could maintain its independence strong in the midst of a world of tonalities or subordinate it to gentle companionship with a single violin, a single horn and one set of harp-strings.

The concerto is not long, but it has frequent changes of key and tempo, as must needs be, since it has to find scope for so many phases and potentialities of organ character. In the first allegro movement the organ enters calmly, gravely and almost deferentially, waiting to present itself openly, until the first subject has been placed, and then remaining in broad fullness until it softens and carries the violins lightly on from the allegro into the andante, which is a dainty, fine and soft romance, sung almost entirely by the organ and the solo instruments above referred to. In the third movement, an allegro, the more delicate and fanciful stops are heard constantly, their effect brightened a little by the incisiveness of strings and made more impressive by some modest accent of the kettle drums. In the last movement—an allegro moderato, molto insolito—the organ shows more of its ecclesiastical character, although it never seems to be turning to "church music" in any narrow songs. It has powerful and vigorous pedal passages, leading into subjects treated in a firm fugato style, where the actual volume of the organ is tested by antiphonal phrases from the sturdiest strings and from the deepest and soundest brass, while its ability to invite power and flexibility is illustrated in the pedal cadenza that brings in the finale.

That the concerto is as fine and competent in technical, as in aesthetic, treatment, there is really no need to say at any length. Mr. Parker has rightly won his professorship and his doctorate in music by genuine, substantial, original work as organist, choir master, teacher and composer, and this new piece, finished within the twelve-month past, comes to enhance the estimate of his talents as melodist, harmonist and master of device, color, tone and expedient in music. There was advantage for everybody in having Mr. Parker at the organ desk. Composers who are not also executant artists are little more successful than poets and novelists in authors' readings, and are apt to make a bad mess of the score which they try to conduct; but the composer-virtuoso is pretty sure of success in delivering what he has written. Mr. Parker, playing from intimate knowledge of his score, and without reference to notes, could command absolutely the effect he had idealized for the organ, and could control its resources elastically for homogeneity and symmetry of ensemble. The concerto was listened to in close attention, gave great general pleasure, and was followed by several recalls for its author.

After the concert came the expected three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz—Romeo's solitary meditation in the Capulet orchard, the love scene, and the Queen Mab scherzo. Barring some passing blemishes in the wooden wind, the orchestra rendered these numbers, familiar to them and their audience, truly and well; and the same should be said of the now quite comprehended and affectionately regarded first symphony of Brahms, which was the only other number on the programme.

The next programme, which covers the debut of an eminent English vocalist, is thus given out:

Ocean symphony (four movements).....Rubinstein
Inflammatus from "Stabat Mater".....Dvorak
Two poems for orchestra.....Loeffler
Sea Pictures.....Elgar
Introduction and love death from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner Soloist, Mme. Kirkby Lunn.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Prof Parker's Concerto For Organ and Orchestra.

First Performance of Interesting Work in Symphony Hall.

Popular Concerts Tonight— Recitals of the Week.

The program for the ninth Symphony rehearsal and concert had for its special feature the first performance here of the E-flat concerto for organ and orchestra, written by Prof Horatio Parker, the author being the solo performer. The other numbers were three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by Berlioz and the C minor symphony by Brahms. Mr Parker's ability as a composer is so well known that his writings are very familiar to all concert patrons, and his choral, "Hora Novissima," has gained him fame abroad as well as in his native land. His larger compositions have shown him to be a musician of exceptional skill in words of a serious character, and his numerous minor pieces for organ, piano-forte and other instruments, although relatively less important than the others, are meritorious examples in each class.

The organ concerto is numbered 55, and in some respects it is Mr Parker's most ambitious work, for the organ part is very prominent, not only as a solo instrument, but in association with and forming a part of the orchestra in the ensemble scoring.

Mr Parker's training has enabled him to utilize the resources of the big instrument consistently in his new composition, and although he was obliged to adapt himself to new conditions and an unfamiliar organ, it did not appear to embarrass him and his manipulation of the keyboard left no ragged edges or breaks in the various movements and combinations. The work is of a canonical character at the opening, the contrasting motifs, the first for the orchestra and the second for the solo instrument, developing into strenuous fortissimo measures, which finally modulate into a romanza and terminate, in the third part, in a charming staccato movement, in which the organ stops of the lighter nature are chiefly used. In the finale the pedal points are introduced with capital effect, and they were played very skillfully by Mr Parker.

While the composer has not striven for striking effects, except in a legitimate way, several of his combinations in the first movement were somewhat novel in their combinations and in the exquisite staccato measures in the third movement the organ part was delightfully treated, the fingering of the keyboard being of such a nature as to give a beautiful cantabile quality to the work.

But few of the transitions are abrupt, the blatant quality so frequently found in organ pieces being happily infrequent, and the tonal colorings of the different voices of the instrument are very smoothly blended. As a performer Mr Parker needs no special praise, his ability, which is widely recognized, being based upon solid musicianship; as a composer it may be said in his new concerto he has maintained his high standard, and this important work should receive the heartiest approval from all those who are interested in the higher forms of musical writings. The orchestral score is elaborate and consistently allied to the organ part. The whole performance was thoroughly interesting, although organ music as a rule does not appeal to the average ear excepting under certain conditions, and the composer was the recipient of warm tributes of appreciation before, during and at the close of his concerto.

The movements from the Berlioz symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," were played with great grace and delicacy. The tragic love-poem offers splendid chances for the flute and other woodwinds, and their measures were sung exquisitely by these instruments. In the "Prestissimo" the orchestra reached about as near perfection as one can expect to hear. The Brahms symphony was interpreted in a sympathetic manner.

This week's program will be as follows: Rubinstein, "Ocean" symphony; Dvorak, "Inflammatus," from "Stabat Mater"; Loeffler, two poems for orchestra; Elgar, "Sea Pictures"; Wagner, excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde." Mme Kirkby Lunn will be the soloist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RUBINSTEIN,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2, "Ocean." op. 42.
(Second version.)

- I. Moderato assai.
- III. Adagio.
- IV. Allegro.
- VII. Andante: Allegro con fuoco.

GOUNOD,

STANCES DE SAPHO, from "Sapho."

LOEFFLER,

TWO POEMS for ORCHESTRA.
I. La Bonne Chanson, (after Verlaine.)
II. Villanelle du Diable, (after Rollinat.)

ELGAR,

SEA PICTURES. Two from a cycle of five songs for CONTRALTO and ORCHESTRA, op. 37.

WAGNER,

INTRODUCTION and LOVE DEATH, from
"Tristan and Isolde."
(Orchestral.)

Soloist:

Mme. KIRKBY LUNN.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Prof Parker's Concerto For Organ and Orchestra.

First Performance of Interesting Work in Symphony Hall.

Popular Concerts Tonight— Recitals of the Week.

The program for the ninth Symphony rehearsal and concert had for its special feature the first performance here of the E-flat concerto for organ and orchestra, written by Prof Horatio Parker, the author being the solo performer. The other numbers were three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by Berlioz and the C minor symphony by Brahms. Mr Parker's ability as a composer is so well known that his writings are very familiar to all concert patrons, and his choral, "Hora Novissima," has gained him fame abroad as well as in his native land. His larger compositions have shown him to be a musician of exceptional skill in words of a serious character, and his numerous minor pieces for organ, piano-forte and other instruments, although relatively less important than the others, are meritorious examples in each class.

The organ concerto is numbered 55, and in some respects it is Mr Parker's most ambitious work, for the organ part is very prominent, not only as a solo instrument, but in association with and forming a part of the orchestra in the ensemble scoring.

Mr Parker's training has enabled him to utilize the resources of the big instrument consistently in his new composition, and although he was obliged to adapt himself to new conditions and an unfamiliar organ, it did not appear to embarrass him and his manipulation of the keyboard left no ragged edges or breaks in the various movements and combinations. The work is of a canonical character at the opening, the contrasting motifs, the first for the orchestra and the second for the solo instrument, developing into strenuous fortissimo measures, which finally modulate into a romanza and terminate, in the third part, in a charming staccato movement, in which the organ stops of the lighter nature are chiefly used. In the finale the pedal points are introduced with capital effect, and they were played very skillfully by Mr Parker.

While the composer has not striven for striking effects, except in a legitimate way, several of his combinations in the first movement were somewhat novel in their modulations and in the exquisite staccato measures in the third movement the organ part was delightfully treated, the fingering of the keyboard being of such a nature as to give a beautiful cantabile quality to the work.

But few of the transitions are abrupt, the blatant quality so frequently found in organ pieces being happily infrequent, and the tonal colorings of the different voices of the instrument are very smoothly blended. As a performer Mr Parker needs no special praise, his ability, which is widely recognized, being based upon solid musicianship; as a composer it may be said in his new concerto he has maintained his high standard, and this important work should receive the heartiest approval from all those who are interested in the higher forms of musical writings. The orchestral score is elaborate and consistently allied to the organ part. The whole performance was thoroughly interesting, although organ music as a rule does not appeal to the average ear excepting under certain conditions, and the composer was the recipient of warm tributes of appreciation before, during and at the close of his concerto.

The movements from the Berlioz symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," were played with great grace and delicacy. The tragic love-poem offers splendid chances for the flute and other woodwinds, and their measures were sung exquisitely by these instruments. In the "Prestissimo" the orchestra reached about as near perfection as one can expect to hear. The Brahms symphony was interpreted in a sympathetic manner.

This week's program will be as follows: Rubinstein, "Ocean" symphony; Dvorak, "Inflammatus," from "Stabat Mater"; Loeffler, two poems for orchestra; Elgar, "Sea Pictures"; Wagner, excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde," Mme Kirkby Lunn will be the soloist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RUBINSTEIN,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2, "Ocean." op. 42.
(Second version.)

I. Moderato assai.

III. Adagio.

IV. Allegro.

VII. Andante: Allegro con fuoco.

GOUNOD,

STANCES DE SAPHO, from "Sapho."

LOEFFLER,

TWO POEMS for ORCHESTRA.

I. La Bonne Chanson, (after Verlaine.)

II. Villanelle du Diable, (after Rollinat.)

ELGAR,

SEA PICTURES. Two from a cycle of five songs for CONTRALTO and ORCHESTRA, op. 37.

WAGNER,

INTRODUCTION and LOVE DEATH, from
"Tristan and Isolde."
(Orchestral.)

Soloist:

Mme. KIRKBY LUNN.

MME. KIRKBY LUNN,
English contralto from Covent Garden Opera, London.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ocean Symphony. (Four movements).....Rubinstein
"Farewell of Sappho".....Gounod
Mrs. Kirkby Lunn.
Two Poems for Orchestra.....Loeffler
Sea Pictures.....Elgar
Mrs. Kirkby Lunn.
Introduction and Love Death, from "Tristan
and Isolde".....Wagner

Although Rubinstein is very unequal and gives glorious ideas and dreary padding in one and the same work, it was a delight to hear a modern symphony that did not attempt to import Wagnerism into the instrumental field,—where it has no business. We still adhere to the opinion that the first movement is much the best of the work, yet the finale with its robust chorale-melody and its clear counterpoint is not without effect. This movement seemed to arouse the chief enthusiasm. It was played with splendid force and the excellence of the performance may have had much to do with its reception; it has not nearly as much spontaneity and inspiration as the opening movement.

We are glad to have the work reduced to its proper number of movements. We recall a performance of the entire seven movements under Mr. Paur, and one of six movements under Mr. Gericke, in the past, and the increased length does not add power to the symphony.

Mrs. Kirkby Lunn made her debut with success. Her voice is of varying qualities, sometimes throaty, sometimes nasal, sometimes broad and open-toned. It has not the break which is often found in heavy voices and it is remarkably effective in high passages. It ought to be well-adapted, as regards compass, to the role of Kundry, which Mrs. Lunn is to sing in Mr. Lang's private performance of "Parsifal" on Tuesday.

Mrs. Lunn was not very dramatic in Sappho's farewell; perhaps, however, the fault of this lay in the number itself, which we have always found rather affected and insincere; it is not an aria to grow enthusiastic over, and we wish that the singer had chosen some other song for her introduction to a Boston audience.

To give a still further flavor of water to the marine programme Mrs. Lunn sang two of Elgar's sea-songs. Edward Elgar is the most pronounced individuality in England's music at present, possibly because he is less academic than the more famous composers of perfidious Albion. He really has something to say, which is worth more than perfect suavity in the saying. Yet we like the "Sea Slumber Song" (with which Mrs. Lunn began) the least of the set, for the poem has a fairy delicacy which the composer has not interpreted.

Mrs. Lunn sang but two of the set; the other being "Sabbath Morning at Sea," in which poetry and music go perfectly hand in hand. The solemnity, the loftiness of poem and melody, were excellently given by the artist. We should have liked to have heard the entire set, and particularly "Where Corals Lie," which we find to be its best number.

Mr. Loeffler's two poems for orchestra, one to the pale morning star and the other to the devil, have been heard very recently in these concerts. If such ultra-modern repetitions are in order, we would certainly prefer a second performance of Richard Strauss' "Heldenleben," or "Zarathustra," or "Till Eulenspiegel." It is a most ungrateful task for the critic to remain unmoved while others become enthusiastic, to lack appreciation of a composer whom many others are glorifying, yet it is impossible for the present writer to echo the plaudits of audience and of orchestra. Jadassohn once said to the reviewer: "In the sea of music there are two kinds of composers; those who are fishes, and those who have learned to swim;" one may concede that Mr. Loeffler has learned to swim most marvellously, that he is master of the orchestra, that he is tremendously ingenious; but we cannot find inspiration in the long satanic picture, and if we find some beauties in the morning star idea, they are disjointed and incoherent.

In this music nothing ever comes to a natural conclusion; it is a constant hide and seek of the phrases, for one cannot call them themes or melodies. It is a zigzag harmony that endeavors to surprise one at every measure, until finally the only possible surprise would be to find something proceeding normally; each musical guide that one attempts to follow leads the auditor into an unexpected path, until, after being tripped up a few hundred times, the final cadence comes as the only point of certainty in the entire work. The whole school is wrong, the whole work perverted ingenuity.

At the end of the concert came an absolutely thrilling performance of the "Love-death;" an interpretation that ought to crown Mr. Gericke and his orchestra with laurels. Here was something tangible! This is what the modern stammerers of ecstasy are endeavoring to say,—and failing!

Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Record

Mr. Loeffler's Orchestral Poems Are Repeated.

Mrs. Kirkby-Lunn, Distinguished English Contralto, Makes Boston Debut, and Though She Has a Good Voice, She Proves Something Less Than Satisfactory.

One of Mr. Gericke's preposterously long programmes, requiring nearly two hours for its performance. It was, if one may be allowed to say so, of rather an aqueous constitution; for it included Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, some of Elgar's "Sea Pictures," and the finale of "Tristan and Isolde," a tragedy which begins on shipboard and ends where the dying lovers can behold, below them and far-stretching, the waste of waters.

There was considerable variety in the protracted programme; and yet the amount of interest and pleasure it aroused seemed disproportionately small, even when allowance had been made for the depression sure to attend so severe a draught upon careful attention and strength. Even the Rubinstein symphony, which Mr. Gericke presented in the symmetrical consistency of its early version, placing the original four numbers in their primary order, seemed to lose something from the usual broad splendor of its opening allegro maestoso, as well as from the rough and sturdy scherzo which is often nominated as a sailors' dance. The andante and the finale, with its grave, solid choral centre, were, however, especially well rendered and enjoyed; but they intimated tranquillity rather than any brigher spirit. Mr. Loeffler's two poems, which made the chief success of the concert, had also fine treatment, as if the orchestra felt a pleasant sense of brotherhood, as well as of conscientious musicianship in doing them full justice.

The version of the Verlaine poem to the morning star gave again a real delight by its tender, swelling, rhapsodic sentiment and the beautiful picturesqueness of its accompanying idyllic pastorals. As for "The Devil's Villanelle"—it again stirred a rather perplexing excitement and thrill. As it paraphrases a sequence of notions rather than of stated stanzas, there is a possibility that the printed stanzas may confuse some who attempt to draw a closely regulated parallelism, while they who look to the music only for expressions of fiery turbulence, insidious suggestion and evil vehemence, springing from and tending back to fierce, dominant and violent moods, will get the best of the composer's central inspiration, even if the oppositeness of all his illustrations does not appear to them. The growing force and intensity with which Mr. Loeffler has wrought out his weird and dreadful subject must move every listener, as in the adaptation of means to ends his sudden introduction of the organ and the chimes, when the devil seeks his prey even in the church, and his composition of cold, strange tonalities when midnight summons the speaker to meet Lucifer and his doom, will be conceded as touches of a talent closely akin to genius. The "Tristan" prelude and scene were strongly and judiciously read, as Mr. Gericke and the orchestra are wont to read Wagner.

We cannot help feeling that Mrs. Kirkby-Lunn was something of a disappointment. Her figure is stately and commanding, her face handsome and interesting, with something in the profile akin to that of Cleopatra on the temple at Abydos, and her bearing dignified yet easy. Her voice has many beautiful tones, rich, full, resonant, often tender, and seldom other than of a right contralto timbre. Yet she seems to have little settled system in her method, but rather to try to make the most of each tone individually, without much consideration of its relation to others. Hence her focus of tone concentration and diffusion fluctuates, so that she has a sequence of superb separate tones rather than a symmetrically graded and developed scale each member of which belongs with every other. She sang Sappho's death song gravely, calmly and sweetly, and with some splendid tones at the very last, but there was neither woe, despair, passion nor the longing for peace in its well-uttered lines, while its phrasing was apparently dictated more by vocal expediency than dramatic sensibility. From the Elgar cycius, "Sea Pictures," she chose the "Sea Slumber Song," in which grateful tones and gentle delivery partly atoned for the lack of mystery and fantasy, and the "Sabbath Morning at Sea," the simple solemnity and pious fervor of whose heartfelt stanzas seemed not to impress her, and were impassively presented in spite of their vocal opulence.

The next programme is to be this:
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Concerto for violoncello.....Saint-Saens
Chorus of spirits and spirits' dance from
"Merlin".....Goldmark
Symphony No. 5 ("From the New World").....Dvorak

Soloist. Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HALL

A SCIENTIFIC ANALYSIS OF ITS ACOUSTICS

Trans. Dec. 7, 1902.
The Hall Said to Possess Wonderful Adaptation to the Transmission of Pure Notes to All Parts of the House—The Dissident Judgment of a Musical Critic

[Frank Waldo, Ph.D., in "The World in General"]

The subject of music hall acoustics has never yet received the thorough study which its importance demands. The literature of the subject is very meagre and in general is unsatisfactory to the student who wishes to obtain any really definite idea of the application of the laws of sound to this special problem. Most of the articles deal with the subject in such a general way that only qualitative statements are made, and these are based on the personal impression of the writers rather than on the quantitative results obtained by applying to the special cases the known laws of physics.

It is of interest to note that the installations of the two music halls in Boston at an interval of half a century have called out the most satisfactory and thorough articles which have appeared in American literature on this subject. The articles referred to are those published by Upham on "Acoustic Architecture" (with special reference to music halls), in Dwight's Journal of Music during 1852-1853, at the time of construction of the old Boston Music Hall; and those published by Sabine in 1900 in connection with the erection of the new Boston Music Hall (Symphony Hall). Upham takes up the physics of the problem only qualitatively, but he shows such a keen appreciation of the musical (shall I say art?) side of the matter that the articles are just as valuable reading today as they were fifty years ago. He calls attention to the very important fact likely to be overlooked by the non-musical physicist, that in musical hall acoustics we deal "with musical sounds only, to the legitimate effect of which intensity is of but secondary consideration." My own studies in quality of musical tone lead me to concur entirely with Upham's views in regard to the desired end to be gained in presenting musical tones to an audience, and that quality is of the first importance, and, moreover, that great reverberation impairs quality. In fact the purest quality is heard in the open air.

So far as I have been able to learn, in the construction of no other music hall has the problem of acoustic properties of the hall been so systematically worked out as in the case of the new Boston Music Hall, which has been named Symphony Hall, and which was constructed chiefly during 1900, from architectural designs by McKim, Mead and White, with the assistance of Professor Sabine of Harvard, as engineer of acoustics. The articles by Professor Sabine on acoustics (see sub-section on Architectural Acoustics and other specific articles referred to, in MacMillan's "Dictionary of Architecture and Building," edited by Russell Sturgis, and on Architectural Acoustics in the American Architect), explains the theoretical and experimental basis of his work. These are the best summaries that have come to my notice of the physical factors entering into the problem. The latter mentioned papers are devoted especially to the matter of control of reverberation in the hall. It has long been recognized that this could be controlled in two ways; either by a wall coating of known qualities for the absorption of sound, or by so proportioning the building and providing such mechanical interruptors, pillars, etc., on the wall surface that the desired reverberation is attained. Professor Sabine has accomplished his results mainly by the latter process. It may be remarked that the best authorities on acoustics seem to be united in the opinion that an oblong rectangular hall is the best form for the exercise of such control. It must not be supposed that Professor Sabine confined himself to this phase of the problem, for his investigations included both the quality and intensity of tone. In fact, he calculated beforehand with great accuracy the intensity or power of the tones for different parts of the building.

The success of music hall acoustics cannot, in the present state of our practical knowledge of acoustics, be measured in scientific terms, because musical judgment is so much a matter of personal temperament and taste. The purely physical study of the question must be supplemented by the psychological study in order to arrive at any definite conclusions; and the physical and psychological laboratories must join forces before a satisfactory study of structural musical acoustics can be made. Helmholtz has indicated a most promising line of procedure in this connection, in his study of quality in violin tone. It must be recognized at the outset, however, that it is absolutely impossible for the physicist, be he ever so skilful, to properly conduct experiments in which tone quality is involved, unless he is himself a competent judge of musical tone or else he secures the cooperation of someone who is a judge.

The dimensions of four celebrated music halls are as follows:

	Length.	Breadth.	Height.
Birmingham Music Hall...	140	65	65
*Leipzig Gewandhaus....†	124	62	52
Boston Old Music Hall...	123	77	66
Boston New Music Hall...	130	75	59
Boston Symphony Hall...	130	75	59

* See "Das Neue Gewandhaus in Leipzig, von Paul Gropius und H. Schmieden."

† "The length given for the Gewandhaus, 124 feet, is measured from the organ front to the architecturally principal wall in the rear. On the floor and by boxes in the balconies the seats extend ten feet farther back, making the total length of the hall, exclusive of the organ niche, 134 feet." [Note by Sabine.]

‡ "The length is measured on the floor of the main part of the hall; above the second gallery it extends back nine feet. . . . The stage

instead of being out in the room, is in a contracted recess having a depth of 26 feet, a breadth, front and back, of 60 feet and 45 feet, respectively, and a height, front and back, of 44 feet and 35 feet, respectively." [Note by Sabine.]

It is seen that the new Boston Music Hall (Symphony Hall) is not a copy of any of the other halls. It must be remarked that the length of the halls does not indicate with exactness the distance of the back of the hall from the musicians, as they are not similarly placed in each case.

There are three distinct grounds on which the test of music hall acoustics must be made; viz., preservation of quality of tone, the proper blending of instrumental voices, and the preservation of the sympathetic sphere. These three features require a brief explanation.

I. The quality of tone not only refers to the tone color of special instruments, as, for instance, the flute, the oboe or the violin, but it also refers to the standard adopted as the ideal tone for any individual class of instruments. On this latter point musicians themselves will not agree, and their judgments will depend largely upon the details of their musical education. In the case of the violin tone the best judges agree that the most perfect tone is reached in many of the instruments of certain Italian makers, and but few instruments made elsewhere have tones which approach this standard quality which, to my own ear, always creates an impression comparable with that of a beautiful tenor voice. Probably singers are much better judges than pianists of violin tone.

In testing a music hall on the point of quality of tone the question must be answered, "Does the tone reach the listener in its individual and complete purity?"

To my own ear, which has had the experience of nearly fifteen years' careful study of violin tone, the Boston Symphony Hall is wonderfully well adapted for the transmission of pure tones to all parts of the house. A single exception might be noted in an area in the second gallery near the stage, where the mechanical action of the bowed instruments is too plainly heard, but this is probably due to some peculiarity in the construction of the ceiling of the stage, and is not an inherent defect of the hall.

The intensity of reverberation has a great effect on the quality of tone, and as a contrast to the slight reverberation of the Boston Symphony Hall, my mind recalls the great reverberation noticeable along the side walls of the Musical Fund Hall of Philadelphia. We have become so accustomed to this reverberation being strongly pronounced in most music halls that even though it does interfere with the purity of tone, yet its absence causes dissatisfaction, and the tone is regarded as "dead" or lacking in warmth. A certain amount of reverberation is, then, demanded by the listener, and, it must be remembered, by the performing musicians as well.

II. The proper blending of instrumental voices seems to be in the main successfully accomplished in the construction of Symphony Hall. There is no very noticeable difference in the ensemble, whether the listener takes up his position close to the wall or at a distance from it. The balance of tone from the various orchestral voices is preserved with remarkable uniformity throughout the hall, although there are places where the separate voices are more distinctly heard than in others, and the disturbing influences of echoes, while not entirely lacking, are noticeable in but few locations.

III. The sphere of sympathy is a matter which does not appeal very strongly to the physical scientist, but which, nevertheless, is very important musically. There is unquestionably a certain radius within which any given music will produce certain desirable impressions upon a musical nature, and at points without this radius it fails to produce these impressions. This radius varies not only under different conditions of composition and performance, but also with the receptivity of different individuals, who are listeners. Thus, a violin solo or a string quartet ought never be played in a large hall, as their sphere of sympathy has but a small radius.

On this point the judgment of the person of keen musical feeling alone is valuable, and a number of competent judges have expressed the opinion that herein the long form of hall adopted in the construction of the Symphony Hall, but also the old Boston Music Hall as well, is not as desirable as the compact, more nearly semi-circular theatre form. Personally, I have not felt this lack in the case of a full orchestra in new Symphony Hall. It must be understood that this quality, so important to some musical natures, is to a large extent independent of the loudness of tone, and that these same critics who do feel its lack acknowledge that the orchestral tones reach the remoter parts of the hall with sufficient loudness. It would be interesting to know to what extent the psychological connection of eyesight and hearing enter into this question, and this could easily be determined by experiment.

Judging from memory, there appeared to be astonishingly little difference in the qualities of tone whether the hall is occupied or empty.

[This is all very well; but, like many essays on musical subjects by scientists, it arrives at conclusions with which most musicians find it difficult to agree. To begin with, neither the late Dr. Upham nor Mr. Sabine can be rightly deemed competent to express a musical opinion of any weight whatever; both come musically in the amateur class. And, to conclude with, we have not yet met the musician who did not call Symphony Hall a bad hall for music. Expert condemnations of the hall differ, as far as we have been able to discover, only in degrees of violence.—W. F. A.]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 5, 1902

Last Saturday evening the tenth symphony concert was given at Symphony Hall. The programme was:

Anton Rubinstein: Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," opus 42.

(Second version.)
Charles Gounod: Stances de Sapho, from "Sapho."

Charles Martin Loeffler: Two Poems for Orchestra—I., "La bonne chanson" (after Verlaine); II., "Villanelle du Diable" (after Rollinat).

Edward Elgar: Two Songs from "Sea Pictures," a Cycle of Five for Contralto and Orchestra, opus 37.

Richard Wagner: Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."

Madame Kirkby Lunn was the singer.

A programme so extraordinary as this invites comment. To begin with, it lasted hard upon two hours—which is longer than our modern "degenerates" (pace Max Nordau) care to struggle with music at a sitting. Then look at the make-up.

What earthly excuse can be found for giving four, or six, or all seven movements of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony? Who nowadays wants to hear them, or ought to if he did? In the whole symphony—its length and title recall the "Poseidon, tou makrou" of our schooldays—there is only one movement that has the faintest claim to outlive its composer; and this is the first. In this movement Rubinstein found something great to say, and said it in a tolerably grand way, scoring it so, to be sure, that much of its greatness is inaudible and more of it smirched with ear-displeasing coloring; but the stuff of which the movement is built is essentially grand, and to be enjoyed, as such, now and for many years to come. But the rest of the work (the other movements) is either wrinkled with premature old age, or irreclaimably old-fashioned in its tawdriness of conception. The sailors in the Scherzo hitch up their unmentionables exactly as sailors do in melodrama—and nowhere else. The chorale at the end of the finale (with its repugnant Meyerbeer counterpoint) belongs wholly, heart and soul, to a bygone era of concert-melodrama. The rest is thin sentiment diluted with imitator salt water. Save for the first movement, the whole thing is dead as Raff, or Marschner. But the first movement still holds its head erect.

Then why not give the first movement by itself, consigning the rest of the symphony to the eternal dusty shelf? Twenty years ago there might have been a good reason against it; now there is not even a plausible one. Twenty years ago it might have been urged that to give an excerpt from a symphony, instead of what Bülow once called the "full-harnessed quadriga," was beneath the dignity of a symphony concert. The "full-harnessed quadriga" meant something then, was a form to conjure with, and had to be respected; moreover, a single movement, taken out of a quadripartite whole, might suffer for lack of its "proper frame." As for this last matter, be it said that it cannot possibly apply to a first movement; for what follows a first movement in a symphony cannot, in the nature of things, have any influence upon its effect. If frame there be, the first movement is part of it. And, as for the dignity of a symphony concert, the "full-harnessed quadriga" is no longer, and has long ceased to be, a form to conjure with; if we still love and reverence certain old or new symphonies, it is no longer for their four-movement cut, but solely for themselves. Indeed, it may now be said, upon the whole, that no especial musical form whatever has anything to do with the "dignity" of the composition couched in it. Music, like the other arts, has become democratic, and the old hierarchical distinctions of form have lost all their impressive virtue: a symphony is nowadays no more impressive than a dukedom, a fugue no more venerable in itself than a marquise; a waltz may go down to dinner before a sonata—if it be a worthy waltz—and a polka take precedence of a canon. A first movement of a symphony, if it can really stand alone, is as presentable as an overture (from which no living soul can tell it, save by the title). The only "dignity" music has left is intrinsically its own, not that which is imputed to it by its form.

It were well for concert-givers and programme-makers to think of this; that the old times are gone forever, and their faith in the virtue of forms is gone with them—not to return for some generations, if ever at all. We live in an age when to give the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony, the Scherzos of Gade's B-flat and Goetz's F major symphonies, by themselves is to do far more for the dignity and well-being of art than to make an audience rummage through a haystack to find one needle with a point to it. Think of the number of single movements that have been buried alive because of the company they were found in, because of the carcasses of dead movements to which the symphonic form bound them! Some of these movements are alive still, in a state of mere coma, though in their graves; and it would pay to dig them up.

So much for the "Ocean." Then came that considerably musty song from Gounod's "Sapho," O England, England! when wilt thou stop constituting thyself the world's cold-storage warehouse for dead tunes, and encourage thy singers to retail the same in other markets than thine?

And, now that we have worked our weary way through three more movements of Rubinstein's ocean dry-rot than there was any need of, and a desiccated Gounod melody to boot, we come upon the gist of the evening, the thing for which we ought to have husbanded all our strength of receptivity—Mr. Loeffler's two poems! I know these two things were given last season; but what is one hearing of such music as that? how many listeners last Saturday knew anything more about it than if they had never heard a note of it? This music of Mr. Loeffler's is the product of genius, it is new and original, it hence demands the closest attention from fresh, untired listeners. Admitting that it ought not to be exposed to the dissipation of mood brought about by late comers entering the hall after the first movement, and should not be placed at the beginning of a programme, one can still assert that nothing more than a well-known, untaxing overture ought to precede it. It is asking too much of even the most interested listener to expect him to do justice to extended compositions of Mr. Loeffler when he is already half-fagged out.

Then came the Elgar songs, which may be extremely beautiful—indeed excellent authorities have proclaimed them to be so—but sounded on this occasion like "Down in the Depths of Dark Despair" done up in crape. The one thing that was thoroughly well placed on the programme was the last number; the music from "Tristan" is so well known, so deeply beloved, that it can come in anywhere and be welcome. Only, late-train people could not hear it. No, honestly, I have seldom met with so ill-advised a programme from every point of view; and I have seen a good many poor programmes in my day. The irritating part of it all was that there was no discoverable necessity in the case. Mme. Kirkby Lunn's selections were, to be sure, unfortunate; but it was not they that wrecked the concert. The real chief sinner was the Rubinstein symphony—first for itself intrinsically, but most of all for appearing dans cette galère. To give it at all was bad enough; but to give it in such company, simply unpardonable. It capped a climax that some of us have been noting and wondering at for a goodish while.

I feel a little ill at ease, speaking of Mr. Loeffler's "Two Poems" after but a single hearing. With his personality as a composer I find myself thoroughly in sympathy—though I am free to admit that it took me some time to get there; but this is well-nigh inevitable in the case of a composer of true genius and originality. Being in touch with a composer, knowing and admiring warmly his past work, are undoubted helps in fathoming what new things he may write and produce—helps, yes, but not lightning calculators to produce immediate results. A thorough familiarity with Wagner's "Lohengrin," for instance, will be a great help toward understanding his "Tristan"; but it will not relieve you of all the work, though it may make that work easier. So, although I was from the first disposed to receive Mr. Loeffler's "Two Poems" with open arms, though the impression they made upon me is more than favorable, I still feel that there is much in them that has escaped me, and that I am in no condition to write of them as they deserve. Of their greatness I am sure (I am not at all afraid of the word "greatness"), but exactly what it is and wherein it lies I am not yet in condition to say. My instinct to say no more about them at present comes simply and solely from my equally instinctive feeling that here is stuff that deserves exceptional study, repeated hearings, complete familiarity, to do it full justice. I feel unconquerably that here true genius has been at work; and if you cannot say something fully worthy of the occasion, you had best be content with taking off your hat. So I bow and pass on.

The playing of the orchestra was, for the most part, very fine indeed; I have heard the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" given with more breadth, the weak places in his scoring better covered up. But Mr. Loeffler's "Poems" were simply wonderfully played, while the "Tristan" music was given in a way to reveal, and emphasize, all its supreme beauties. Here was one of Mr. Gericke's best inspired moments. I have it from one who should know that Madame Kirkby Lunn was suffering from a bad cold (who ever knew a good one?); so, as she is to sing here soon again, I will say nothing of her performance last Saturday.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Genoveva"; Saint-Saëns, concerto for Violoncello; Goldmark, chorus of spirits and spirits' dance, from "Merlin"; Dvorak, symphony No. 5, "From the New World." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the solo cellist.

W. F. A.

TENTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Mme Kirkby Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, made her first appearance in this city at the Symphony rehearsal last week, the 10th program of the season being made up as follows: Rubinstein, C major symphony, second version; Gounod, aria, "Stances de Sappho," from "Sappho"; Loeffler, two poems for orchestra; Elgar, two songs from "Sea Pictures," for contralto and orchestra, and the introduction and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," orchestral. The excerpt from "Sappho" is not of sufficient importance to show more than a few qualities of a voice, the subject being of so sad a nature that variety of expression is debarred the singer, and the measures are almost all in legato form. Mme Lunn's abilities displayed in this somewhat circumscribed selection indicated that she was easily adequate to all requirements, for her true contralto voice was of beautiful quality, under perfect control, broad and resonant, and in sustained passages even in timbre and tonality. In a few instances her deepest and highest registers were utilized, and in each the quality was very agreeable.

In the "Sea Pictures," of which two songs were heard, the artist gave pleasing proofs that she is an oratorio singer of high rank. The delicacy of phrasing in the "Sea Slumber Song," the variety of expression and the sympathetic interpretation of the whole number were admirable in every way.

the singer making her effects without exaggeration of style, and simply by skilled vocalism. The second aria, "Sabbath Morning at Sea," was very impressive, though the musical setting is somewhat monotonous, Mme Lunn again giving evidence that her appearance here in oratorio would be most heartily welcomed. The artist sings without apparent effort or operatic embellishments, and her appearance is as pleasing as her vocal art is satisfying. She was very cordially received.

The program was very long despite the fact that only two songs in the Elgar group of five were sung by Mme Lunn, and the Rubinstein "Ocean" symphony, which opened the concert, was represented by but three of the seven movements. The Rubinstein work was played in the proper spirit by the orchestra, and the fourth part, sometimes known as the "Sailors' Dance," was given with splendid spirit and quaint abandon. The rest of the composition calls for no special mention, for, although elaborate and difficult in scoring, there is so little of coherency shown that the different movements appear to have but little relationship, and the piece sounds fragmentary.

The two poems by Mr Loeffler were received with evident enjoyment by the auditors, in fact, they were the most satisfactory of the orchestral numbers. Mr Loeffler's idyllic treatment of the Verlaine poem found delightful exemplification in the work of the artist's associate players, and "Roxinat's" "Villanelle du Diable," in which Mr Loeffler fairly revels in odd combinations of the instrumental contingents and pretissimo passages, was rushed through in the merriest vein. The greetings to Mr Loeffler were of the usual flattering nature. The Wagner selection was up to the usual standard of performance by the orchestra.

This week's program will be as follows: Schumann, overture to "Genoveva"; Saint-Saëns, concerto for cello; Goldmark, chorus and "Spirits" dance from "Merlin"; Dvorak, fifth, or "New World," symphony. Mr Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

MR. LOEFFLER'S POEMS

MRS. KIRKBY LUNN, ALTO

Journal
At the Tenth Symphony Concert in Symphony Hall Last Night.

BEAUTY OF "BONNE CHANSON"

"The Devil's Villanelle" a Remarkable Tour de Force, Diabolically Ingenious and Subtle.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the 10th Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

"Ocean" Symphony.....Rubinstein
Stanzas of Sappho.....Gounod
Two Poems for orchestra.....Loeffler
Two Sea Pictures.....Elgar
Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

The features of this concert were Mr. Loeffler's "Poems," which were produced here last season, and Mrs. Kirkby Lunn, the English alto, who appeared here for the first time.

Rubinstein, not satisfied with the original version of his symphony, perhaps fearful of the teeth of Time, added two movements and then another, as though the mere bulk would discourage the Shatterer as well as the avenger of reputation. Mere bulk never saved a poet or musician. Who would exchange Collins's "Ode to Evening" for a wilderness of epics? Or César Franck's "Lied" or Debussy's "Il pleure dans mon coeur" for any oratorio in three parts by a sound and solid English Doctor of Music?

When the "Ocean" Symphony was played as originally written, only the first movement found favor, and it was characterized as grand, full of the majesty of the sea, etc., etc. The other movements were voted dull or operatic. And then Rubinstein kept adding to the original, a piteous spectacle, for the Eternal Judges are not thus to be placated. Today the once admired first movement seems for the most part ordinary, with here and there a flash of inspiration, and the specifically ocean music a desert without an oasis, without a caravan, rather than a representation of ocean's moods. How much better the sailor-composer Rimsky-Korsakoff did the thing in his "Scheherazade"! There was a misunderstanding as to the slow movement chosen for performance and the one played was not the one referred to in the program-book.

The Love-Death from "Tristan" suffers when the voice-part is omitted, no matter how passionately or ecstatically the music be played.

A short symphony of Haydn or Mozart would have been here more to the purpose, or better yet, an overture of the classical period; for Mr. Loeffler's two Poems are long enough and important enough to take the place of a symphony, and they deserved the thoughtful attention of the unjaded.

When Mr. Loeffler's Poems were played for the first time last April, the first in illustration of Verlaine's "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles" was the more quickly appreciated, partly no doubt because the performance itself was then more spontaneous and convincing than that of the second, which is a paraphrase of Rollinat's "Devil's Villanelle." The performance of the latter limped at times in April, and there was no continuous irresistible flow; it was as though the players had not fully mastered the inherent difficulties and were cautious where they should have been reckless.

Now the second of Mr. Loeffler's Poems is by far the more subtle and lit-rary. A full appreciation of it presupposes an exact knowledge of the text and also an acquaintance with the points made by the composer outside the text and in the nature of a gloss or commentary, such as his use of the tunes, "Caira," "La Carinagnole," revolutionary ditties, and Aristide Bruant's ditty (sung here by Yvette Guilbert) with all its vicious and jail-bird suggestions.

The first is the more truly musical in the common acceptance of the term. The second is remarkable for malice, wit, super-refinement. It is not too much to say that it is a prodigious tour de force, and I know of no other composer now living who could treat the subject so adroitly. Richard Strauss has not so fine and light a touch.

A Villanelle of the Devil with him would become a witch's Sabbat and the instruments would say monstrous and obscene things. But Mr. Loeffler is as adroit as he is imaginative; his horrors wear masks of beauty; he does not insist, he suggests; his Prince of Darkness is the gentleman in his assaults on mankind.

There are few things more exquisite in the expression of love than these verses in Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," and Mr. Loeffler's love music is pure and nobly sensuous. It is the love of the fresh morning, not of the mad, summer night. To this lover all awakening nature is in sympathy; the sun hastens from his couch to anticipate him in the message to his sweetheart, to shine on the face of the sleeping girl before the lover's thought stirs in her heart. And as this music is charged with elemental and ever youthful emotion, and as it is intensely human, it must be ranked before the "Villanelle," diabolically ingenious as the latter is.

Yet the Villanelle is more than diabolically ingenious. It is more than a study in the macabre. There is demonic swing, unforgettable inuendo, mockery, the thought of the gallows, the fiend's sneer at goodness and hypocrisy alike. Study of the detail excites more and more wonder and admiration. It is the work of a most accomplished musician of rare and subtle intellect; it will always be for the few rather than for the many; and this, too, is a tribute. The "Bonne Chanson" is broader, fuller, more eloquent. Both pieces were read by Mr. Gerike with infinite care and played superbly.

Mrs. Kirkby Lunn is a contralto who has certain tones of rich and sombre beauty which would make their way without undue pressure. The voice as a whole is made up of various tonal qualities. She handles the weaker and reed-like tones with considerable skill. As an interpreter she was exasperatingly phlegmatic. As Sappho she said good-bye to the world with well-bred composure, as though she were leaving a pleasant afternoon tea at Mitylene. She chose from Elgar's cycle, "Sea Slumber Song" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea." They are of the salon order, and she did not vivify them by any emotional display. Perhaps it is as well that she did not sing "Where Corals Lie," which is by far the most musical and characteristic of the series.

124
THERE is talk about the marked improvement of the acoustic properties of Symphony Hall. At first musicians were somewhat disappointed. Not only were there "deaf spots" in the hall, but there was a lack, they said, of general and pervasive sonority. Nor were they consoled by the laudatory article of a Harvard professor in spite of convincing diagrams.

Now all admit the great improvement. Is this improvement due to the fact that the walls are at least seasoned, charged with sonorous waves, as some insist? Are the walls now sounding-boards?

Acoustic properties are largely a matter of chance. The French Government took infinite pains with the Opéra and the Trocadéro; yet neither building is satisfactory. Charles Garnier, the architect, whose monument was lately or is about to be dedicated, admitted frankly the impossibility of absolute certainty in securing good acoustical results.

"For many months I studied conscientiously every thing; I read the books in all languages that I knew; when I did not understand a language in which treatises were written I had translations made; I talked with X, and disputed with Y, and after all my studies I came to this conclusion: a hall, to be sonorous and of agreeable timbre, should be long or wide, high or low studded, of wood or stone, round or square, with walls bare or upholstered; it should be built over running water, or on a firm foundation of earth; it should be nude or with projections; it should be hot or cold, empty or crowded, dark or light; I learned that some believed in the planting of trees within it, others wished it to be built wholly of crystal, while others pretended that snow is the best conductor of sound and that the walls should be furnished with artificial snow; while others, in accordance with the principle of Vitruvius, insisted that sauce pans should be put under the seats."

Garnier went over Europe. He consulted architects, learned professors, singers, players, conductors. He auscultated halls in Italy, Germany, France, Spain, England, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, and possibly in the far East. He then tried to derive a few laws from all his experiments and research. "But no; everything arranged, studied, compared, gave us as a result—certain uncertainty."

THE TENTH SYMPHONY.

125
Harold
Programme Will Introduce a New Contralto, Mme. Kirkby Lunn of London, to Boston Audience.

The 10th Symphony programme will be the vehicle for bringing to Boston a distinguished English contralto, who recently, in New York, sang in "The Messiah" in the afternoon, and in "Lohengrin"—Ortrud—in the evening, to critical and general approbation, and who is also to be heard soon in Mr. Lang's concert presentation of "Parsifal"—Mme. Kirkby Lunn.

This lady, who is highly esteemed in England and on the continent as an oratorio and opera artist, is spoken of as possessing a genuine contralto voice, rich, powerful, expressive and well trained, and to be likewise of interesting and attractive personality. She is announced to sing the "O Ma Lyre Immortelle," from Goethe's Sappho, and in two of the songs in Elgar's cycle, "Sea Pictures."

Mr. Loeffler's two poems for orchestra, which were new last season, will be repeated. These are musical versions, it will be remembered, the one, of a lover's appeal to the pining morning star to receive a message for the distant beloved. The stanzas are by Verlaine, and the lover's petition is shot across and momentarily interrupted by the sounds and thoughts of the rising day, until all is ended by the appearance of the golden sun in all his splendor. The other paraphrases the notions of a poem by Rollinat, "The Devil's Villanelle"—bitter, fantastic, harsh and reckless. The first is easy to follow and accept; but the second is a different story, for the hearer needs to be pretty conversant with the lines and the spirit of the original, and to be able to catch the riotous themes of the "Ca Ira" and the "Carmagnole," which Mr. Loeffler has worked in to give sharper point and fiercer color to his score. The poems made a marked impression when first heard, as the first did also when played at the Worcester festival in September last, and their reproduction will be welcome.

Another number, not yet familiar here, although making itself at home in vocal recitals, set down for repetition, is the "Sea Pictures" of Dr. Elgar, the English composer, who has been praised by Mr. Theodore Thomas as being in his estimation the most skilful orchestral writer now living. Two of the five will be sung to the original orchestral accompaniment.

The symphony, which heads the programme, will be the second, or "Ocean," of Rubinstein. Why he called it so nobody quite knows. The irreverent have suggested this was because of its own immensity; for to its original four movements three more were added—not to be tagged on and played in a straight sequence, but to be arranged with the others according to an order prescribed by him. Very rarely is the endurance of an orchestra and an audience tried by a performance of the entire work, lasting nearly two hours; but usually, as on the present occasion, four movements are considered enough. Mr.

Gerike has selected those which appeared in the original version and placed them in their primary order.

The programme will end with the prelude and love-death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

125
THERE is talk about the marked improvement of the acoustic properties of Symphony Hall. At first musicians were somewhat disappointed. Not only were there "deaf spots" in the hall, but there was a lack, they said, of general and pervasive sonority. Nor were they consoled by the laudatory article of a Harvard professor in spite of convincing diagrams.

Now all admit the great improvement. Is this improvement due to the fact that the walls are at least seasoned, charged with sonorous waves, as some insist? Are the walls now sounding-boards?

Acoustic properties are largely a matter of chance. The French Government took infinite pains with the Opéra and the Trocadéro; yet neither building is satisfactory. Charles Garnier, the architect, whose monument was lately or is about to be dedicated, admitted frankly the impossibility of absolute certainty in securing good acoustical results.

"For many months I studied conscientiously every thing; I read the books in all languages that I knew; when I did not understand a language in which treatises were written I had translations made; I talked with X, and disputed with Y, and after all my studies I came to this conclusion: a hall, to be sonorous and of agreeable timbre, should be long or wide, high or low studded, of wood or stone, round or square, with walls bare or upholstered; it should be built over running water, or on a firm foundation of earth; it should be nude or with projections; it should be hot or cold, empty or crowded, dark or light; I learned that some believed in the planting of trees within it, others wished it to be built wholly of crystal, while others pretended that snow is the best conductor of sound and that the walls should be furnished with artificial snow; while others, in accordance with the principle of Vitruvius, insisted that sauce pans should be put under the seats."

Garnier went over Europe. He consulted architects, learned professors, singers, players, conductors. He auscultated halls in Italy, Germany, France, Spain, England, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, and possibly in the far East. He then tried to derive a few laws from all his experiments and research. "But no; everything arranged, studied, compared, gave us as a result—certain uncertainty." Dr. 1902

ALWIN SCHROEDER.
See Biographical Sketch on page 23.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,	OVERTURE to "Genoveva." op. 81.
SAINT-SAËNS,	CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLONCELLO, op. 33. Allegro non troppo. — Allegretto con moto. — Come prima, un peu moins vite.
GOLDMARK,	CHORUS OF SPIRITS and SPIRITS' DANCE, from "Merlin." (First time.)
DVOŘÁK,	SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World." op. 95. I. Adagio. — Allegro molto. II. Largo. III. Scherzo: molto vivace. IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

ALWIN SCHROEDER.
See Biographical Sketch on page 23.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10. AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,	OVERTURE to "Genoveva," op. 81.
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLONCELLO, op. 33. Allegro non troppo. — Allegretto con moto. — Come prima, un peu moins vite.
GOLDMARK,	CHORUS OF SPIRITS and SPIRITS' DANCE, from "Merlin." (First time.)
DVOŘÁK.	SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World," op. 95. I. Adagio. — Allegro molto. II. Largo. III. Scherzo: molto vivace. IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Robert Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.

Camille Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello, in A minor, opus 33.

Karl Goldmark: Chorus of Spirits and Spirits' Dance, from "Merlin."

(First time in Boston.)

Antonin Dvorak: Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," opus 95.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the solo 'cellist.

A wellnigh perfect performance showed Schumann's "Genoveva" overture as great and beautiful as ever. The more one hears this work (at reasonable intervals) the more perfect does it seem; in ideas, development, form and instrumentation. Were it not for Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" overture, one would say that the "fixed idea" coda was an invention of Schumann's; I mean that kind of climax coda in which the composer does not seem able to make up his mind to let go of his theme, but keeps hammering away at it, over and over again. After all, though, Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" is not the first example of this sort of thing on record; it is clearly enough derived from the sort of thematic "obsession" we find in the final chorus of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," where "the horse and his rider" seem as if they would ride gloriously on forever. Speaking of instrumentation, Schumann has had hard things enough said about his in general, which hard things I have more than once done my best to contradict; but, if you wish for a fine example of a stroke of true inspiration in this matter, take the entry of the two trumpets in the hunting-call of the horns of the second theme. Berlioz need not have been ashamed to sign it.

Goldmark's spirits' music from "Merlin" betrays its origin candidly. And do not think I mean by this that it has Hebrew characteristics. Goldmark is, to be sure, of Jewish blood; but he is also an Austrian (to a certain extent a Viennese), and in this combination the Austrian will be sure to predominate musically; the Hebrew elements will be veiled. Austria—or rather, say, Vienna, as the quintessence and double cream of Austria—culminates musically in the Strauss family. What Straussian elements were to be found in Franz Schubert (vide "Soirées de Vienne") were but premonitory symptoms, a tentative heralding of and "make straight in the desert a highway for" the all-conquering Strausses. And, after the Strauss family had once come, and gone, Vienna became and remained redolent of their genius. Even Brahms caught the infection, as is shown by the first movement of his D major symphony, though he for the most part kept the matter to himself and did not allow it to leak out into his compositions; Brahms had a strong musical constitution and could digest such things. But poor Goldmark! let him but have the word "dance" whispered in his ear and he straightway grasps for Strauss, as for a "Complete Dance Manual." Now, as it happens, I have no voracious fondness for the Strausses—old Johann, young Johann, Joseph, or Eduard—and, though I have a warm affection for Brahms, his admiration for Johann Strauss does not fease me any more than Wagner's for Beethoven does Mr. Henry T. Finck. And when I find, as I do in these Spirit Dances from "Merlin" a little Strauss and a little Goldmark, held in solution by the worst ballet traditions of the worst epoch of the opera, I—well, I don't like it. So there!

Dvorak's "From the New World" came as a welcome antidote; and, strange to say, Dvorak was an Austrian, of a sort, and lived his time in Vienna like the others. But he has Czech blood in his veins, and had, moreover, pretty well formed his style before coming to Vienna; besides, he was a peasant and had not only been brought up in, but had a native affinity for the peasant musical atmosphere; Vienna taught him no dancing-master tricks. It is at once curious and delightful to note how, in this symphony, Dvorak sticks to his peasant dialect; once, in the Scherzo, he rises to the Schubert pitch of civilization (and Schubert himself was an incorrigible man of the people), but for the rest remains peasant as he was born and bred. And, as his dialect is really his native lingo, it has all the charm of reality, and does not offend nor bore you—as so-called dialect novels do. Here in this symphony Dvorak has done, perhaps, the best work of his life; not the most genuine, for he is hardly ever anything but genuine, but the most thoroughly poetic and beautiful. The symphony was exquisitely, wonderfully played; to be sure, when a composer plainly says, "Damn!" one wishes that Mr. Gericke would not turn it into "D—mn"; it should not be forgotten that, in so far as art and literature are concerned, expurgation is the one unpardonable sin. I should have liked some portions to sound more "derb"—more downright, more uncouth, less elegant. There are parts of the Finale that seem clearly intended as a picture of—or say, rather, clearly inspired by memories of—a peasants' Sunday afternoon "Kellerei," or free fight (of the "where you see a head, hit it" sort); Mr. Gericke tends somewhat to give them split cane-pole for cudgels. But such shortcoming was not of frequent occurrence, and the symphony was, for the most part, given with true feeling, sense for beauty, and above all, euphony.

Saint-Saëns's 'cello concerto once more makes good its character as a work of enormous, almost superhuman cleverness. As often happens, Saint-Saëns has nothing to say; but this leaves him carte blanche for graceful posturing and inimitable talk about the weather; and he does his posturing and empty chit-chat so admirably, with such inborn mondain charm, that one would be disconsolate at its being made top-heavy by an idea. Once he even rises into an almost poetic atmosphere; where that cantilena in the 'cello, against the dainty minuet in the orchestra, makes you think of "Loin du Bal," and all sorts of easily mendable heart-breaking under the stars in the garden, with the dance she had promised you dimly sounding through the windows. And then, how it all sounds! What a sense for musical euphony, for delicate auditory flavors, the man has! As Swinburne once said of Ben Jonson's poetry, that it had everything of the rose—color, poise, richness of texture, nobility—except the fragrance; so might one say of Saint-Saëns that his music had nothing of the rose but its fragrance. "Nichts, blau eingefasst" (nothing, framed in blue) used to be a familiar expression in Germany for pleasing trifles; it applies well to much of Saint-Saëns's work, and especially to this concerto; but then, what wondrous "blue!" Mr. Schroeder played it as to the manner born; the trouble with this artist is that, after playing here for some years, he has left one nothing more to say about him. Praising him has got to acquire a sort of rosary air; it reminds the reader (though not the writer) of the Tartar praying by machinery. He is so nearly perfect in every direction that the deficiency is not visible to the naked eye.

The next programme will be: Arensky, introduction to the opera, "Nal und Damajanti" (first time in Boston); Liszt, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E-flat major; Brahms, Hungarian dances; Mozart, symphony in C major ("Jupiter"). Mr. Mark Hambourg will be the pianist. Concert and public rehearsal come respectively on Friday afternoon, Jan. 23, and Saturday evening, Jan. 24; there will be neither rehearsal nor concert this week. W. F. A.

Last Night's Concert By the Symphony Orchestra.

Alwin Schroeder's Fine Performance of Saint-Saëns' Concerto.

Popular Concerts at Several of the Theatres Tonight—Gossip.

Mr Alvin Schroeder was the soloist at last week's Symphony concerts, playing Saint-Saëns' A minor concerto for cello. The orchestral novelty was the first performance here of an excerpt from Goldmark's opera, "Merlin," and the remaining selections were the overture from Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and Dvorak's "New World" symphony. In speaking of Mr Schroeder's performance naught but commendatory superlatives should be used, for the great cellist gave an interpretation of the Saint-Saëns work that was about as near to perfection as one is likely to hear, even from artists whose reputations are more widely known than that of the modest performer who leads the cello contingent of our Boston orchestra. Saint-Saëns has not given the instrument so much brilliant solo work as he has difficult and almost continuous ensemble playing, the three movements really being joined and the cello part running through the whole score.

The themes and developments in the first part were sung beautifully, the melodies being given with impeccable tonal quality, with the bowing smooth and delicate as if from a violin. The stately minuet, or waltz, was delightful in its rhythmic undulations, the breadth of tone and perfect legato passages in chords showing the exceptional skill of the player to the fullest. In these two movements the cello is largely an associate instrument, but in the third part there is a brilliant unaccompanied solo—and brilliantly was it played by Mr Schroeder, whose technical ability easily surmounted all the monumental intricacies of the score. His double stopping, runs, harmonies, trills and rapid passage work were wonderfully executed, his fingering was without a suggestion of deviating from the true pitch, the staccato was sharp and clear and all the work in the solo, and also in the subsequent finale, was of the highest order. Had Mr Schroeder been a "celebrity from abroad," his reception doubtless would not have been more flattering, for he was recalled to the platform several times at the close of this performance. His associates performed their parts in a sympathetic manner, making the concerto the feature of the program.

The Schumann overture was given by the orchestra with characteristic effect, the opening measures for the brasses and woodwinds and the hunting calls by the horns being of a charming pastoral character, though somber and mystic in phrasing. Except for general excellence in performance the work calls for no special mention. The dance and chorus of spirits from Goldmark's "Merlin" is a pleasing tone picture in which naiads, gnomes and mortals figure in gambols, dances, etc. The sprightly musical illustrations are orchestrated skillfully and the contrasting episodes were set forth in the pleasantest vein by Mr Gericke's men.

The "New World" symphony by Dvorak seems destined to retain its popularity despite adverse criticisms regarding his use of so-called American "folk-song" as thematic material. The suggestions of popular airs evidently find favor with the average concert patron, and surely the educated musician should be satisfied with Dvorak's masterly handling of the score in working out his musical scheme. The "Indian" atmosphere of the second movement was the most enjoyable characteristic of the four parts, although the whole symphony was received with demonstrations of great approval.

The next rehearsal and concert will be given Jan 23 and 24. The soloist will be announced later and the orchestral pieces will be the introduction to Arensky's opera, "Nal und Damajante," first time; Brahms' "Hungarian dances" and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Saturday's concert was an admirable one, not only for the novelty presented, but because of the variety of styles included. Here is the programme:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 31
Saint-Saëns...Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello, Op. 33.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, soloist.
Goldmark—Chorus of Spirits and Spirits' Dance, from "Merlin" (first time).
Dvorak...Symphony in E minor, No. 5, from "The New World," Op. 95.

With the exception of the first number, all the works were those of living composers. They represented widely different schools, and typified the music of at least three nations. Best of all, not one of the three found it necessary to take refuge in the crazy metaphysical vein so prevalent in modern music. All of them knew how to do it. Hence their works are performed and enjoyed of their own native villages.

The Schumann overture, not one of the composer's greatest works, was insured a full meed of attention by its position at the beginning of the programme. Even there, however, its lack of dramatic force was apparent, and its allegro appassionato can hardly claim to be called passionate in the days when the perfervid Isolde and the excitable Tosca rule our stage. Yet its themes were beautiful, especially the horn-calls and woodwind melodies, and if its measures were those of a thoughtful sentimentalist trying in vain to reach dramatic heights, they still won their share of applause.

The Saint-Saëns' concerto again proved itself a well-knit piece of orchestral composition, and if it did not rise to any great climax, it showed a unity of effect that is not always present in such works. The composer of concertos must perforce display his solo instrument, and too often he is led to do this at the expense of musical coherency. The union of the three short movements (really two with the first one returning largely intact) in one single whole adds greatly to the effect. If the minor passages are at times dreary, a fault to be noted in many French composers, the exquisite allegretto gave ample reason for the reappearance of the work.

Of Mr. Schroeder's playing, there is nothing new to be said to Boston audiences. His surety, breadth and flexibility of style won their usual attention and recognition, and his thorough musicianship was everywhere in evidence. The customary double-stopping and other technical display in the cadenza held its hearers breathless, and the runs in stopped harmonics, apparently simple and innocent in sound, demanded the utmost skill of bow and finger.

Then came Goldmark—he of the sumptuous style, of the rich harmonies. He is accused of plagiarizing Wagner; it is easy to say a man steals, however, but not always possible to prove it. Goldmark's vivid warmth of coloring is his own, and if he has followed the Bayreuth master, he has done it with more freshness and originality than many lesser men who really deserved the charge but escaped it. The chorus of spirits in the magic garden of Merlin, last Saturday's new number, was a work of enchanting beauty. Granted that it does remind the auditor of that other pleasure-park owned and operated by Klingser, it is lovely in its own right also.

The music, as already intimated, contains harmonies—real harmonies, melting into one another with glorious fullness of mingled sounds, and not mere dissonances dressed in orchestral garb. But Goldmark himself is unequal. His alluring spirit chorus, sensuous in the best meaning of the word, was followed by a dance theme so tawdry that it seemed as if the fairies had left the ethereal regions of air and started pirouetting in a very mundane concert hall. A return of the earlier chorus made some amends, and the audience began to hope that everything would end happily. But a demon, who had been choked off at the outset of the occasion, now insisted upon interrupting the dance, and made some incendiary remarks on the brasses and kettledrum that were utterly unfit for publication.

Dvorak's American symphony followed. American in the material of which many of its themes are made, its composer can no more hope to found a national school than Mendelssohn could expect that his Scotch symphony would cause a race of highland composers to spring up. It is the orchestration and the harmony that make a theme effective, and these are the work of the trained musician. While the genuine Negro music has a weird impressiveness that is little known, it is hardly a broad enough foundation for a school. National schools develop only from the most marked and widespread rational tastes, and we doubt if the mixed race of undesirable immigrants that now own the land of the Algonquins could really tell the difference between a good folk-song and the cheapest ragtime. Judge! merely as music, however, the symphony will always rank high. Its first movement proves that a modern composer need not discard the symphonic form in order to write well, and if the third and fourth are often commonplace, the real feeling and frank beauty of the largo should win undying fame for the work.

Of the three living composers, then, one brought grace and delicacy as his offering, the second presented a glowing richness of harmonic color, while the third relied on the charm of attractive melodies well supported; but not one of them sacrificed his genius to the idol of orchestral ugliness.

The solo of the next concert is announced as Liszt's E-flat concerto, No. 1, with Mark Hambourg at the piano. The programme includes also Arensky's Introduction to the Opera "Nal und Damajanti" (first time), Brahms' Hungarian Dances, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

Arthur Elson.

132 SPIRIT BALLET MUSIC AT ELEVENTH SYMPHONY

Journal — Jan. 10, 1913
From Goldmark's Fantastic Unsuccessful Opera "Merlin."

MR. SCHROEDER THE SOLOIST

Fine Display of Tone, Phrasing, Taste and Technique—Hambourg the Next Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night at Symphony Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Concerto in A minor for 'cello.....Saint-Saens
Chorus of Spirits and Spirits' Dance, from
"Merlin".....Goldmark
Symphony, "From the New World".....Dvorak

This concert does not call for extended comment. The overture to "Genoveva" is familiar, and there is no pressing need of discussing the question why Schumann was unable to write an opera of any dramatic interest. He abused Meyerbeer like a pickpocket, and yet as an opera-maker he was not worthy to tie the shoes of him jeered at by others, who stole from Meyerbeer with both hands even while they scoffed.

The 'cello concerto by Saint-Saens has been played at these concerts by Mr.
Schroeder and before him by Mr. Bayrhoffer, and before them Mr. Wulf Fries played it at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Saint Saens is seldom if ever guilty of writing music for mere virtuoso display, and his concerto must still be ranked—it is, at least, thirty years old—with the best works, and they are few—so very few—in the repertory of the violoncello. The concerto is thoughtfully planned, and while it is not on the whole melodiously rich—the minuet is exquisite—there is often the polished charm of expression that characterizes the composer, a master of the clear, logical thought and the elegance of speech that were once supposed to distinguished the French, who now are given up to symbolism and mysticism or are anxious to be literary in their music. Mr. Schroeder is always artistic in his purpose and performance.

Custom does not stifle the pleasure in hearing him. His tone last night was nobly beautiful and his taste a joy.

Nor is it necessary to revive the discussion concerning Congo-Indian-American music, with Dvorak's symphony as Exhibit A; for there is now no possibility of such discussion. Dvorak's symphony is familiar; it has been duly ticketed as
No. 5 by the Czech Dvorak, and not as
No. 1 of the C. I. A. school. What if the composer did take this theme or that theme from transplanted and American-ized negroes? A theme does not make a symphony. We listen to "From the New World" as to any other work of absolute music, without any patriotic thrill, without the conviction that a "National" school of composition is a crying necessity. And it is pleasant music to hear; much of it is frankly pretty or gay; there are pages of gorgeous orchestration; and there are, as in all of Dvorak's later works, pages that are nothing but swollen salon music, of the same order as "Falling Leaves," "Twilight Thoughts," "Moonlight on the Hudson," etc.

But ballet music from Goldmark's
"Merlin" had not been played in Boston. We have got along comfortably without it. It is not to be named in the same breath with the sensuous ballet in Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba"; it is not impressive, or characteristic, or delirious, or charming. The melodic thought is cheap, and even the appearance of Wotan as the Wanderer in the enchanted garden does not console us.
Mr. Gericke and the orchestra made as much of it as possible, but it was a case of love's labour lost.

And now the orchestra goes to favored cities, among others New York, where there is again talk, as we saw by yesterday's papers, of a "permanent orchestra." The visiting orchestra may well serve as a working model.

***
The program of the 12th concert, Jan.
24—for there will be no concert this week—will include Arensky's overture to "Nail et Damañanti"; some Hungarian dances by Brahms; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Mr. Mark Hambourg will be the pianist. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's concerto in E flat,
No. 1.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

In centre of C. C. may be secured for $17 each. Address N. C. F., Boston Transcript. [A]

F. F. 15, 16, REHEARSAL SEATS

MAY BE BOUGHT FOR $27 EACH by addressing
B. E. R., Boston Transcript. (A)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Journal
Mr. Schroeder Plays His 'Cello
Concerto Masterfully.

The Piece de Resistance of the Evening—Dvorak's "New World"
Symphony—The Novelty is an Ex- tract from Goldmark's Opera,
"Merlin."

Mr. Phillip Hale says rightly when he remarks in the programme-book that the time has come for Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony to cease from being the cause of polemics as to whether or not the composer meant to give it out as a derivative from indigenous musical themes or as an expression of his own notions about the rise, growth and present attitude of material and spiritual America as a unit among nations. "The subject, duly labelled and dated," his words are, "now rests on the shelf, and for some time it has not been taken down and dusted." One may now fancy that possibly Dvorak prefaced his title as a simple greeting into a statement of the locus oviundi or place of origin. At any rate, the symphony must henceforth be regarded as neither ethnological, ethical nor historically significant, but as pure, abstract music.
And as such it will long be retained in appreciative and affectionate memory as one of the best and dearest of its author's works. It is bright with fancy, warm, tender and strong with feeling, quaint in figure, rhythm and accent, ingenious and apt in unusual forms and scales, delicate and deep in color, varied, rich and dainty in orchestration, and above all, sensible, hearty, sincere and truly human in declaration and appeal.
It was perfectly played all through, and there was a particularly touching beauty in the rendering of the long, pensive romance for the English horn, which is the chief feature of the second movement.

Did everybody realize, while Mr.
Schroeder was playing his solo, that one of the world's first cellists was discussing that "most eloquent music"?
Yet so it was, and Boston has reason to be glad that this artist has dwelt here so long, and has made his special individual contribution to every symphony season for a dozen years. The Saint Saens concerto in A minor, which he gave last night, and has performed once before, is favorable to player and hearer. It affords more opportunity for beauty than for strength, it flows on connectedly from theme to theme, and forms one modification of tempo to another, and it is compact and brief. The themes are melodious and are stated with only such reiteration as is necessary to fix them in the mind without that prolix development which confuses the layman and sets off the professional upon a course of criticism and argument. Mr. Schroeder delivered it sweetly and songfully, but sonorously enough to fill the room, and was brilliant, free and striking in the elaborate 133

coda.
There was one novelty for the concert
—an excerpt from Goldmark's Arthurian opera of "Merlin." This was from a scene in which Merlin, lingering in his enchanted garden before his temple of magic, which Vivien has caused to be opened, beholds the dances and hears the choruses of his own troops of spirits, until his fair deceiver casts upon him
one of his own spells, and garden, temple, spirits, fair, faithless woman and all vanish in an instant. The scene commences with great crashes, rolls and thrills of sound, from which emerge sensuous melodies for viola, flute and horn, crossed occasionally by other sudden, vehement chords. The balladite character of the music, wherein much prominence is given to the harp, with keen arpeggios and long sweeps, now increases, and one can see how fit it is for a chief dancer's "solo and variations" pas, especially when a long, clear theme for the clarinet is introduced.

The music increases fast in vigor, pace and power, and then, with a few violent, roaring chords, it ends abruptly. The writing is seldom bold, but it has its author's elegance, finesse, grace and imagination. The coloring is softly kaleidoscopic, and the atmosphere is languorous, but not drowsy.

The overture was standard—Schumann's "Genoveva," in which the successive illustrations of troubled, restless, violent, tranquilizing and triumphant conditions were duly brought out in the rendering.

The programme was nicely balanced and of judicious and agreeable length.
The overture and concerto occupied only about 35 minutes and the concert extended but a trifle beyond one hour and a half. This is the orchestra's absent week, but for the subsequent Friday and Saturday Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony has been chosen, together with some of Brahms' Hungarian dances. The introduction to Arensky's opera, "Nal und Damañanti" will have its first hearing, and there will be a soloist, to be announced later.

At the next concerts, Jan. 23 and 24,
Mark Hambourg, pianist, will play
Liszt's concerto No. 1, in E flat.

TWO SYM. REHEARSAL SEATS

For $15.00 each, in first balcony, centre of Row G.
Address F. W. M., Boston Transcript. [A]

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

In centre of C. C. may be secured for $17 each. Address N. C. F., Boston Transcript. [A]

TWO SYM. REHEARSAL SEATS

For $15.00 each, in first balcony, centre of Row G.
Address F. W. M., Boston Transcript. [A]

ist:

VON ROOY.

Photograph by Gessford & Van Brunt, New York.

MARK HAMBOURG.

135

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

ARENSKY,

INTRODUCTION TO THE OPERA, "Nala and Damayanti."
(First time.)

LISZT,

CONCERTO in E flat major, No. 1, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.

BRAHMS,

"HUNGARIAN DANCES," Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.
(Orchestrated by ALBERT PARLOW.)

MOZART,

SYMPHONY, in C major with Fugue-Finale,
"Jupiter."
I. Allegro vivace.
II. Andante Cantabile.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. MARK HAMBOURG.

The Pianoforte is a Knabe.

Photograph by Gessford & Van Brunt, New York.

MARK HAMBOURG.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

ARENSKY,

INTRODUCTION TO THE OPERA, "Nala and Damayanti."
(First time.)

LISZT,

CONCERTO in E flat major, No. 1, for PIANOFORTE
and ORCHESTRA.

BRAHMS,

"HUNGARIAN DANCES," Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.
(Orchestrated by ALBERT PARLOW.)

MOZART,

SYMPHONY, in C major with Fugue-Finale,
"Jupiter."
I. Allegro vivace.
II. Andante Cantabile.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. MARK HAMBOURG.

The Pianoforte is a Knabe.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Introduction to the Opera, "Nala and Damayanti.".....Arensky
(First time.)
Concerto in E flat major, No. 1 for Piano-forte and Orchestra.....Liszt
(Mark Hambourg, Soloist.)
"Hungarian Dances," Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.....Brahms (Orchestrated by Albert Parlow).
Symphony, in C major with Fugue-Finale.....Mozart

Russia and Hungary furnished the chief part of the programme at this concert. Arensky's East Indian overture deals with a plot that can be stated in very few words—a young prince loses his kingdom at dice and afterwards wins it back again by the same means; the moral of which appears to be that if you play dice you ought to study all the fine points of the game.

Arensky plunges into his subject with all the modern glow of orchestration; there are "Lohengrin prelude" violins even in the first measures and the Wagner school of ecstasy is omnipresent. The work is in good form, presenting three divisions clearly and ending as it began—as its hero dice-player did. But it possesses that which places the new Russians above the average of the German orchestral composers of the present, an abundance of good melody, a degree of tuneful beauty. It was a worthy work, pleasing, shapely, well-scored, and we should be glad to hear it again.

Now came the piano-pugilist, Mark Hambourg, who scintillated like that "shining mark" that is said to be beloved of fate. The Liszt concerto in E flat, rather a rhapsody than true concerto, suited the brilliant player perfectly, and he made the best impression that he has yet done in Boston. A shade more of the feminine might have been demanded in the gentler parts of the work, but as a whole it was impetuous, powerful and untrammelled, as Liszt intended it to be. What an iconoclast this terrible Liszt must have been a half-century ago! A concerto with a triangle obligato out of all classical form, full of wild Magyar freedom, must have set the teeth of the conservatives on edge. And Liszt today might be a model to the modern composers in orchestral work, for he does not present ugliness even in his most frenetic moments, possibly because he was cradled in the beautiful Hungarian folk-song.

Even his disciples were a little aghast at the freedom of the work at first, and some asked of him the meaning of the seven-noted figure that forms the chief motive of the work. "Das versteh't ihr alle nicht," sang back the master, to his own music.

Mr. Hambourg was recalled over and over and certainly deserved the ovation, for soloist, orchestra and conductor all united in giving a most exciting interpretation of a work which demanded the abandon it received.

Brahms' Hungarian dances sounded tame by comparison. Liszt would have done much better with the topic. Indeed he has done so, for the last number of the set, No. 15, has been used by him as a Friska in one of his Hungarian rhapsodies, and has been orchestrated also, and sounds ten times as brilliant as the sedate scoring that Parlow has given to Brahms' piano works. The melodies are not by Brahms; Remenyi, the Hungarian violinist, has often bitterly complained to the present writer of the injustice done to one of his own tunes by its being thus incorporated in Brahms' works, but as a matter of fact Brahms only claimed the arrangement of these themes.

Because Swinburne, De Musset and Hugo exist shall we abolish Corneille, Racine and Wordsworth? Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony no longer presents anything akin to "the immortal Jove's dread clamours" to the modern ear, but it is pleasant to listen to nevertheless. The first movement scarcely seems to rival the entirely charming Allegro of the G minor symphony (written at the same time by Mozart) but the finale is not to be crowded out of the latter-day concert repertoire, even by the spiciest finales of Berlioz. The work was lovingly read by Mr. Gericke, and the interest of the audience held unabated to the last notes.

At the next concert Mr. Adamowski is to appear as soloist with a "Pibroch" by Mackenzie, which bit of Scottish music will have its first American hearing on that occasion. Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Novelty a Lively Overture by the Russian, Arensky.

Another Russian, Max Hambourg, is the Soloist in a Liszt Concerto—A Work That Is Fitful, Erratic, and Played with an Almost Tartar Violence.

The chief impression left on the general mind at the 12th Symphony concert by Mr. Max Hambourg's delivery of Liszt's first pianoforte concerto must have been admiration for the magnificent workmanship and indomitable strength of the instrument upon which he performed and amazement tempered with regret that any man could play so loud for so long a time. The concerto—which was originally known and scorned in Vienna as the "triangle" concerto, because of the tinklings which tap the accent and rhythm of the scherzo—has its beauties; but being an early essay of its author in that genus of composition, it is fitful, erratic and not without turpitude and turbulence. It has possibilities for suavity and grace; but Mr. Hambourg played it all with a rush and a roar. If one may be permitted to say so, a Tartar violence, barbaric and relentless, seems to lie close below the surface of Mr. Hambourg's sturdy and honest Russian determination. Yet with what noble splendor and almost majestic fulness he might illuminate and permeate truly grand and sublime music, if he only would! He has great qualities, which never show more luminously than when he occasionally uses his giant strength with other than a giant's disposition. His apparently exhaustless physical and nervous strength and technical resources are not his only characteristics. At its loudest, his tone is round, rich and smoothly massive; when his execution seems most reckless and extravagant, he is still accurate, firm and definite; his biggest volume and his fiercest sweep are yet resolute and controlled; his mind is justly perceptive and his pronouncements are logical and, within the lines of his violent exertion and excessive effect, proportionate. But there is overmuch of everything and almost never a moment for relaxation, rest or refreshment. His personal equation might well be equal to an almost Olympian place among pianists; but it would be first necessary for him to realize that Jove did not always speak in thunder and cast crashing bolts, but could woo with soft, velvety, bovine eyes or fascinate and dazzle in glittering flakes or filmy gold.

The Brahms dances, charmingly and elastically played, were very welcome, and relieved the strain imposed by the concerto. The choice fell ultimately upon those of the third book, numbers 11 to 15, inclusive, as orchestrated by Alfred Parlow. The formalist, logician and scholiast here disappear and Brahms comes as a genial, good fellow, not able, indeed, quite to conceal his skilled learning, bringing persuasive pages of delicate and sinuous grace, sweetly sensuous melody, rich and kindly harmonies and hearty, happy spirit. Some are more free and facile than others, but all invite and encourage the hearer to "foot it feathily" as he passes. The fundamental themes, by the way, were only selected and not written by Brahms, although it was his touch that gave them their permanent value.

The Mozart "Jupiter" symphony gave its usual deep and true delight, and presented its forms of beauty and nobility. Whatever may have been the cause of that appellation, the composer's genius here soared to the empyrean and won its right to rest upon the attributes of victory over material and moral hardships, trials and woes. This music softens, sweetens and strengthens by its own influence, and it elevates and encourages by what it implies of devotion to ideals and high aims.

The new overture was delightful and sympathetic. Only during a few moments has it apparently anything to say of adverse fortune, suffering, harsh condition or conflict. It is built principally upon a very lovely and appealing melody, always tenderly voiced and gaining influence, if not actual force, at each return, as if to delineate the enduring beauty of soft, clinging, faithful affection and gentleness.

The orchestra played beautifully all the numbers through, the programme was delightfully brief, and Mr. Hambourg had hearty, but not extreme, applause.

The next programme is thus given out: Overture, "A Night in Carlstein".....Fibich
(First time.)

Concerto for violin.....Mackenzie
Andante cantabile.....Beethoven
Suite No. 3.....Tschalkowsky
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Mark Hambourg Plays With Symphony Orchestra.

Concert Tonight for Benefit of Harvard Germanic Museum.

"Paradise Lost" and "Hiawatha" Coming Choral Offerings.

The 12th Symphony program had for soloist Mr. Mark Hambourg, who was heard in the Liszt piano concerto in E flat major. The concerto opened with the introduction to Anton Arensky's opera, "Nala and Damayanti," played for the first time here, and the other selections were a group of five Hungarian dances by Brahms and Mozart's

"Jupiter" symphony. The program, which was varied enough to suit all tastes, was of just the proper length, one hour and a half. Mr. Hambourg is a familiar figure to local concert patrons, and his style of playing has evoked much discussion, his exhibitions of physical power in particular calling forth many criticisms, favorable and otherwise. His technical skill is wonderful, even in this age of development, and if at times he becomes less the interpreter than he should his performances are so virile and inspiring that his brilliant work is enjoyable even to the auditor who is not entirely in accord with the interpretation.

The concerto was played at lightning speed at times, the finale, with its sweeping chords and double octave runs, being fairly pyrotechnical in its vigor and dash, and in the elaborate figurations of the second theme Hambourg's fingers fairly flew over the keyboard, yet but few phrases were indistinct and those in the fortissimo passages, the usual places. The tinkling scherzo formed a pleasing contrast to the more vigorous parts of the work, and here the performer showed the beautiful quality of his touch in a clarity of tone and crispness of staccato that was thoroughly delightful. The orchestra performed its part well, despite the terrific pace which the soloist set at intervals. Mr. Hambourg's welcome was very cordial.

The overture to Arensky's opera is a dainty, mystical work, with "magic spells" woven in musical form and accompanying pastoral suggestiveness running through the whole score. The composition is rather peculiar in form, the themes being fragmentary and rapidly changed to the different contingents of the orchestra, and the piano is introduced as part of the instrumental body. Aside from it being a pleasing bit of music it calls for no special mention. The score presented no difficulties that Mr. Gericke's players could not easily compass.

The five Hungarian dances by Brahms, scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow, were given with splendid effect, the various characteristics of each number being set forth in the happiest manner. The Mozart symphony, which closed the program, received a magnificent interpretation.

This week's program will have for soloist Mr. T. Adamowski, who will play a violin concerto by Mackenzie. The orchestral selections will be the overture, "A Night in Carlstein," Fibich; "Andante Cantabile," Beethoven, and Tschalkowsky's suite No. 3.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; ITS TWELFTH CONCERT

Anton Arensky's "Nala and Damayanti" Overture.

MARK HAMBOURG PIANIST

A Dashing Performance of Liszt's
Brilliant and Defiant Concerto in E Flat.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Nala and Damayanti"..... Arensky
Concerto in E flat No. 1, for piano..... Liszt
Hungarian Dances 11, 12, 13, 14, 15..... Brahms-Parlow
"Jupiter" symphony..... Mozart

An Orthodox Russian.

Arensky is known here chiefly by his trio and his piano concerto, although certain small pieces for the piano were introduced by Mr. Siloti and have been played since by others. The overture performed last night for the first time in Boston is for an opera founded on the legend of King Nala, the passionate dicer, who incurred the hatred of a god and thereby lost his kingdom and all that he had, save his wife Damayanti, at a game of chance. The legend is an episode of the Mahabharata. After separation and other trials and tribulations the king won back his possessions and found his wife. The overture is short, simple and pretty. Pretty is the word, for there is no marked emotional quality in the music, but there is melodic grace and there is harmonic sweetness of a conventional and salon nature. We are accustomed to characterize certain harmonic progressions and contours of melody as oriental, and the good-natured hearer will find the East in this overture; but we are far from orientalism as understood by Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff and the ultra-moderns; for Arensky is not of their school, and is not conspicuous for originality. Nevertheless, this overture is pleasant and soothing to the ear, and it is a good thing to be familiar with it occasionally.

Mr. Mark Hambourg.

The young Russian pianist was fortunate in his choice of concerto, and appreciated the characteristic qualities of the music. It is hard for us to realize in these revolutionary days, when Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy, each in his way, are striking out new paths, the defiant note of Liszt's first concerto, which was as a glove thrown in the face of the conventionalism of the fifties. This music was not only considered as reckless; it was thought blasphemous. Sermons were preached against it, and the triangle was held to be a true instance of Satan in music, and it thus took the place of the tritone. Mr. Hambourg played the concerto with amazing fire and brilliance; the arabesques were treated with elegance; the song was sung, not declaimed. The performance was a fine one from every point of view. I have had occasion before this to deplore Mr. Hambourg's extravagances in force and speed. It is a pleasure to say that his playing last night was that of a master. No wonder that the audience was aroused to enthusiasm.

Brahms's Dances.

It is a good thing to relieve programs by the introduction of light and agreeable pieces. Brahms wrote Hungarian dances for the piano for four hands; that is to say he arranged dance-tunes by Hungarian composers and put the Gipsy Muse in a corset. Then he scored three of the dances for orchestra; and Parlow and Dvorak scored others of the set. If we are to have such dances in symphony concerts, why are we not also permitted to hear Chabrier's Espana, a veritable masterpiece? Or the Coppella or Sylvia suite of Delibes; or one of the fascinating ballet suites of Tschalkowsky? They have not suffered in beauty or charm by performance at popular concerts. These dances of Brahms were scored by a hand-master, and have been played in beer-halls. Second-rate music by Brahms and Company is not better on account of the sacred name of Johannes than first-class music by Frenchmen or Russians.

It was a pleasure to hear the orchestra again after its triumphs in other cities. Mr. Gericke conducted with his usual authority, although his right arm, strained during the trip, is not yet in wholly normal condition, and he was obliged to direct for the most part with his left.

DISCLOSURES REGARDING THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Boston, Mass., January 16, 1903.

Editor of The Musical Courier:

YOUR issue of December 10 contains an editorial entitled "Permanent Orchestra," in the course of which you make the following statement:

"At the same time we are suffering from this want of a permanent orchestra, and it cannot be permanent under its charter, because its must make their living outside, playing in theatre orchestras, balls, parties, restaurants, receptions, weddings, &c. Members of permanent orchestras are not allowed to do this because it interferes with their bowing and with their work, &c."

My statement should not be allowed to remain uncorrected, as here in Boston the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are allowed to do just the same as above mentioned, although by the terms of their charter it can be prevented at any time by Mr.

This great organization, of which Boston is the headquarters, has proved in some ways to be not an unmixed blessing; the tendency has been to create almost a monopoly, the facts being that while the series of symphony concerts are eminently successful, other musical enterprises are doomed to financial failure and opera does not pay, and recitals by the finest artists, with very few exceptions, do not bring audience. Then, again, the constant importation of foreign musicians, which has now been going on for fifteen years, has given us a body of some who, under present conditions, compete with the best, some of whom were formerly in the forefront of all kinds of orchestral business, and the result is that the salaries of orchestral musicians, instead of what they should, in this day of high prices for musical talent, have come down about 25 per cent. from what they were twenty years ago in some classes of orchestras, and in no case has there been any increase except when paid by Mr. Higginson himself to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It can be truly stated that the cost of sending abroad for artists so extensively has been justified by the results obtained in the long run. That some artists of the highest rank have been imported whose talent has justified their being imported, as in the case of Mole, Pourtoun and Longy. Others have been imported who were no better than could have been had right here in New York, while in a few cases the men imported (with such a flourish of trumpets) have been of the Jupiter symphony. The program, which was varied enough to suit all tastes, was of just the proper length, one hour and a half. Mr. Hambourg is a familiar figure to local concert patrons, and his style of playing has evoked much discussion, his exhibitions of physical power in particular calling forth many criticisms, favorable and otherwise. His technical skill is wonderful, even in this age of development, and if at times he becomes less the interpreter than he should his performances are so virile and inspiring that his brilliant work is enjoyable even to the auditor who is not entirely in accord with the interpretation.

138

The concerto was played at lightning speed at times, the finale, with its sweeping chords and double octave runs, being fairly pyrotechnical in its vigor and dash, and in the elaborate figurations of the second theme Hambourg's fingers fairly flew over the keyboard, yet but few phrases were indistinct and those in the fortissimo passages, the usual places. The tinkling scherzo formed a pleasing contrast to the more vigorous parts of the work, and here the performer showed the beautiful quality of his touch in a clarity of tone and crispness of staccato that was thoroughly delightful. The orchestra performed its part well, despite the terrific pace which the soloist set at intervals. Mr. Hambourg's welcome was very cordial.

The overture to Arensky's opera is a dainty, mystical work, with "magic spells" woven in musical form and accompanying pastoral suggestiveness running through the whole score. The composition is rather peculiar in form, the themes being fragmentary and rapidly changed to the different contingents of the orchestra, and the piano is introduced as part of the instrumental body. Aside from it being a pleasing bit of music it calls for no special mention. The score presented no difficulties that Mr. Gerlicke's players could not easily compass.

The five Hungarian dances by Brahms, scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow, were given with splendid effect, the various characteristics of each number being set forth in the happiest manner. The Mozart symphony, which closed the program, received a magnificent interpretation.

This week's program will have for soloist Mr. T. Adamowski, who will play a violin concerto by Mackenzie. The orchestral selections will be the overture, "A Night in Carlstein," Fibich; "Andante Cantabile," Beethoven, and Tchaikowsky's suite No. 3.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; ITS TWELFTH CONCERT

Anton Arensky's "Nala and Damayanti" Overture.

MARK HAMBOURG PIANIST

A Dashing Performance of Liszt's
Brilliant and Defiant Concerto in E Flat.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gerlicke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Nala and Damayanti"..... Arensky
Concerto in E flat No. 1, for piano..... Liszt
Hungarian Dances 11, 12, 13, 14, 15..... Brahms-Parlow
"Jupiter" symphony..... Mozart

An Orthodox Russian.

Arensky is known here chiefly by his trio and his piano concerto, although certain small pieces for the piano were introduced by Mr. Siloti and have been played since by others. The overture performed last night for the first time in Boston is for an opera founded on the legend of King Nala, the passionate dicer, who incurred the hatred of a god and thereby lost his kingdom and all that he had, save his wife Damayanti, at a game of chance. The legend is an episode of the Mahabharata. After separation and other trials and tribulations the king won back his possessions and found his wife. The overture is short, simple and pretty. Pretty is the word, for there is no marked emotional quality in the music, but there is melodic grace and there is harmonic sweetness of a conventional and salon nature. We are accustomed to characterize certain harmonic progressions and contours of melody as oriental, and the good-natured hearer will find the East in this overture; but we are far from orientalism as understood by Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff and the ultra-moderns; for Arensky is not of their school, and is not conspicuous for originality. Nevertheless, this overture is pleasant and soothing to the ear, and it is a good thing to be occasionally.

139

Mr. Mark Ham

The young Russian perfect in his choice of the music. It is in these revolutionary days, the defiant paths, the defiant concerto, which in the face of the fifties. This considered as blasphemous. against it, and be a true inst and it thus too Mr. Hambourg's amazing first arabesques of the song was performance point of view fore this to a pleasure night was that the thusiasm.

HAIGHT

Stocks, B

85 STA

Branch Om

"Determining el responsibility important as se

PROG

in symmetrations has been n also Esparada Mini
the Cletor and Hoodlum m or of Lymric, Canon and of TIGHT.

Guarantee

of E UNTIL MILL IS ma Mill April 1st. Divi ha
and prospectus.
Will Advan
Agents, Volckert B
the Bank & Trust Compa
t mining men.

in 4
in Share

DISCLOSURES REGARDING THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Boston, Mass., January 16, 1903.

To the Editor of The Musical Courier:

OUR issue of December 10 contains an editorial entitled "Permanent Orchestra," in the course of which you make the following statement:

"At the same time we are suffering from this want of a permanent orchestra, and it cannot be permanent under its charter, because its members must make their living outside, playing in orchestras, theatre orchestras, balls, parties, restaurants, dances, receptions, weddings, &c. Members of permanent orchestras are not allowed to do this because it interferes with their bowing and with their work, &c."

The above statement should not be allowed to remain uncontradicted, as here in Boston the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are allowed to do just the cheap business above mentioned, although by the terms of their contract it can be prevented at any time by Mr. Higginson. This great organization, of which Boston is so proud, has proved in some ways to be not an unmixed blessing, as the tendency has been to create almost a musical monopoly, the facts being that while the series of Boston Symphony concerts are eminently successful, almost all other musical enterprises are doomed to financial failure. Grand opera does not pay, and recitals by the most renowned artists, with very few exceptions, do not draw a paying audience. Then, again, the constant importation of foreign musicians, which has now been going on for nineteen years, has given us a body of some eighty men who, under present conditions, compete with the local men, some of whom were formerly in the orchestra, for all kinds of orchestral business, and the result is that the salaries of orchestral musicians, instead of going up, as they should, in this day of high prices for food, coal, &c., have come down about 25 per cent. from what they were twenty years ago in some classes of orchestra work, and in no case has there been any increase of salaries except when paid by Mr. Higginson himself in the Symphony Orchestra. It can be truly stated that the policy of sending abroad for artists so extensively has not been justified by the results obtained in the long run. It is true that some artists of the highest rank have been secured whose talent has justified their being imported, viz., Sautet, Mole, Pourtoun and Longy. Others have proved to be no better than could have been had right in Boston or New York, while in a few cases the men imported (with such a flourish of trumpets) have been of the most ordinary calibre, and had they been local men would not have been allowed to play ten days in the orchestra. Yet rather than admit that a mistake has been made, those same men are allowed to stay in the orchestra, and, in some cases, to draw the highest salaries. It is reported that Mr. Higginson, in his annual address to the orchestra last May, devoted a part of his remarks to congratulating the orchestra that they now, after many years of trial, thanks to the talented "Frenchmen" he had imported, had a woodwind section on a par with the fine body of strings. Mr. Higginson cannot be a fine judge of the "woodwind" or he would know that at the present time, outside of M. Longy, the truly eminent oboe of the orchestra, there are no players there of the highest rank, and in one case the imported artist is a player of the most ordinary ability.

140

It is surely strange that Mr. Higginson, patriotic citizen as he is in all other respects, should allow his great orchestra to be managed in such an unpatriotic manner. Strange it is that if his artists have no sense of the dignity of their position as members of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are willing to accept engagements at Keith's Theatre at a low salary, and to appear sandwiched in between a lot of trained animals and acrobatic acts, and also at theatres, restaurants and balls, he does not put a stop to such work, as by their contracts he has a right to do. Surely the outlook is discouraging enough already to a local musician when he sees the orchestra being filled up each year by more and more new men from abroad, who draw the highest salaries for the least work, not to have these same men in many cases proceed to compete with the local men for all classes of orchestral work in Boston and vicinity. At the present time no summer hotel, from Maine to Rhode Island, is satisfied unless they can advertise "music by Boston Symphony players," even if there is only one member of the Symphony who plays, the rest being picked up here and there. The public are not supposed to know the difference. Another thing has been commented on the past season, viz., the influence being used by "society ladies" to get their protégés admitted to the orchestra. The admission of two members is said to be brought about by the above "society" influence, the rumor being all the more credited, as the abilities of the players alone would hardly entitle them to the distinction of membership in such an orchestra. It is certainly a laughable state of affairs when one sees the name "Symphony Orchestra" a dozen times a week in the daily papers as playing for "Mrs. Mears' reception," or "Madame Wiggins' ball," or at "Miss Harmony's wedding," or at "the hop at the Ocean House," or at Hotel Preston. To "cap the climax" we read that "Symphony men will play each evening at the Hotel Somerset" and "The Lenox."

The "dear public," which is not at all musical, has come to believe that to be a member of the "Symphony"

141
makes a man an "artist," and not to be one of the "elect" is a sure sign of lack of talent.

Quite recently in a Boston paper was published an account of a society ball in Worcester, with "delightful music by the Salem Cadet Band, and Mr. Gott and his 'Symphony men,'" and there were probably a number of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were willing to do such business and at the ordinary price, as it is well known that Mr. Gott, who is perfectly honest, pays only the ordinary price to his men. And again it is claimed that persons, other than the players, connected with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been known to take orders to furnish an orchestra for a reception, wedding, &c., and turn over the engagement to some member of the orchestra who engages personally the men and takes charge of the affair, it being so arranged that each one above mentioned takes a liberal slice of the money paid as "commission," so that in many cases by the time the men who do the work are paid they get a low price on a par with the ordinary player, so called, who cannot add the magic words "member of the Symphony" on his card. One is forced to the conclusion that either many members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sadly lacking in respect to Mr. Higginson and the dignity of their position as members of his great orchestra, or that they are not paid the generous salaries that the public is led to believe are received by those fortunate enough to be admitted to that noted company of players.

The above remarks, Mr. Editor, will throw a little light on the orchestral situation here in Boston, and show that your statement above quoted, which I have taken as my "text," is not borne out by the facts and conditions as they now exist in Boston. Let us hope that the contrary may be the case with the permanent orchestras in Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg and Philadelphia.

SUBSCRIBER.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Trans:

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The symphony concerts for this season are now half over. The twelfth concert, given Saturday evening, with Mr. Mark Hambourg as soloist, had the following programme:

Arensky: Introduction to the Opera, "Nala and Damayanti." (First time.)
Liszt: Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Piano-forte and Orchestra.
Brahms: Hungarian Dances, Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15. (Orchestrated by Albert Parlow.)
Mozart: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

The feature of this concert was the superb playing of Mr. Mark Hambourg. After the attractive young girls we have lately been hearing perform, the respectable pedagogues with excellent techniques, and the stolid British contraltos, et cetera, et cetera, ad libitum, the presence of a

erty to contract home, and in the temporary man-now hampering
Children's Hospi-
e allowed to de-
the smallest con-
ar is needed and
tle will help, and ouble.

TO BUTTER?

ch has found its nd in lachrymose.
a lively New York
absence from din-
the bread, there umane minds that d on a man who from his father's ays had it on his business fired his itate some of her d of the material
am on good white
more, it must add that just as his allow of his buyfanciest butter in e must swear off
e golden accompa-important meal of sermons could be tion. Usually the submit to his wife's an will usually do

with ambitions; and solace of retiring
g a monologue on
d dogs new tricks,
give the old adage
ough the pates of born to it. Then ver had been born,
g that his mother
to butterless din-ivation would not middle age that o sunny. It is a s, to have parents
d not do things in then the thought ring this dispensa-with equanimity he own youngsters so

ist:

amowski.

most ordinary calibre, and had they been local men would not have been allowed to play ten days in the orchestra. Yet rather than admit that a mistake has been made, those same men are allowed to stay in the orchestra, and, in some cases, to draw the highest salaries. It is reported that Mr. Higginson, in his annual address to the orchestra last May, devoted a part of his remarks to congratulating the orchestra that they now, after many years of trial, thanks to the talented "Frenchmen" he had imported, had a woodwind section on a par with the fine body of strings. Mr. Higginson cannot be a fine judge of the "woodwind" or he would know that at the present time, outside of M. Longy, the truly eminent oboe of the orchestra, there are no players there of the highest rank, and in one case the imported artist is a player of the most ordinary ability.

It is surely strange that Mr. Higginson, patriotic citizen as he is in all other respects, should allow his great orchestra to be managed in such an unpatriotic manner. Strange it is that if his artists have no sense of the dignity of their position as members of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are willing to accept engagements at Keith's Theatre at a low salary, and to appear sandwiched in between a lot of trained animals and acrobatic acts, and also at theatres, restaurants and balls, he does not put a stop to such work, as by their contracts he has a right to do. Surely the outlook is discouraging enough already to a local musician when he sees the orchestra being filled up each year by more and more new men from abroad, who draw the highest salaries for the least work, not to have these same men in many cases proceed to compete with the local men for all classes of orchestral work in Boston and vicinity. At the present time no summer hotel, from Maine to Rhode Island, is satisfied unless they can advertise "music by Boston Symphony players," even if there is only one member of the Symphony who plays, the rest being picked up here and there. The public are not supposed to know the difference. Another thing has been commented on the past season, viz., the influence being used by "society ladies" to get their protégés admitted to the orchestra. The admission of two members is said to be brought about by the above "society" influence, the rumor being all the more credited, as the abilities of the players alone would hardly entitle them to the distinction of membership in such an orchestra. It is certainly a laughable state of affairs when one sees the name "Symphony Orchestra" a dozen times a week in the daily papers as playing for "Mrs. Mears' reception," or "Madame Wiggins' ball," or at "Miss Harmony's wedding," or at "the hop at the Ocean House," or at Hotel Preston. To "cap the climax" we read that "Symphony men will play each evening at the Hotel Somerset" and "The Lenox."

The "dear public," which is not at all musical, has come to believe that to be a member of the "Symphony"

makes a man an "artist," and not to be one of the "elect" is a sure sign of lack of talent.

Quite recently in a Boston paper was an account of a society ball in Worcester, with music by the Salem Cadet Band, and Mr. "Symphony men," and there were probably members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra willing to do such business and at the same time as it is well known that Mr. Gott, who is paid only the ordinary price to his men. It is claimed that persons, other than the players, with the management of the Boston Symphony have been known to take orders to furnish for a reception, wedding, &c., and turn over to some member of the orchestra who personally the men and takes charge of the affair arranged that each one above mentioned slice of the money paid as "commission," so that by the time the men who do the work get a low price on a par with the ordinary called, who cannot add the magic words "Symphony" on his card. One is forced to conclude that either many members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sadly lacking in respect to their position and the dignity of their position as members of the orchestra, or that they are not paid the general rate that the public is led to believe are received by the fortunate enough to be admitted to that notable players.

The above remarks, Mr. Editor, will throw a light on the orchestral situation here in Boston. I show that your statement above quoted, taken as my "text," is not borne out by the conditions as they now exist in Boston. Let us hope the contrary may be the case with the permanent orchestra in Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg and Philadelphia.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The symphony concerts for this season are now half over. The twelfth concert, given Saturday evening, with Mr. Mark Hambourg as soloist, had the following programme:

Arensky: Introduction to the Opera, "Nala and Damayanti." (First time.)
Liszt: Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Piano-forte and Orchestra.
Brahms: Hungarian Dances, Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15. (Orchestrated by Albert Parlow.)
Mozart: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

The feature of this concert was the superb playing of Mr. Mark Hambourg. After the attractive young girls we have lately been hearing perform, the respectable pedagogues with excellent techniques, and the stolid British contraltos, et cetera, et cetera, ad libitum, the presence of a genuine, old-fashioned pianoforte virtuoso restored one's confidence in the power of a musical performance to arouse one to the shouting point of enthusiasm; it was like a glass of champagne after many cups of luke-warm tea. On sundry earlier occasions Mr. Hambourg has clearly proved his possession of a vast technique, but, in this city at least, he has not often shown much else. Saturday night, however, his technique was displayed only in so far as it enabled him to offer a performance of the Liszt concerto magnificent in whole and in detail. To speak first of details, there was toward the end of the slow episode one of the loveliest, evenest and most subtly shaded trills ever heard in Boston. The scherzo was exquisite in its delicate lightness. There was beautiful cantilena, cantilena that floated and flowed; it never jerked and halted. The ornamental arabesques were enchanting to listen to, for with them Mr. Hambourg did not try to smother the sound of the orchestra. On the other hand, however, he did, by big, dramatic playing, make many passages significant that usually sound meaningless, at the most, pompous. And the whole performance was alive with a personal magnetism that made even an ordinary scale passage electrifying. From the impressive delivery of the first theme till the thundering chords at the close of the concerto, Mr. Hambourg held his audience fast. There was no rustling of programme books, no peering about to see who had stopped at home tonight. At the end there was frantic applause, amid which Mr. Hambourg was recalled five times. After this wild, abandoned exhibition of Tartar passion, how funny the Brahms pieces did sound.

Another pleasant feature of the concert was the Arensky overture. This music sounded like Mendelssohn up to date, charmingly melodious, beautifully orchestrated, and, unlike Mendelssohn, with a hint of the Valkyries, Wotan's daughters, on one of their wild rides. It was thoroughly agreeable to listen to; there was not too much of it, and it was admirably played.

Of a Mozart composition at a modern symphony concert it is useless to speak. In our large halls the score sounds both thin and harsh, and the music, unfortunately, is so easy of execution that the orchestra will be at no pains to play it well. Such, at all events, was the case with the first movement of the symphony Saturday evening.

At this week's concert, Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the soloist. This is the programme: Fabich, overture, "A Night in Carlstein" (first time); Mackenzie, concerto for violin; Beethoven, Andante Cantabile; Tchaikowsky, Suite No. 3. R. R. G.

143

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |               |   |
|---------------|---|
| FIBICH,       | OVERTURE in F major to Vrchlicky's Comedy,"A Night at Karlstein." op. 26.(First time.)  |
| MACKENZIE,    | SUITE for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, "Pibroch."op. 42.I. Rhapsody.II. Caprice.III. Dance.(First time with Orchestra.)  |
| BEETHOVEN,    | ANDANTE CANTABILE from the PIANOFORTETRIO in B flat major, op. 97.(Orchestrated by LISZT).                                    |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY, | SUITE No. 3, in G major, op. 55.I. Elegie.II. Valse mélancholique.III. Scherzo, molto vivace.IV. Tema con variazioni. |

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR OF "POP" CONCERTS.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 8, P. M

Programme.

- |               |  |
|---------------|--|
| FIBICH.       | OVERTURE in F major to Vrehlicky's Comedy,"A Night at Karlstein." op. 26.(First time.)                                       |
| MACKENZIE.    | SUITE for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, "Pibroch"op. 42.I. Rhapsody.II. Caprice.III. Dance.(First time with Orchestra.)  |
| BEETHOVEN.    | ANDANTE CANTABILE from the PIANOFORTETRIO in B flat major, op. 97.(Orchestrated by LISZT).                                   |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY. | SUITE No. 3, in G major, op. 55.I. Elegie.II. Valse mélancolique.III. Scherzo, molto vivace.IV. Tema con variazioni. |

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

SCOTCH AND BOHEMIAN UNFAMILIAR PIECES

Played at the Thirteenth Symphony Concert of Last Night.

FIBICH'S COMEDY OVERTURE

Mackenzie's "Pibroch" Suite for Violin as Performed by Mr.
Timothee Adamowski.

By PHILIP HALE.

The thirteenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, began with a performance of Fibich's overture to "A Night at Karlstein," which was played here for the first time. The overture was written as a prelude to Vrchlicky's historical comedy. The subject of this dramatic piece is the command of Charles IV., King of the Romans, that nothing feminine should enter into his castle Karlstein. His wife Elizabeth, his fourth wife by the way, loved him passionately, was wildly jealous of him, and found a way to disobey his order.

Zdenko Fibich's Music.

Fibich, an extraordinarily fertile composer, a very rabbit, is here hardly a name, yet a quartet by him was played in New York at least a dozen years ago, and he is known in Western cities by orchestral as well as chamber music. He studied diligently at Leipsic and Mannheim and was evidently influenced by Mendelssohn and Schumann. This overture is hardly a comedy overture; it seems more adapted to some special function, as the dedication of a theatre; for what in the world has the swollen apotheosis or the final pomp to do with a comedy? To be sure there is the prelude to "The Mastersingers," to which the objection of incongruity might be made if we were unacquainted with the character of Wagner's comedy. Here, the resemblance ceases. Fibich's overture is an honest work, sonorous at times, conventionally made for the most part, and without any evidences of marked individuality. The themes are of slight importance, in fact, rather ordinary, and they are thin supports for the developed structure raised upon them. What is especially missed is the national Czech flavor, which is unmistakable in Smetana's music and also in the best and most characteristic pieces of Dvorak. This overture is the work of a German conservatory pupil, well grounded in routine.

Mackenzie's "Pibroch."

Mr. Timothee Adamowski played Mackenzie's "Pibroch," a violin suite written for Sarasate, and introduced by that great violinist in this country in 1889. Sarasate played it in Boston with piano accompaniment in 1890. Sir Alexander is a Scot and the son of a Scot, and he surely ought to know how a pibroch sounds. Perhaps his suite would be more effective if it had been written for the great Highland Bagpipe and played by some formidable MacCrimmon or Donald in a kilt. Last night there was little suggestion of the piper, and on the other hand it was hard to be enthusiastic over the work as a violin suite. The first movement, a Rhapsody, might go; it is by far the most romantic and imaginative portion of the work, but Mr. Adamowski, although he has many admirable qualities as a violinist, is hardly the man for such music. The Rhapsody demanded a player of commanding authority; the hearer must be compelled into admiration, ready to accept any flourish as wildly or heroically Scottish, but Mr. Adamowski, when his performance is best, is seductive rather than authoritative; he charms but is not heroic. And it must be said that last night he was not wholly in the vein as a performer, for his intonation was not flawless, and the difficulties of the piece were at times too apparent. The second movement is a series of variations, and in this Caprice Mr. Adamowski was more successful in song passages than in bravura. The Finale of the work is a dance, and a heavy one. The Suite is by no means an inspired composition, and there is a smell of the factory about it, rather than the perfume of the heather, or even the odor of Glenlivet. The player was recalled and a wreath was handed to him.

Tschaikowsky's Third Suite.

Liszt's transcription of the Andante Cantabile from Beethoven's B flat piano trio was followed by Tschaikowsky's suite No. 3, which has not been heard here for some years. It is not one of his strongest works, yet it contains eminently characteristic passages. When Mr. Nikisch brought it out (it was in 1891), it seemed to me that the melancholy waltz and the scherzo were the inferior movements of the suite. Last night they were by far the most impressive. The opening elegy is amiable flowing music, and some of it might be called pretty; but with the exception of one crescendo, there is little to take it out of the salon. But the Valse that once seemed forced and deliberately singular, now sounds as the natural speech of Tschalkowsky, speech that drips with a melancholy known to him alone, a sadness that is intensely human, yes, apimal. No one but Tschalkowsky could have imagined this rhythmic, yet halting wail, no one but he could have found the fitting musical language for such emotions. And in the trio of the Scherzo there is the thought, the germ of much of the scherzo of the Pathetic symphony. This, too, is peculiarly Tschalkowskian.

The Hour for Variations.

The finale is a theme with variations, and it may be said that no variations should be heard after 9 o'clock when the concert begins at 8 P. M. However, ingenious any variations may be, they are for earlier attention. Some of Tschalkowsky's are ingenious and interesting; nor do I see why any one with a sense of humor should object to the blare and roar of the Polonaise. There is a certain inherent vulgarity in every festival occasion, even in a Coronation, and the circus is not always in the tent. Furthermore, the vulgarity of Tschalkowsky is wholesome; it is like the smell of a fresh clod with its suggestion of the inevitable end and the awaiting earth; for in Tschalkowsky's vulgarity—and nearly all if not all the truly great have a touch of what the genteel and the finical call vulgarity—there is also some memento mori.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Yesterday's Programme Remarkable in Its Way.

Its Main Number an Overture, Fibich's "Night at Carlstein," a Work Well Worth Hearing—Mr. Adamowski Appears as Soloist in the "Pibroch" Suite.

This was a Symphony concert without a symphony. But it was none the worse for that little informality. Indeed, the evening was delightful for the brevity, variety and general charm of its programme, which included one novelty and a solo number for a high personal and professional favorite.

The new overture, Fibich's "Night at Carlstein," proved to be worth hearing, and to imply something intelligible. Carlstein, it appears, is a castle on a rock in a valley about a score of miles from Prague. Its name—"Charles Stone"—indicates that a King Charles of the 14th century built it as a stronghold and a retreat, adorning it richly and keeping the Bohemian crown in its chapel. This overture, as the programme-book has discovered, is the prologue to a comedy which Vrehlicky (who shall dare to try speaking his name?) wrote about a trait and an episode attaching to the aforesaid Charles. This monarch was as exclusive in his views about women as the management of the Favalstock Hotel, in Covent Garden, London, and the "eternal feminine" was forbidden to pass his threshold. But his wife, who adored him and was desperately, but causelessly, jealous, found a way to evade his commands, as the play shows. The overture, which is as bright and entertaining as it is honest and lucid, need not be charged with story or significance, for as mere music it fills a dozen minutes genially and joyously. It has, however, two phases and two moods, which may be assumed to typify the matrimonial antithesis. It begins andante with horn calls and short, decided, but not dogmatic, phrases for the brass, wherein the horn quality, predominates, and after this a quick, light, and tricky movement is established with daintily coquettish turns and piquant figures. After some separate development of these, they are blended into a finale in which the horn figure maintains its character and strength, but accepts the entwining fancies of the strings. The overture was delicately, even poetically, played, and must have stirred a desire that Mr. Gericke should draw again from the vast stock of Fibich's compositions, 600 and more in number.

In the good old days of negro minstrelsy the violinist of a troupe was apt, after imitating a reluctant pump, a hard-winding clock and an assertive donkey, to show farcically how a bagpipe sounded out its quavers and drawls and drones. Many old-fashioned folk may have thought of this when they found that Mr. T. Adamowski was set down to play Mackenzie's so-called "Pibroch" suite for the violin, and wondered what might be coming next. But Sir Alexander had no such triviality in mind when he composed this suite a dozen years ago. Like a true Scotchman, he thought upon the glorious incidents of courage, patriotism, battle and death, in which the keen, high, potent and penetrating voice of the bagpipe had incited, encouraged, cheered and glorified—when its pibrochs had summoned, impelled and celebrated the victory or lamented the defeat of Highland men. So he wrote a rhapsody, a caprice and a dance in such forms and such moods as might suit with the spirit of the great bagpipe and fit with its possibilities until the limit of its scale was overrun. The suite, which Sarasate tried in some American cities in the winter of 1889-90, is a skilful and far from undignified piece of writing for the soloist, and is handsomely supported by orchestration in which the harp has thoughtful and appropriate importance.

Mr. Adamowski played it ingratiatingly and at times brilliantly. He retains the sweet, sentimental tone and persuasive phrasing of former years, but he has gained sturdiness, substantiality and depth of style, and blends these various elements to good effect. The suite was received with lively demonstrations of pleasure, and the player was recalled.

Next came Liszt's respectful and reasonable orchestral amplification of the andante cantabile from Beethoven's great B flat pianoforte trio, opus 97, and the concerto ended with Tschalkowsky's third suite, opus 55, in G major. The composer found life grievous, bitter and perplexed, not only in what he felt and bore, but in what he saw and had to reflect upon. It was no wonder that pathos and tragedy are never long absent from his pages, and that his levity often seems forced and unnatural. He here begins directly with an elegy, which is pensive rather than gloomy, and flows on as if there were consolation in thinking that what one mourns has left behind some possession which could have come only from the now departed. The waltz which follows has, indeed, the true pulse, but it sways slowly with a suggestion of laughter sadder than tears and smiles more touching than sighs. The scherzo has some natural joy, and its character is that of the careless tarantella, all for the life of the passing instant. The fourth movement, with its dozen variations upon a simple melody, shows many changes of fancy, plan and instrumental treatment. It implies more deliberation and attention in plan and execution, demonstrates Tschalkowsky's almost peerless skill in such work, and ends with more animated and concentrated strength than is to be found elsewhere in the suite. The performance of this—and, indeed, of all the programme—was most meritorious for care, taste and proficiency, and was all the more commendable as some temporary disability of Mr. Gericke's right hand restricted his instructive use of his baton.

The next concert will have this programme:

Overture, "The Water-carrier".....Cherubini
Aria from "Titus".....Mozart
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....R. Strauss

Aria from "St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish".....Schumann
Soloist, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

A New Name Appears, Introducing a Descriptive Overture.

A new name stands at the head of this week's Symphony programme. Zdenko Fibich, prominent among the younger Czech composers, was born at Sebor-schitz, Bohemia, in December, 1851, and early received careful and extended musical education at Prague and Leipzig in the schools, and had private training with Lachner. He was about 25 when he was appointed assistant kapellmeister to the National Theatre at Prague, and in that house he has produced several operas, one being based on Byron's "Don Juan," and a later one, called "Sarka," having made a notable success. He has also composed the music for a dramatic trilogy upon a Greek theme, several symphonic poems, much chamber and vocal music, together with several orchestras, one of which, "A Night on Karlstein," has been chosen for this week by Mr. Gericke. The title sounds promising.

Attention is just now called to Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the English composer, by the fact that at this week's Broadwood concert, in London, Miss Ethel Wood was to give the first performance of his new work, "A Reverie of the East." It is a violin concerto of him which Mr. T. Adamowski will use for the solo number of the present programme, and it is safe to presume—a printed copy being inaccessible—that he would not have chosen it unless it had beauty, strength and sentiment.

There will be played the Liszt orchestral arrangement of the andante in Beethoven's trio in D, opus 97, prepared for a centenary performance at Weimar in May, 1870, and brought out in Boston a dozen years later at a Philharmonic concert.

The other number will be the richly and beautifully wrought third suite of Tschalkowsky, which has been known and enjoyed in Boston since Mr. Nikisch presented it a dozen years ago. It is not, as will be remembered, a set of mere dance pieces, as suites so often are, but a sequence of four numbers, pensive or joyous in fancy, elegant and various in form, fluctuating but never trivial in feeling, and expository of the composer's best talent, learning and proficiency. The first movement is an elegy, moving gently, although it is in rondo form, and characterized by two sweet themes, the first a 6-8 andante in G, and the second a 2-4 air marked to be read with great expression. A waltz, with a fine contrast of minor and major, comes next, and then a most vivacious scherzo, which speaks rather of bonhomie than levity. The last movement is a clear and attractive theme, developed into a dozen variations, wherein the composer shows himself as wise and systematic as Brahms and as variously opulent in tone color and fanciful devices as any of the professors of ornamental orchestration. Among these variations are one which breaks into a tarantella, one that takes on the gravity of a chorale, one that becomes a folksong, another that is taken for its own by a solo violin, and a finale that is a dashing polacca.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

Mr. Timothée Adamowski played at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, the thirteenth of the season. This was the programme:

Fibich: Overture in F major to Vrehlicky's Comedy, "A Night at Karlstein," op. 26. (First time.)
Mackenzie: Suite for Violin and Orchestra, "Pibroch," op. 42. (First time with orchestra.)
Beethoven: Andante Cantabile from the Pianoforte Trio in B-flat major, op. 97. (Orchestrated by Liszt.)
Tschalkowsky: Suite No. 3, in G major, op. 55.

On Saturday Mr. Adamowski made his seventeenth appearance here as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra, on six of which occasions he has brought to hearing some work heretofore unknown in Boston. His choice for Saturday fell on Sir Alexander Campbell Mackenzie's "Pibroch" suite for violin and orchestra, a composition that might well be termed a "novelty," since it had been played, by Sarasate, only with pianoforte accompaniment. The first movement seemed far the strongest of the three. A rhapsody, it made a strong romantic appeal to the imagination, and was successful in creating an atmosphere of its own, which was dispelled by the marked inferiority of the following movements. To play a pibroch as we conceive it, Mr. Adamowski has not the heroic, warrior-like temperament. On the excellent authority, however, of Robert Louis Stevenson's David Balfour, we have it that pibrochs are not always martial. For the romantic, the poetical, the tender side of Scottish music

Mr. Adamowski has precisely the fitting qualities. In the course of the suite he did some very beautiful playing, charming greatly by the sweetness of his tone and the lovely turn of his phrases. At the end he was recalled several times and given a wreath of laurel.

There was another new work to be heard—an overture, "A Night at Karlstein," by the busy Fibich of Prague. As the programme-book has it, "the overture is frankly, clearly written, and it requires no long analysis." The andante from Beethoven's trio, also, with Liszt's fine trappings, needs few words. A slow movement from any one of the nine symphonies would have been preferable.

By far the most interesting number on the programme was the Tchaikovsky suite; at last there was something to listen to seriously. After a delightful "Elégie," a series of lovely melodies most happily scored, all pulsating with a gentle melancholy, came what Tchaikovsky called a waltz. Here the composer whined and snivelled in as dismal frame of mind as when he penned the Pathetic symphony—how different a mood, by the way, from that of the Brahms horn trio, likewise a gloomy work. The scherzo also suggested the Pathetic symphony. It was devilish—all rhythm, rhythm, no melody, no harmony, but a rhythm to drive one mad. This over-application of the principle "in the beginning God made rhythm" left one in a propitious mood for enjoying anything that might follow, far more the charming theme, with its cleverly written variations, ending with a rousing polonaise. Tchaikovsky was as good at a polonaise (calling to witness this one and that in "Eugen Onegin") as he was bad at a waltz.

All the evening the orchestra did remarkably brilliant playing, finally sweeping through the polonaise with an abandon that was electrifying.

Next Saturday evening we are to have Mme. Schumann-Heink to sing. Here is the programme: Cherubini, Overture, "The Water-Carrier"; Mozart, Aria from "Titus"; R. Strauss, Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Mendelssohn, Aria from "St. Paul"; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish."

R. R. G.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 13th Symphony program last week was without a symphony, the selections being an overture by Zdenko Fibich, MacKenzie's "Pibroch," suite for violin and orchestra, Liszt's orchestration of Beethoven's andante cantabile in B flat major from the piano trio and Tchaikovsky's suite in G major. Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the violin soloist. The Fibich and MacKenzie numbers were given for the first times at these concerts. The three movements of the MacKenzie suite are illustrations of the old bagpipe music in different forms, thoroughly Scottish in character, with the peculiar droning bass accompaniment usually heard in "pibroch" pieces. The second part is a series of variations on an old melody, with a contrasting tune to form the "caprice," and the dance theme of the finale is founded upon a once familiar Scottish air.

Mr. Adamowski apparently enjoyed playing the suite and certainly his auditors were pleased if the reception and applause bestowed upon the violinist be criterions. The form of the suite is free and of a quaint and jovial overtone and the style, in imitation of the bagpipe, is so peculiar in its rhythms and tonal contrasts that the listener is liable to consider the composition from its humorous side rather than the artistic. Mr. Adamowski, it seemed, began his work rather timidly, but soon this defect wore away and in the latter part of the first movement until the finale of the suite was reached his bowing was broad, vigorous and of a beautiful quality.

The difficult chord passages in the "Dance" were as harmonious as one could expect to hear, and the octave "jumps" were accomplished deftly and without deflection in pitch. The odd variations, largely staccato, were played brilliantly, and possibly the "Caprice" showed Mr. Adamowski's abilities in more favorable light than did the other movements, for its technical skill was displayed in a manner to win him a demonstrative recognition of appreciation, thoroughly deserved. At the close of his performance the popular artist was called many times to bow his acknowledgments.

The orchestral part of the "Pibroch" suite went very well, though calling for no special mention, the score not being very difficult and the solo violin part being the chief feature. The overture by Fibich is pleasing in character, of a romantic cast, and with some admirable measures allotted to the bass contingent, which body performed its part sonorously and in good tone.

The flowing rhythms of the Beethoven andante cantabile were given with exquisite effect by Mr. Gericke's forces, the work by the strings being entitled to special commendation. The Tchaikowsky suite, as a whole, was the gem of the program, the last movement in particular showing the best qualities of the orchestra in complicated ensemble work of a brilliant nature.

The celebrated contralto, Mme. Schumann-Heink, will be the soloist this week in an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The orchestral selections will be the overture from Chevubini's "The Water Carrier," "Death and Transfiguration," a tone poem by R. Strauss, and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fibich.....Overture, "A Night in Karlstein."
(First time.)
MacKenzie.....Pibroch for Violin.
Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist.
Beethoven.....Andante Cantabile.
Tchaikowsky.....Suite No. 3

For once a concert without a symphony, although the suite was of symphonic proportions and earnestness. We found our old acquaintances, Wagner's Rhine-daughters, swimming around in Fibich's overture, and, per contra, we did not find anything essentially Bohemian in the work of this Bohemian composer. Richter and Jadassohn had evidently transmuted the Czech metal into German silver. There was a fatal facility in the work, and one felt that the composer could have delivered the same sort of goods in any required quantity, if ordered. But, after all, talent is often more easily digested than genius, and there was something very pleasant in the cradling melodies, the expected climax and the many syncopations with which the overture was garnished.

Let us give all due credit to Mr. Adamowski for avoiding the too well-trodden path of the violin soloist and eschewing Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch and Mendelssohn and their familiar violin concertos. Nevertheless, we cannot thrill very much in response to Mackenzie's "Pibroch." How many composers have tried to expand the Scottish music into the classical forms and how few have succeeded! Beethoven, Franz and Schumann have essayed "lieder" which have been about as Gaelic as Rhine wine; Bruch has worked up "The Campbells Are Comin'" (in "Fair Ellen") into a most Teutonic climax, and has made a Scotch fantasie for violin and orchestra that is by no means Scottish; not only Mendelssohn, among the Germans, has succeeded in catching the true lilt of the beautiful music of the north.

One would imagine that Mackenzie would be to the manner born, that he would bring forth a Scotch pibroch that would excite and awaken Gaelic fervor. Alas and alack! he has run into the improvisational and rhapsodic school, which is entirely foreign to his nature, and the result is by no means suggestive of "chanters" and "drones." Ernest Newman recently said that it would be as possible to hatch a chicken out of a hard-boiled egg as a new school of music out of Mackenzie, and, judging by this work, the new school that must some day spring out of the glorious Scottish folk-song will not have this composer as its founder.

Mr. Adamowski played remarkably well; his passages in harmonics were admirably given in spite of enormous difficulties, and the brilliant pizzicati of the caprice were very effective. He was excellently supported upon the harp by Mr. Schuecker. We liked him least in the final dance which needed more fervor. He was handicapped by the character of the composition and would have been more at home in another school, but, even as it was, he made a decided success, and was recalled twice and given a floral tribute. But Tam Adam o'Skye! hoot mon! ye maun gle us the pibroch in kilts the next time!

The calm beauty of Beethoven's andante was finely brought out in the reading of Mr. Gericke. And Liszt deserves great homage for the discreet and conservative scoring of the work; he has made no attempt to magnify the work unduly, but has given an orchestration that reminds of Beethoven rather than of any "arranger." Perhaps some day some one will do a similar orchestral service to that great symphony in piano disguise—the sonata in B flat, Op. 106. A special word of commendation ought to be spoken about the flute and bassoon, work in this andante.

Tschaikowsky's suite is an unequal work, but to some of its divisions the adjective "great" can be legitimately applied. We believe that Liszt and Tchaikowsky have not yet attained their due position in the musical Hall of Fame; both will yet grow in reputation.

Most impressive was the waltz which formed the second movement of the suite. Let not the word "waltz" deceive those who did not hear this composition; there was no "sound of revelry," no "light fantastic toe," in this movement; it was a waltz such as the mourners might dance around the remains, at a funeral, without shocking the feelings of the bereaved family. Its oppressive pulsations of the kettle-drum, its sombre orchestration, its mournful themes, made a veritable Danse Macabre of it.

Nor was the scherzo anything at all merry; it was simply restless. In the midst of its syncopations, one heard the call of trumpet and drum as if the stern reality of combat were never at any great distance. It was weird and uncanny at times, the work of a superior Berlioz.

The variations were not all great. The first four were superb; the later ones less remarkable. Such variations are always somewhat like a promenade through a department store; the conductor takes the role of floor walker and shows us the violin department, an excellent quality of bassoons, some fine flutings, the clarinette counter, etc., etc.; and in this case everything from English horn to violins, was passed in review. Especial praise must be given to the fiery variation by the united violins, and to Mr. Maquarrie's flute-playing. The final variation was rather bombastic and less worthy than the excellent ones with which the work began; yet, of course, the noisy end made a palpable hit and won great applause.

Spite of the fact that Mr. Gericke was obliged to conduct left-handed, the unity of the orchestra and the freedom of the readings was not disturbed. Our conductor wrenched a muscle in his right arm, in Philadelphia, while emphasizing a syncopation in a Brahms work.

L. C. Elson.

150

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CHERUBINI,

OVERTURE to the Opera, "The Water-Carrier."

BERLIOZ.

TWO MOVEMENTS from the DRAMATIC SYMPHONY "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17.

II. Love Scene: Adagio.

III. Queen Mab, Scherzo: Prestissimo.—Trio: Allegretto.

R. STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Death and Transfiguration." op. 24.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish."
op. 97.

I. Lebhaft.

II. Scherzo: Sehr mässig.

III. Nicht schnell.

IV. Feierlich.

V. Lebhaft.

151

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cherubini.....Overture, "The Water-Carrier."
Berlioz.....Adagio (Love Scene) and Scherzo (Queen Mab) from "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.
Richard Strauss.....Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Schumann.....Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3.

Cherubini was once ranked as a rival, if not a superior, to another composer of his period named Beethoven. Although time has shown him inferior to the symphonist in clearness and felicity of expression, yet there are passages of dramatic, even of passionate fervor in many of his works. But they subside too often into the quieter harmonic vein of the classical epoch, which seems so dull to modern ears. The overture to "The Water-Carrier" still holds its own, however, and the vivid warmth of harmony in the opening theme of the allegro is as charming at the beginning of the twentieth century as at the end of the eighteenth.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was scheduled to appear as soloist, but the rapid changes of the too mercurial thermometer proved too much for her, and at the last moment a substitution became necessary.

The two movements of the Berlioz symphony seemed unusually attractive, even after a previous performance in the ninth concert of this season. There was little or none of the wild striving after grandiose effects that mars so many of this composer's ambitious works. Instead, the love scene proceeded with commendable fervor, and horns and cellos uttered sweet themes to the violins in the most amorous fashion. The delicate, airy grace of the "Queen Mab" scherzo won its usual meed of appreciation.

Then came the cheval de bataille of the evening, in the shape of Strauss' great symphonic poem, "Tod und Verklärung." Not the latest of the tremendous orchestral tone-poems that have shaken the modern world, it seems the clearest, the most coherent, the most convincing. It is a pleasure, too, to note that the literal interpretation is being discarded in favor of the more allegorical side. We need no longer look for definite fever-motives, or follow the rate of the patient's pulse by metronome marks; but we may thrill with unbounded admiration at the glowing picture of man's hopeless struggle against the inevitable, of the recurring memories of childhood's simplicity, youth's eagerness and manhood's brave strength, of the losing fight with death and the triumph beyond the grave. More fitting than the realism of Ritter's poetic dedication would be the ringing words of Browning, put by him into the mouth of an earlier musician:—

There shall never be one lost good. What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound;
What was good, shall be good, with, for evil,
so much good more;
On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven,
a perfect round.

The performance of a Strauss work always tempts its hearer to theorize on the tendencies of modern music. The impressions given by last Saturday's piece differed little from those aroused by the more recent "Heldenleben." There was the same stupendous skill in handling the full modern orchestra, the same largeness of design in the musical edifice. But the discords are too abrupt, the contrasts often too sudden. The great blemish, however, is the lack of thematic beauty. For example, the few notes on the oboe that typify the first reminiscence of childhood are too unmelodic to be convincing. As another instance, the hero-motive in the later work is both arbitrary and ugly.

A single theme of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony contains more musical beauty than all the works of Strauss. Admitted that the newer temples are grander than the old; why build them of poor material? Before leaving the subject, the reviewer must offer a well-earned tribute of praise to Mr. Gericke for the superb vigor with which he read the work.

Schumann's Rhine Symphony, No. 3, is perhaps less popular and less ambitious than its two predecessors, but does not fall below them in quality. Its frank thematic beauty, combined with the happy enthusiasm that pervades so many of Schumann's works, make it always welcome.

The next programme consists of Tchaikowsky's Overture, "L' Orestie," Schumann's A-minor Piano Concerto, Wagner's Siegfried Idyl, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the soloist.

Arthur Elson.

Symphony Concerts FOR SALE for 12 concerts, 4 first balcony seats. Price moderate.
Singly if desired. Address R.C.L., Boston Transcript
[A]:

SYMPHONY ONE SEAT in Y FOR SALE
CONCERT for the rest of the season,
$10.00. 415 Beacon street
2t[A]: ja 28

For Sale, SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET
Centre, K, $25.00. Hotel Vendome, office. [A]:

"TOD UND VERKLAERUNG" AS PLAYED LAST NIGHT

Richard Strauss's Symphonic Poem of Death and Transfiguration.

14TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Superb Performance of the Great Work—An Old, Once Favorite
Overture by Cherubini.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the fourteenth symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Water-Carrier"....Cherubini
"Love Scene" and "Queen Mab" scherzo from "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....R. Strauss Symphony in E flat, No. 3.....Schumann

Mrs. Schumann-Heink, who was announced to sing at this concert, telegraphed Thursday that she was suffering from a severe cold. The program was therefore changed, and the two pieces from "Romeo and Juliet," which have been already played this season, were substituted for her arias. It is not necessary to comment on the character of the music or the performance, and yet I cannot refrain from marveling again at the beauty of the "Love Scene," a beauty that still seems imperishable, or from praising the performance of the Scherzo.

Certain Foes of Strauss.

Richard Strauss's tone-poem was the feature of the concert. Read by Mr. Gericke with the utmost care, intelligence and sympathy, and played con amore and superbly by the orchestra, which is undoubtedly to day without a rival, this "Death and Transfiguration" made a profound impression. There was much applause, long continued applause, but the close attention during the performance and the slowness of the audience to take advantage of the intermission were a more fitting tribute to the genius of the composer. When the piece was first played in this country, certain critics, especially in New York, saw fit to describe it as morbid, charnel house music, and they dubbed it names and then washed their hands as though they had accomplished an unclean but righteous and necessary task. And some of them dilated on the absurdity of trying to set to music. Ritter's poem, which is printed in the score. As a matter of fact the poem was written after the music had been composed.

The Question of Program.

It is a question whether such a detailed poetic explanation is of advantage to the hearer. If music with a title, or with sub-titles, is not sufficiently suggestive to awaken a sympathetic mood in a hearer of ordinary musical intelligence, or in one who is sensitive to impressions and yet not technically well versed, the fault is in the composer, not the hearer. The hysterical annotator who finds in each measure a hidden meaning has done much harm to Wagner, and it looks as though he would injure Strauss, who is no friend, they say, to such worshippers. "Death and Transfiguration" is Strauss's title. It is true the poem is on a fly leaf of the score; but did either poet or musician expect that any one would attempt to fit the music to the poem as in melodrama? I do not believe it for a moment.

Strauss's Meaning.

The reader is put in a mood by the poem. He does not remember every detail. A man is dying; he fights with death; delirious, he is a child, a youth; he again knows the struggles of manhood; death is at last tired of his reminiscences and finishes him. Death is conqueror. But the cry still rings out even in this age of materialism: "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave where is thy victory?" For death is transfiguration as well as dissolution. These are common thoughts; and birth and life and death are common everyday facts, as common as the sunrise, a mountain-chain, the ocean, the stars on a wintry night when no wind stirs. It is a good thing to be reminded of the transfers and promotions worked by death after this fever of life. And Strauss, the poet in tones, has sung these mysteries in a grand and lofty way, not by trying to italicize with music a realistic description of a death-bed. Meaning? Strauss prepares no examination paper. I doubt whether he and his commentators would agree as to the precise nature of any "typical theme."

The Music Itself.

Each hearer is his own analyst. And as each hearer is an individual apart through hereditary influences, environment education, calling, his analysis must necessarily differ from that of his neighbor. There must be differences of opinion concerning the effect of certain passages of detail; the more sensitive will be moved the more acutely; the musician will constantly find passages that excite his admiration, when the layman will merely receive an impression of something big and wonderful; but all must realize the beauty, the sadness, the terror, and at last the triumphant grandeur of this tone-poem, in which there is no morbid taint, in which there is the full justification of death. "Charnel house music?" Say, rather, the glorious expression of the ennoblement of even an ordinary life by deliverance through death. The hymn that chants the end is solemn, but triumphant, and in this hymn there is the conviction of bravery, the belief that death to him who has fought the fight is the apotheosis of heroism.

Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony has not the freshness or romantic feeling of the other three. Cherubini's overture is still classical, faultlessly, coldly classical.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Four Standard Selections Are Splendidly Rendered.

They Are a Cherubini Overture,
Parts of the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Schumann's
Third or "Rhenish" Symphony.

The sudden failure of a single number expected for any given Symphony concert causes the conductor a complicated difficulty. He must substitute something which he is sure can be taken up and perfectly played on the spur of the moment, which will be satisfactory in itself, which will be of such length as not to disturb the time balance of the programme, and which will fit closely and harmoniously into the tone and color scheme as already arranged. Mr. Gericke escaped happily from the quandary into which Mme. Schumann-Heink's defection had thrown him, and presented his reconstructed programme in this excellent form: Cherubini's "Water Carrier," overture; the "Love Scene," adagio, and "Queen Mab" scherzo, from the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz; Richard Strauss' third tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Schumann's third or "Rhenish" symphony.

The performance was altogether masterly in leadership and in technical and aesthetic obedience. The bewildering, audacious, innovative score of Strauss, especially, was magnificently handled. Yet that very splendor, firmness, courage and versatility of treatment served only to emphasize the extravagant and exasperating irrationality of the composition when considered in regard to its nominal subject. Its professed theme is the last hour of one poor, solitary man, whom Death imperatively and relentlessly claims, and to whom there opens, as the final earthly moments are swept away, the great and glorious prospect of "the world that sets this right." It is not Azrael, the grave, grand, calm and considerate angel, who claims the man whom it has been made his duty to seek, nor is it the fabulous skeleton, with drum, trump and sword whose pitiless presence and sudden summons withers the being and chills with horrid, shuddering terrors the reluctant, amazed and trembling Everyman. To the unequal and already decided contest Death brings his whole array of violent, terrific, astounding and annihilating forces with a rage, a fury of sound, a battery of arms and a chaotic pothier which could only be relevant to a devastating battle, a holocaust made by collision, explosion or earthquake, a cataclysm, "the wrecks of matter and the crush of worlds." And even then, accepting the whirlwinds, tempests, crashes and roars of sound as suggestive of Death in his most material, brutal and coarsely devastating manifestation of himself and his powers, how inadequate and illogical is the conclusion! This seems far more like a vociferous, self-glorifying and yet somewhat stern and grandiose exaltation of a victory which he could not help but win, since the hour is not yet come for the "last enemy to be destroyed." If the poem is to have a derivative motto attached to it, there would be appositeness and picturesqueness in that stanza from Longfellow's "Wreck of the Hesperus":

Her rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice,
With the masts, went by the board;
Like a vessel of glass, she stove and sank.
'Ho, ho!' the wreckers roared.

And was it not, perhaps, something more like this which Strauss held in mind as he wrote?

The inventive originality, the technical and instrumental resources, the dazzling, overpowering, grand and diverse effects of Strauss' compositions are not to be denied. They sway pulse, nerve, power of analytic thought and calm exercise of judgment. They belong to the current epoch, devoted to the vast, the audacious, the tyrannical and the proudly and confoundingly opulent, sumptuous, pretentious and haughty. Whether they will belong also to the future, which now appears to menace more than it promises, only that future itself can tell. Yet, might it not be better to give them no definite appellations, but to call them, as Busoni was content to do with his wonderful evolution of irrelevant but magnificent orchestral effects, merely studies or fantasies in instrumental possibilities?

The next programme is to be this:
Overture, "L'Orestie".....Tanelev
Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.....Schumann
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 76.....Beethoven
Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Soloist.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

This was the programme of the fourteenth symphony concert:

Cherubini: Overture to the Opera, "The Water-Carrier."
Berlioz: Two Movements from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17:
II. Love Scene.
III. Queen Mab.
R. Strauss: Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24.
Schumann: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," op. 97.

According to the first plan, Mme. Schumann-Heink was to have sung two arias at this concert. The lady could not come, however, because she was sick (let us hope her indisposition is no more serious than that which prevented her, last April, from singing in the "Stabat Mater"); so, in place of her arias there were two movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—the exquisite love scene and the Queen Mab scherzo. Their performance was remarkably beautiful, so much so that, for once, the scherzo in comparison with Shakspeare's verse did not sound heavy and lumbering. More wonderful still, the "Water-Carrier" overture was played with a brilliancy and genuine vivacity that made the performance of a classic work seem worth while. Not once did the tone sound harsh, and the whole overture went with a thoroughly delightful lightness and a spirit of hearty good humor.

But what interested most on the programme, of course, was the tone poem by Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration." When this work was first played in Boston six years ago there was great discussion about its merits, some declaring it Bedlam let loose, others vowing that before it all else paled, not excepting the ninth symphony itself. Some would be talking knowingly of its marvellously clever orchestration, others again, those of intenser temperaments, had much to say of its wonderful expressiveness, etc., etc. Everybody, apparently, regarded the composition as something abnormal, to hold a decided opinion about which, of one kind or another, was quite necessary if one would be thought a person of taste. It is safe to opine that not many listeners genuinely liked the work. Why should they? At that time in Boston we had not heard enough music by Richard Strauss and his kind to be at all accustomed to his way of musical expression. What we were hearing was curious and strange to our ears.

In six years we have made musical progress in Boston. On Saturday evening the audience awaited the poem of "Death and Transfiguration" with as keen anticipation of pleasure, but likewise with as much composure as, twenty years ago, they would have sat down to hear Beethoven's seventh symphony. The truly remarkable, sympathetic performance of this genuinely great work which, in a few short pages, tells the story of a lifetime—its joys, its sorrows, sudden death, and the majestic calm that follows death—this work was received with a moment of impressive silence, followed by tumultuous, long-continued applause. And there was not much discussion of the music just played; there was not a hint of the composition being merely a tour de force of cunning orchestration. Nobody intimated that Richard Strauss must be mad. Most encouraging of all the signs of the times, there were few ejaculations to be heard about the wonderful emotional strength of the music; feeling it, the people held their tongues about it. And a large proportion of the audience went home.

Since the people so manifestly want music by Richard Strauss, why not give it them? The "Heldenleben" we have heard but once, "Don Quixote" not at all. Why not these? Why not "Macbeth"? Why not "Zarathustra," which we have not heard in three years or more? Why not "Aus Italien"? Even if audiences did not fancy the works of a man recognized to have one of the very greatest talents of his day they should be made to hear them, and frequently, too. But since they are clamoring for these self-same works?

Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler is to play at the next concert, the programme of which is as follows: Tancleu, overture, "L'Orestie"; Schumann, concerto for piano-forte, in A minor, op. 54; Wagner, a Siegfried idyl; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. R. R. G.

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK ILL

She Will Be Unable to Sing at This Week's Symphony Concert, Which Will Be Given Without a Soloist

Word was received at Symphony Hall from New York today that Mme. Schumann-Heink, the prima donna, who was to have been the soloist at this week's Symphony Orchestra rehearsal and regular concert, is ill in that city and will be unable to fulfil her engagement here. She had been expected to sing an aria from "Titus," by Mozart and also an aria from Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul." The concert therefore will take place without a soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On account of the illness of Mme Schumann-Heink, who was announced to sing at the Symphony concerts of last week, the original program was changed and the following selections were played: Overture to Cherubini's opera, "The Water Carrier"; two movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, Berlioz; "Death and Transfiguration," a tone poem by Richard Strauss, and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony. There were no solo numbers. The selections are familiar to patrons of these concerts and Berlioz and Schumann were welcomed in an appreciative manner. Cherubini evidently was satisfactory, but Strauss was received with scant marks of favor.

The overture to "The Water Carrier" was played smoothly throughout, the jubilant finale swinging along with a verve that formed just the proper contrast to the solemn uncertainty illustrated in the beginning of the movement. In the opening part the conflicting themes were admirably set forth by the violins and heavier strings and in the closing part the whole band did satisfactory work.

The two movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony were the love scene and the "Queen Mab" music—dainty, expressive and tripping measures written in Berlioz' happiest vein. Very beautifully was the love song sung by the cellos and horns, the instruments blending perfectly. The tricky, pizzicato figures of the "Queen Mab" music were given with exquisite finish and precision by the violins, the measures being free from any suggestion of cloudiness, but as clear and crisp as if played on one instrument. This number was received with special favor.

The somber, unintelligible Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was given effectively and probably satisfactory to those who care for this kind of composition. The Schumann symphony received a characteristic interpretation, in which all the beauties of the work were fully shown.

This week's program will have Mme Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler for soloist in the Schumann A minor piano-forte concerto. The orchestral selections will be the overture, "L'Orestie," Tancleu; a "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Romantic Productions of Unusual Interest to the Lovers of Music.

Schumann wrote, in 1847 and 1848, a romantic opera, which he called "Genoveva," and brought out at Leipzig in 1850. It had a moderate success and has been kept upon the list of things to be occasionally reproduced in Germany. The heroine married a knight of the Palatine, and although virtuous and faithful, she could not escape calumny from a false friend of her husband who sought to make her also false; he failed and the knight, crediting his slanders, drove Genoveva forth into the forest. There mystic influences protected her and a child was there born to her and suckled by a doe. Hunting in the forest, her husband encountered her and the result was explanation, reconciliation and reunion. The overture, which begins this week's symphony programme, does not draw thematically upon the opera, but is rather related to it spiritually and suggestively. Its first mood is of unrest, grief and distress; then come confusion, struggle and turbulence; upon these break hints of the hunt with its gay bustle and exhilaration, followed by a lively and blithe-some conclusion.

After this Mr. Schroeder, who is the soloist of the week, will play Saint-Saens' concise, compact and entertaining violoncello concerto. This is in three connected movements, in which the composer shows his knowledge of the instrument, but without settling it forward into virtuoso prominence. The themes are pleasant, appropriate, well stated and wrought out cleverly and briefly, the solo part being sometimes rather like an obligato than a commanding, independent role. The next number will be derived from romantic opera, as was the first. Goldmark gave out in 1886 an opera of uncertain success and short-lived popularity, upon a phase of the Austrian legend of Martin and Vivien. It was called "Martin," and the two protagonists were Winckelmann and Materna. In brief, Martin was the son of Satan by a mortal mother, and his father desirous to pervert his human excellence to base uses, employs sensuous seductions, the many charms being led by Vivien, who at last prevails—but only for a time, because Martin is released from spells and redeemed at last. Pages will be played from the choruses and mystic dances of the spirits, whose spells are added to those of Satan and Vivien. In these will be found Goldmark's melodic charm, his rich harmonies and his fanciful and romantic orchestration.

The symphony will be Dvorak's fifth, called, in a back-handed sort of way, "From the New World," having been written immediately upon his arrival in this country in 1893, and having in it nothing of theme or form or treatment which could be strained into a direct representation or illustration of America. It must be understood—in spite of some turns of phrase which may be found in negro, Indian and much other rude, undeveloped music—as intimating moods and imaginations. Its beginning is a grave, wondering adagio, as if darkness were brooding upon and hiding the continent and its fate, succeeded by a vigorous, spirited allegro, as of the joy and hope of discovery. The second movement, largo, is the most beautiful and touching part of the work, and might be taken to imply the restful calm preceding the motion of fate and the development of a new people. The scherzo, molto vivace, is quite Bohemian in character and speaks in true Dvorak terms. The finale, allegro con poco, sounds eager, strong, contentious and triumphant, and might be accepted as a general jubilation over young strength and swift success, especially as a faint and twisted hint of "Yankee Doodle" can be discovered somewhere in it.

1902

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TANEIWE,

OVERTURE to "The Oresteia" of Aeschylus, op. 6.

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor, op. 54.

I. Allegro affetuoso.

II. Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.

III. Allegro vivace.

WAGNER,

A SIEGFRIED IDYL.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Allegro: Trio.

IV. Allegro,

Soloist:

Madame FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TANIEW,

OVERTURE to "The Oresteia" of Aeschylus, op. 6.

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor, op. 54.

I. Allegro affetuoso.

II. Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.

III. Allegro vivace.

WAGNER,

A SIEGFRIED IDYL.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante con moto

III. Allegro: Trio.

IV. Allegro,

Soloist:

Madame FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

Madame Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist at the fifteenth symphony concert, the programme of which was as follows:

Taneiev: Overture to "The Oresteia" of Aeschylus, op. 6.
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54.
Wagner: A Siegfried Idyl.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

This was a depressing concert, made up entirely of works heard before, some, indeed, rather often. The nearest approach to a novelty was the overture "Oresteia," by the Russian, Taneiev. Since this work was inspired by Aeschylus's tragedy, it is written with all the trappings that go to suggest the tragic note in music; stopped horns, gongs, muted strings, and the like. In the whole course of the composition, however, there is not one genuinely tragic moment, far less a suggestion of the grandeur, the inexorable, inevitable movement of a Greek tragedy. Rather would this overture seem, with its turgid risings and heavings, its gasps and shouts, to be called into being in memory of a good old melodrama. The composition, too, failed to charm even by the beauty of its sounds, the tone color being only dull.

Depressing, likewise, was the lovely Schumann concerto, for its loveliness sounded tame and old-fashioned, without brilliance or depth. This composition will evidently no longer stand the light of a great hall, and, indeed, like so many other concertos, it sounds far better when heard with accompaniment of a second pianoforte. Mme. Zeisler played very beautifully, but quietly and intimately, precisely as this concerto should be played, but not in the way most interesting to hear.

After the Schumann piece, came the "Siegfried Idyl," well known to all, beloved by many. Its performance was admirable, doubtless so was that of the Beethoven symphony, but this last work began only at twenty minutes past nine, when it is far too late to appreciate a symphony by Beethoven or by anyone else.

This week there will be no symphony concert. The week after Mr. Hugo Heermann will be the soloist, and this is the programme: Schubert, Overture in E minor; Richard Strauss, concerto for violin; Widor, choral variations for harp and orchestra; Haydn, Symphony No. 5, "La Chasse." R. R. G.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture to "The Oresteia" of Aeschylus, op. 6.....Taneiev
Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54.....Schumann
I. Allegro affetuoso.
II. Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, soloist.
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.....Beethoven

The overture was most interesting. It had been heard here about a year ago, and it gained on closer acquaintance. There was a kinship to Wagner evident, and one could not avoid noticing the "Death-figure" from the Siegfried "Funeral Music." The leading up to an overwhelming catastrophe was marked; a similar effect has been made familiar to us in the "Melpomene" overture by Mr. Chadwick, which is also worth a speedy repetition. After the rude shock of Fate there came a beautiful coda which brought the work to a very attractive end. There was much applause at the close and the overture may be ranked among the successes of the repertoire.

Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist in Schumann's noble concerto. She caught the perfect spirit of the somewhat free form and deserves the heartiest laudation for the abnegating manner in which she sought out the best effects of ensemble. Yet the cadenza of the first movement showed that there was also technique of the highest order in the artist. Most exquisitely was the dialogue between piano and orchestra, which began the second movement, given, and the succeeding violoncello melody was kept properly in the foreground. In the finale the strong contrasts between the chief and the subordinate themes were strongly drawn, the mystery of the latter being finely portrayed. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was recalled again and again and well merited the final ovation.

The "Siegfried Idyl" is a living proof, if one were necessary, that Wagner believed heart and soul in his theories. Here is a composition written for one person only, a musical valentine such as one cannot find elsewhere in the entire repertoire, and yet the continuity, the free modulations, the interweaving of leit-motiven, all these points are there as decidedly as in the Trilogy itself. If any union can be called good, which is founded upon the unhappiness of a person who has not deserved it, then Wagner's second marriage was ideal. The Wagner of Peace, not the combative composer, is here represented, and the final interweaving of the chief themes, in augmentation, brought the blissful composition to an ecstatic end.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was letter-perfect, but scarcely spirit-perfect. The struggle of the chief theme with the sweet subordinate subject was scarcely earnest enough, in the first movement, but the important figure (of Destiny?) was clear as a bell in all its ritenuto effects,—not an easy thing to do, as every conductor knows.

The second movement began finely, with its cool viola color and its mysterious pizzicati upon the contrabasses, and the bassoon deserves a word of praise for its work in the coda; but the development following the violin variation might have been more free.

The third movement is really a war-horse for the contrabasses. Not only do these instruments have a prominent part in the chief theme, but in the trio they rule the roast. It may be that Beethoven gave them especial prominence and difficulties because Weber had satirized the difficult contra-bass passage which ended the Fourth symphony. The rapid figures were played more clearly than can be imagined, and each and every one of the contra-bass players deserves to be complimented.

The finale would seem to be better suited to end the Heroic symphony than any other. Here for the first time trombones enter into the symphonic score, and it is also the first time that an important phrase is taken from a preceding movement and developed in the finale. It all sounded effective and attractive. The best music, after all, is that in which intellect and emotion go hand in hand, in which an appeal is made both to the head and the heart; and no one has given these two elements in better equipoise in instrumental music than Beethoven. Louis C. Elson.

LAST NIGHT'S CONCERT — IN THE SYMPHONY HALL —

Beethoven's Fifth, Which Is Always
New and Always Impressive.

MRS. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER

A Russian Overture to the Grim Trilogy of Aeschylus—Wagner's
"A Siegfried Idyl."

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Orestes".....Taneieff
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Schumann
"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven

Taneieff's Overture.

The overture by Taneieff was the only work that was not well known to the audience. The first performance was two seasons ago, and the impression then made was one chiefly of orchestral color and occasionally gloomy strength. The overture should not be confounded with the prelude to the composer's opera of the same title. The themes of this concert-overture are taken from the opera—thus one is associated with Agamemnon's guilty queen—and for this reason, perhaps, there is a certain lack of unity, as though the composition were in the nature of a pot-pourri. Taneieff uses the resources of the modern grand orchestra, and yet how far away he is in spirit from the simplicity of the awful story which inspired the trilogy of Aeschylus. He heaps orchestral horrors on horrors, yet nowhere is that mood of irresistible fate that we find in Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," with its primitive orchestration. The apotheosis is frankly decorative music that accompanies the procession to the Acropolis, good theatre music, which might easily enlarge the pomp and splendor of the stage-view; but in the earlier sections of the overture, there is no poignant tragic note, to remind the hearer of the horrid meal, of the father's curse, of Clytemnestra's or Orestes bloody deed, of the avenging Furies. The music is hypo-Russian, not Greek, in essential spirit.

Mrs. Zeisler.

Mrs. Zeisler gave a polished performance of Schumann's concerto. She played intimately and as the sensitive musician rather than as the flamboyant virtuoso; and thus performance and composition were thoroughly in harmony. Yet such a performance, admirable as it was, would have been more beautiful and effective in a smaller hall, where what Berlioz called the musical fluid would enwrap the hearer. The concerto itself, with its half-timid suggestions, its quietly romantic spirit, its subdued yet questioning expression, is for a smaller hall, and it is a pity that such confidential disclosures of a composer should not be heard in such a room. Yet the charm of Mrs. Zeisler's performance was felt, although in some passages the hearer was obliged to meet the pianist and anticipate her or italicize for himself her language. The Siegfried Idyl was played delightfully. Beethoven's symphony still ranks among the great masterpieces. In all modern music there is no page more thrilling than that of the mysterious, unearthly transition from the scherzo to the finale, and the preceding pages are the triumph of absolute music over that which needs a program or is the translation of something into music. Here is music that was not suggested, but it suggests that which can only be imagined, not spoken, not painted, not written in lofty rhyme or passionate prose.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PENSION

Hearing on Petition of Henry L. Higginson and William Gericke for Incorporation of an Institute

The Committee on Insurance this morning gave a hearing on the petition of Henry L. Higginson and William Gericke, for the incorporation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institute. The orchestra is away, and therefore no member appeared for the bill, but Major Higginson briefly advocated it, while it was advocated more at length by Frederick Cabot, who stated to the committee that he was quite agreeable to the substitution of a section from the Revised Laws for a section in the bill that the funds of the corporation shall not be liable to attachment by trustee or other process or taken to satisfy any debt, as he admitted it was too broad. The Revised Laws provide that the funds for paying benefits shall not be attached. Mr. Cabot also agreed that the committee might wisely report a general bill to permit the organization of these small benefit associations, as Insurance Commissioner Cutting has recommended. The hearing closed.

Representative Davis of Salem was heard on a bill to incorporate the Harrison Mutual Burial Association of Salem, which he stated to be similar to other burial organizations of Salem, which he stated to be similar to other burial organizations already incorporated for different communities.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
From July 23, 1903
Pension Fund Concert to Be Given on Sunday Evening, March 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, will give a concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, March 1, in aid of its Pension Fund. The programme will be as follows:

Overture Leonore No. 3.....Beethoven
Septet for trumpet, strings and piano.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetic".....Tchailkovsky Siegfried's Passing Through the Fire;
Morning Dawn; Siegfried's Voyage
up the Rhine.....Wagner

This will be the first of the concerts to be given henceforth yearly by the orchestra for its Pension Fund. The announcement is one of more than ordinary significance and importance.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson in 1881 informed the Boston public of his intention to establish and maintain a full and permanent orchestra, which should offer the best music at a low price. He reminded the public of the fact that however praiseworthy the attempts to furnish such music had been in the past, there was then no local orchestra "such as may be found in all the large European cities or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany." He rightly thought that the essential condition of success was stability; that the members of the orchestra should be able to devote their best energies to the rehearsals and concerts of the organization during the season, with the assurance of re-engagement and continued service. His first thought was of an orchestra of sixty selected players who should give twenty concerts. In his announcement he named the first conductor, Mr. Henschel.

Mr. Higginson was not moved from his purpose by inevitable disappointments, the adverse criticism that is so easy, or by the failure of the public at large to appreciate at first the noble generosity of his plan. He knew that time would vindicate his judgment and reward his labors.

Today this orchestra of nearly a hundred men is famous throughout the breadth and length of the land by reason of the high purposes that have shaped its musical policy, as well as by the brilliance of the concerts themselves. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is something more than a local institution, the pride of Bostonians; its visits are dear to the music-lovers of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities who take more than a passing interest in its success and glory; its existence is a joy to all those interested in music, professionals or amateurs, throughout the country; its reputation has crossed the Atlantic, and its high rank is accepted, not questioned, in the leading cities of Europe.

The conductors in turn, Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and again Gericke all contributed to the final result; but it is not invidious to say that the high state of technical perfection which has distinguished the performances of the last twelve or fourteen years is due chiefly to the intelligent and indefatigable discipline exerted by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke at a time when the character of the orchestra was still undetermined, to his zeal and courage, to his righteous ambition, which with Mr. Higginson's aid recognized no obstacles and knew no bounds. The first aim was technical perfection. To attain this neither money nor time nor patience was spared.

But without excellent players, without distinguished players, picked men actuated by the same spirit, the task would have been wellnigh impossible. The members of this orchestra are something more than parts of a huge machine. It is the combination of so many individualities obedient to one mind which controls through intelligence—a combination that works together for a common purpose, for a love of art, and not for merely personal advantage that sets this orchestra apart from others.

It is not surprising, then, that the members of the orchestra, seen and heard by so many year after year have entered into the life and thought of the succeeding audiences.

Hazlitt wrote: "There is no class of society whom so many persons regard with affection as actors. We greet them on the stage; we like to meet them in the streets; they almost always recall to us pleasant associations; and we feel our gratitude excited, without the uneasiness of a sense of obligation." These words might well be written today of the members of the Symphony Orchestra.

And Hazlitt added: "The very gayety and popularity, however, which surround the life of a favorite performer make the retiring from it a very serious business. It glances a mortifying reflection on the shortness of human life, and the vanity of human pleasures."

The members of the orchestra know that they are not necessarily exempt from the accidents that befall mankind. An injury to a finger that would be trifling in another calling removes a violinist from the ranks. As the years go by a wind instrument player loses control of lip or breath. A slight infirmity may impair usefulness. What is the unfortunate man to do? It is generally too late for him to seek another business with hopes of success. He has given the best years of his life to his instrument, his conductor, his employer, and his audience. And even the most applauded virtuoso is mortal. In the old Dance of Death the skeleton pipes or fiddles to the musician who must follow him.

The conductor and members of the Symphony Orchestra now purpose to establish a Pension Fund. They propose to found it and maintain it by their own efforts. In some foreign cities, a city government or a ruler contributes liberally to such a fund. Here the players purpose to help themselves by giving concerts and by self-taxation. They hope to have a fund which will provide for widows and orphans; for the disabled; for them that pass beyond the line of activity. The rules that will govern the acquirement, maintenance and disposition of this fund will be framed by the orchestra. The fund itself will be in the care of trustees appointed by the orchestra.

The members of the orchestra feel that the existence of such a fund will be of great value to themselves and therefore to the public in more ways than one. The players will not be harassed by thoughts of the future, by the dread of becoming dependent on some one or on some institution; they will be knit still closer together; there will be true and abiding esprit de corps.

They now with Mr. Gericke as conductor and through Messrs. Gericke, Timothee Adamowski, Joseph Adamowski, Otto Roth and Frank Schuchmann as a committee, offer their first concert in aid of this fund. Mrs. Adamowski-Szumowska has graciously offered to play the piano part in Saint-Saens's Septet. The programme as a whole is most attractive, both to subscribers and to those who are not able to hear the orchestra at the regularly recurring concerts.

The people of this city will surely aid the members of the orchestra in their undertaking, and will aid them generously and gladly.

The fourth of the Wetzler Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 5, 1903.

The soloist will be Mr. Hugo Heermann, the distinguished German violinist, who will make his first appearance in America upon this occasion.

Hugo Heermann was born in Heilbronn, Germany, and received his first violin lessons at the early age of eight years, and made rapid progress under the instruction of Ernest Maschek. In the Summer of 1864 he played at a concert in Wildbad; there Rossini heard him and was delighted with the talent of the young boy, who was then ten years old. So great was the interest which the famous maestro took in the young violinist that on his journey from Wildbad to Kissingen Rossini never used the railway, but traveled in his four-in-hand; he spent the day in Heilbronn in order to hunt up Heermann's father and urge that he be sent to Brussels for further development. Provided with a letter of introduction from Rossini to the director of the Brussels Conservatory, Heermann went thither and studied three years under the direction of Meert, with such success that he won the first prize of the Belgian school.

Yesterday's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra.

Slide ————— July 15, 1903
Mme Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler Plays a Schumann Piano Concerto.

Numerous Vocal and Instrumental Recitals—Current Gossip.

Mme Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist at last week's symphony concert, playing Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte, the remaining program numbers comprising the overture, "L'Orestela," by Serge Taneieff; a "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Schumann's great concerto requires the highest quantities of interpretative powers to properly illustrate the work, mere technique is not sufficient, and so the composition is not so frequently attempted by pianists as the Rubenstein D minor, Tchaikowski's B flat minor and some of the Grieg and Saint-Saens concertos. Mme Zeisler chose wisely in offering the Schumann work, for her performance not only displayed the artist's virtuosity, but a command of almost masculine power, allied to feminine delicacy, a combination found in but few players of the gentler sex. The soloist did not permit the piano part to be overshadowed by the orchestra, and in what might be called "a trial of endurance," each gift of the artist was shown with unflagging vigor, even the ornamentations of the third movement being played with as much deftness, clarity and exquisite finish as those of the first part, where the cadenza is introduced before the real work of interpretation begins.

In these days of facile technique special praise in this direction is not needed when speaking of a skilled pianist, and Mme Zeisler, who has finger dexterity about mechanically perfect, evidently has conquered all the difficulties of the keyboard. In the first movement the themes were given with an authority that was unusually forceful in a woman player, and, of course, in the lighter and more brilliant passages of the cadenza and coda the artist's execution was all that was requisite. The romantic style of the second movement was admirably preserved, and the "dialogues" between the solo instrument and orchestra were charming examples of musical symmetry and precision.

Very brilliant was Mme Zeisler's performance of the piano part in the extended coda in the closing movement, the accentuated rhythms were given due prominence, and the difficult chord runs were perfectly executed in fortissimo, the performer showing no signs of fatigue and retaining her power up to the end of the concerto. The whole performance was a splendid illustration of interpretative and technical art, and showed that Mme Zeisler's rank as a pianist is with the foremost pianists of the present day. Her reception was of the most demonstrative kind, the audience expressing its appreciation of her performance before the concerto was finished and also recalling her many times to the platform. The orchestral accompaniment was played in a masterly manner and seemingly without a break in its association with the soloist.

The Russian composer, Taneieff, in the first part of the overture, "L'Orestela," indulges in the usual musical "characteristics" associated with his race, dissonants, growls and queer modulations; but the harshness of the opening is more than balanced by the more joyous orchestration of the closing part, which is very fully scored for the heavier instruments, with beautiful melodic contrasts allotted to the violins and woodwinds. The strenuous part of the work was sufficiently ponderous and in-harmonious to please the ultramusical ear, and the exquisite finale was given in the orchestra's happiest mood, with a special meed of praise for the string contingent.

Mr Gericke read the "Siegfried Idyl" in his sympathetic way, and as the orchestra responded willingly, Wagner was as adequately interpreted as the most capacious Symphony patron could reasonably wish. The massive fifth symphony by Beethoven called forth the best efforts of the orchestra, and every phase of the massive work was presented in an effective manner. The andante, dainty and tripping, and the stirring finale, so highly in contrast, were given with equal skill.

On account of the absence of the orchestra this week, the concerts will be omitted. Mr Hugo Heermann, violinist, will be the soloist next week in a program comprising Schubert's E minor overture, concerto for violin, Richard Strauss; choral variations for harp and orchestra, Widor, and Haydn's fifth symphony.

PLAY FOR THE PENSION FUND.

Symphony Orchestra Members to Give a Concert March 1.

Plans for the Retirement Scheme Already Well Advanced—Petition for a Charter Has Been Filed—Committee of the Musicians Are Managing the Matter.

THE announcement in yesterday's Symphony programme of a concert to be given Sunday evening, March 1, by the Boston Symphony orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund, following Henry L. Higginson's letter of a few days ago, indicates that this retirement scheme, which has been quietly talked about for some time inside the organization, is approaching definite shape. As a matter of fact, a petition for a charter is now before the Legislature.

The committee of 15 which is managing the matter consists of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the orchestra; Timothee and Joseph Adamowski, Max Zach, violin; Henry Heindl, viola; Max Kunze, bass; Rudolph Nagel, cello; Richard Kurth, violin; Mr. Brook, flute; Frank Schuchmann, violin; Mr. Hackebarth, French horn; Otto Roth, violin; F. Hein, horn; Arnold Moldauer, violin, and P. Fiumara, violin. As soon as the plans reach definite shape, a smaller committee will be in charge of the business of the organization.

Two distinct propositions under which retirement may be made are now being considered. One is to allow each member of the orchestra two-thirds as many years as he has actually served toward the 25 years' service upon which a pension is to be based. The other scheme is to allow every man who has served 10 years or more a 10 years' count toward the 25, and those who have served less than 10 credit for the actual years during which they have been members of the orchestra.

Whichever method of reckoning service shall be adopted, a man must pay up for the years of service credited to him. But, inasmuch as no pension will be available for five years any way, there are these five years, of course, in which to pay accumulated dues.

The dues are to be the same for all members, irrespective of the salaries they may draw, and it is thought that they will average something less than $30 a year; that is, about $1 a week for the 29 weeks of a Symphony orchestra season.

For pension purposes, the 90 odd men of the orchestra will be arranged in classes according to their ages. To benefit by a pension, men now under 25 must serve 25 years; men from 25 to 30, 22 years; men of 30 and over, 20 years.

The income from the two concerts to be given each year will, it is hoped, swell very considerably the fund, and, inasmuch as it will be five years before any pensions are due, quite a respectable amount of money will then have accumulated, by means of which the oldest members of the orchestra may be retired. There are now four men who were in the original orchestra of 60 gathered together by Mr. Higginson almost 22 years ago.

No. 5, "La Chasse."

st:

HEERMANN.

HUGO HEERMANN.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT,

OVERTURE in E minor.

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in D major for VIOLIN, op. 61.

I. Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Larghetto.

III. Rondo,

WIDOR,

CHORAL and VARIATIONS for HARP and ORCHESTRA, op. 74.

(Mr. SCHUECKER, Harpist.)

(First time.)

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, "The Chase."

I. Adagio: Allegro

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Allegretto.

IV. The Chase.

Soloist:

Mr. HUGO HEERMANN.

HUGO HEERMANN.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT,

OVERTURE in E minor.

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in D major for VIOLIN, op. 61.

I. Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Larghetto.

III. Rondo.

WIDOR,

CHORAL and VARIATIONS for HARP and ORCHESTRA, op. 74.

(Mr. SCHUECKER, Harpist.)

(First time.)

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, "The Chase."

I. Adagio: Allegro

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Allegretto.

IV. The Chase.

Soloist:

Mr. HUGO HEERMANN.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Auspicious Boston Debut of a German Violinist.

*Wald
Mch. 1, 1903*

Hugo Heermann of Frankfort-on-the-Main Makes a Fine Impression at the Symphony Concert—Beethoven's Concerto Is His Choice for the Occasion.

Mr. Hugo Heermann, the distinguished violinist of Frankfort-on-the-Main, has reason to congratulate himself upon the outcome of his first appearance in Boston. Courteously received, listened to in respectful attention, appreciatively applauded and a half-dozen times recalled, he is accepted and placed among artists eminent in his department.

A pleasant, reflective face and a somewhat professorial aspect are his, and he carries lightly his years, not seeming to have attained the full number of 59 that are attributed to him. His manner of play is quiet and undemonstrative, without flourishes, sweeps or hints of impressive periods in preparation.

His choice of an introductory work fell upon Beethoven's concerto, than which none, unless it be the Mendelssohn, is more familiar to the public or better suited for helping to judge and establish a newcomer. His performance—broad rather than forcible—was sustained throughout with a nobly beautiful tone, logical, calmly reasoned, and yet graceful phrasing, celerity distinction and equability of execution, and a successful purpose to deliver his music faithfully and plainly as he understood it. He enlightened, satisfied and generally carried conviction.

But one essential element of greatness he seems to lack—communicable enthusiasm. The strongest qualities of his art would appear to be intellectuality, lucidity and elegance. Hence he made his most appealing effects with the first movement, tranquilly and gently rendered, and with the second, whose delicate tracery of ornament and soft insinuations of the central theme were drawn with delicate perception and delineation. But the honest eagerness and homely emphasis of the third movement were not all there. The reading was genial, polite, refined and proportionate; but intensely well-bred and proper! There was no hurry of lively dancers, footing it "a la ronde," no vigorous rhythmical beat of accent, no burst of joy and no glint of humor. The rollicking spirit of folk-song and folk-dance was not in it, nor had it the whirl of a real rondo; it was genteel, timid, recherche and disappointing—just for lack of longed-for contrast.

As a rule, the cadenzas in concertos stagger the average listener. To make a bull, the better they are, the worse they are for him. For their absolute excellence depends upon technical developments and intimate relationships of theme or treatment, which if they are nobly and learnedly done, can be appreciated only by the musician, while they confuse the layman. But the very qualities which dominate in Mr. Heermann's playing helped him immensely in his own which he used. Having no notion of bravura or personal display, he gave his mind and his hands to showing in his phrasing, his accent and his isolation, so to speak, of the chief points of association, so that his listeners could follow him comfortably and understand better than usual why cadenzas exist and how they should elucidate themselves. Indeed, his first was superb in every way, came home to everybody and went far toward establishing him as a great artist.

Besides introducing a stranger artist, the programme gave place for a new orchestral composition—a chorale theme and variations, with the harp as its solo expositor, written by Charles Marie Widor, organist of St. Sulpice, Paris, and first performed in that city a trifle less than three years ago. M. Hasselmans, Conservatory professor of the harp, being the soloist, as Mr. H. Schuecker was in this concert. It is such a work as might be expected from a learned and accomplished organist, having successfully passed from expert registration to skilful orchestral scoring. It begins, much like an improvisation, with a thread of melody from an oboe, to which a second and contrapuntal melody is soon added, and thus it proceeds, growing as it goes, until the harp enters, announcing in vigorous octaves the first line of the chorale. The course of the composition is then normal, the many variations being sometimes seriously contrapuntal and again fanciful and free; but always able, well colored and agreeable. The performance was excellent; but still the orchestra, being at full, could not help often absorbing the harp into their own volume, use what care they might. Of course strong aspeggios and brilliant sweeps cannot be overwhelmed; but it seems as if the average effect would have been better and more just, if the band had been for the moment reduced in numbers.

The Schubert E minor overture began the concert animatedly, with some uneven attacks of the brass in its latter portion, and Haydn's "Chase" symphony ended it brightly and cheerily. Both were admirably played, and it only remains to commend the orchestral part of the concert for its delicate quality of tone and its considerate subordination.

The next programme, which has no solo number, is thus announced:

A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
"Das Gefilde der Seligen".....Weingartner
(First time.)
Symphony No. 9 in C major.....Schubert

MUSICAL MATTERS

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS.

The first was the regular Saturday night affair and presented the following programme:—

Overture in E minor.....Schubert
Concerto in D major for Violin, op. 61.....Beethoven

I. Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Larghetto.

III. Rondo.

(Mr. Hugo Heermann, soloist.)

Choral and Variations for Harp and Orchestra, op. 74.....Widor

(Mr. Schuecker, harpist.)

(First time.)
Symphony in D major, "The Chase".....Haydn

The above programme contained nothing that could bring a blush to the cheek of the most conservative musician and began and ended with tepid music that could never cause any unseemly excitement. The Schubert overture gave some good work to the brasses and presented considerable figure and phrase imitation, but beyond this was very tame. In the concert of next Saturday more justice will be done to Schubert's memory by the performance of his greatest symphony,—an imperishable masterpiece.

There were practically two concertos on the programme and two soloists appeared. A Richard Strauss concerto had been promised, but this was changed into the great violin concerto of Beethoven. Perhaps this was as well, for Beethoven, in his day, was considered quite a promising composer, and he ought not to be elbowed from the concert-room by the modern wholesale dealers in orchestration.

The Beethoven concerto is a splendid touch-stone to discover whether an artist is pure gold or not. Many pompous violinists whose scintillating fireworks dazzle the multitude, shrivel up when they attempt this work. We recall it in many interpretations; we remember Sarasate rattling about in it, and Kneisel (at his Boston debut) throwing it down as a gage of defiance to the critics who were furious at his replacing Listemann; we remember Isaye's fiery presentation of the work, probably the finest one can hear at the present time; Kreisler has also been one of the giants in this composition. And now comes Mr. Hugo Heermann, quietly and without blare of preliminary trumpets, and gives a memorable performance of the same test piece. He does not give the breadth of Isaye; his tone is rather too delicate for those massive four notes which constitute the chief figure of the first movement; but the surety, the purity of intonation, the clearness of the most rapid runs, and above all the sweetness and sympathetic quality of his tones, awakened an enthusiasm that was as deserved as it was unusual. It was altogether musically, the interpretation of the soloist, the ensemble of the orchestra, the balance and clearness of it all; a little more of virility and it would have been perfect. We did not count the number of times that Mr. Heermann was recalled, but we may state that very few artists achieve such a triumph at the symphony concerts.

Widor's harp variations were sane, beautiful and highly developed music. Widor deserves a great deal more of attention from the musical world than he has yet received. He is an excellent contrapuntist, a man who disdains ugliness as a factor in modern music, a splendid organist whose work in this field has fought down the Guilmant sentimentality, in short one of the most worthy of modern French composers in the instrumental school. He is fond of the harp. The present writer recalls meeting him at a harp contest at the Paris Conservatoire, less than two years ago, where one of his own compositions for the instrument was performed by five anxious young ladies in turn. The work was given by each young artist upon the pedal harp, which seems not to have been superseded in any degree by the chromatic harp with its crossed strings and new system. A month later the reviewer heard the chromatic harp played, at Edinboro, but was still impressed with the superiority of the instrument with pedals, as invented by Erard in 1810.

Mr. Schuecker's performance was masterly; in the arpeggio sweeps, in the semi-military movement, in harmonic touches, in every direction his work was practically flawless. He is one of the chief artists in an orchestra that is well-filled with great solo artists. He was recalled again and again at the close of the work.

Haydn's symphony, "La Chasse," was not a wildly exciting one. We recall the story of the Englishman, returned from India, who was invited to a fox hunt. "No," he responded, "when I hunt I like the element of danger." "Ah!" said a German bystander, "if you want taintcher come hunting vid me! Only last week I shot my broder-in-law in de stomach!" But there was no danger of any sort hinted at in this particular chase. It was a rollicking and jovial symphony, but not much more. There was good horn work in the finale and charming oboe-playing in the trio of the minuet, but, after the full orchestration of Widor and the great power of Beethoven, the work seemed thin and old-fashioned. Nevertheless, if we except the Jupiter symphony and the G minor from the list, the Haydn symphonies seem to wear better than the Mozart ones.

But nowadays we go hunting with larger forces, with trombones, bass, clarinettes, contra-bassoons, bass tubas, tamtam, etc., and the game is killed by concussion of the brain produced by innumerable sforzando effects. We no longer thrill to the simple variations of a Haydn second movement, or to the precise song-form with Trio of his minuets, and even the jollity of his finales, borrowed from the rollicking Gigue of the old Suite, seems rather infantile in its merriment. We have different cravings, different existence, and above all different nerves from our patient, melody-repeating forefathers, of the last quarter of the 18th century.

HERR HUGO HEERMANN A GERMAN VIOLINIST

His First Appearance Here Last Evening a Triumph.

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance in Boston of Widor's Choral and Variations for Harp and Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture in E minor.....Schubert
Concerto in D minor, for violin.....Beethoven
Choral and variations, for harp and orchestra.....Widor
Symphony, "The Chase".....Haydn

Schubert's overture in E minor is a prosaic work, one of his many compositions dashed off just before supper, or during supper, or after supper, with the fatal fluency which is still admired by some of his biographers and partisans. It is a pity that the overture was not allowed to remain in manuscript; it is a greater pity that it is ever played. True reverence consists in forgetting that which is common and unworthy in the works of a genius.

The Violinist.

Mr. Hugo Heermann made his first appearance in Boston. He is reckoned as a German violinist, but he studied chiefly in Brussels and Paris, and his fame is European, not parochial. Born in 1844, he does not show his age in face or performance. To the disappointment of some and the joy of others, he chose Beethoven's concerto instead of the one by Richard Strauss, which he will play in Troy Monday night with the Boston orchestra. Strauss's concerto is one of the respectable sins of his youth and there is little suggestion in it of the composer of the wondrous tone-poems. The trouble with Beethoven's concerto is that its length turns in orchestral concert into a violin concert; and yet this remark seems ungracious after the exceedingly fine performance by Mr. Heermann, a performance that may well be called memorable, not so much for extraordinary technique or wealth as the noble conception, the exquisite taste, the classic sentiment, and the serene authority of a master. No wonder that the applause after the first movement was spontaneous, thunderous, and long continued, and that after the Rondo, the violinist was recalled again and again. It was a performance which revealed fully the composer's thoughts and not the violinist's thoughts concerning a composer and his concerto.

Widor's Harp Piece.

Widor's choral and variations for harp and full orchestra was played by Mrs. Wunderle and Thomas's Orchestra in Chicago last November. The repertory of the harp is so limited, when orchestral accompaniment is concerned, that this piece will no doubt be a boon to virtuosos. There are pages of agreeable tone-color, pages that are frankly and unpretentiously pretty; there are evidences of Widor's technical abilities in composition and orchestration; but as a whole the work is episodic, and after the first few variations the interest of the hearer flags; nor is it quickened by injections of Meyerbeer or by a bombastic apotheosis. Mr. Schuecker played with his accustomed skill. Haydn's old-fashioned symphony might give pleasure in a small hall and with a small body of strings, but I doubt it.

The Conductor's Musical Education Began When He Was Nine Years of Age, and at Twelve He Played the Organ in Church. His Rapid Rise Due to Genius.

WILHELM GERICKE, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an easy man to approach, but a hard man with whom to talk on music. He is both modest and discreet; and such a man says little.

However, considering the event of the Pension Fund concert, Mr. Gericke relaxed somewhat the other night, and said to a reporter:

Was an Austrian Subject.

"I was born an Austrian subject in 1845. My father was a merchant, living in a little village in Styria, called Schwanberg.

"Love for music must have been inborn in me, for even as a little child I used to play on children's musical instruments. At the age of nine years I received my first lesson in music; that is to say, I began to learn to sing so as to assist as chorister in church. Yes, and about the same time I began to take lessons on the piano; but those lessons were of rather a deficient character.

"The only instrument I had at my disposal then was an old-fashioned spinet, which had a compass of five octaves, and which had black keys with white sharps—the reverse, you know, of the present order.

"Moreover, my teacher's knowledge of music, and particularly of piano playing, was somewhat limited, and he could not show me much.

Was Not Discouraged.

"But I was not to be discouraged or kept down. When I was ten years old I began the study of the violin and of the tympani. The next year, when I was eleven, I essayed the difficulties of the organ, though, you must know, my hands and feet were rather small for that kind of work.

Nevertheless, I succeeded so well that before long I was employed in church exclusively as organist.

"But"—with a smile—"I was not satisfied in my ambitions even then, for notwithstanding my accomplishments up to that time, I soon afterward began to play the flute, and then the snare drum; and, finally, in the natural order of things, I fell to composing music—fell to it ardently, most industriously.

"However, all this came to a stop quite suddenly, for when I was twelve years old I was sent to school at Graz, the capital of Styria, and then, for the first time in three years, my musical studies were interrupted. I did not have even a piano at my disposal to practise on.

Parents Lacked Money.

"My parents, in spite of my evident aptitude for music and my musical predilection, were opposed to that line of endeavor. They wished me to be a school teacher. Besides, they lacked the money requisite to send me to the Vienna Conservatory.

"This state of affairs continued until a member of an orchestra whose acquaintance I had made observed my musical disposition and also observed that with but a few hints he could make me read a full score—the first full score I ever saw, which was the first act of Rossini's 'William Tell.' This musician told me that by all means I should study to be a conductor.

"By happy chance pecuniary assistance reached me in my eighteenth year, and in a short time I was a pupil in the Vienna Conservatory, under the special instruction of Court Conductor Dessoff, whose colleague at court I was destined to become.

"However, my means were so small that I could only afford to take lessons in theory, while I carried on the practical study of musical instruments in what might be called the autodidactic method.

Playing and Composing.

"At the same time, in spite of the lack of practical instruction, I played the violin and the piano diligently, and, indeed, soon became proficient as regards the latter instrument. Besides this, I devoted much of my energy—really the greater part of it—to composition, writing in quick succession sonatas, trios, quartets and more than a hundred songs. Only a few of the songs, by the way, are in print.

"The result of all this work was a breakdown. My health gave way, and the doctor ordered me to leave Vienna. It was then, at the age of twenty, that I accepted the conductorship of the Laibach City Theatre orchestra.

"From that year, 1865, to 1874, my career as a conductor was uneventful; but in the latter year I was appointed court conductor at the Vienna Opera.

"When Dessoff, my former teacher, and also court conductor, left Vienna, and Fisher, a colleague, was pensioned, I, together with Hans Richter, who was appointed in Dessoff's place, had enough work to do; and when Richter was absent in Bayreuth or in London the entire direction of the opera devolved upon me.

"But in 1880 the appointment of a third conductor for the opera enabled me to accept the leadership of the celebrated concerts of the Society of the Friends of Music, of Vienna. It was hard work, this occupation of two such positions, but I found proportionate compensation in the opportunities afforded me. In 1884 the Society of the Friends of Music made me an honorary life member of the society.

"That same year Mr. Higginson came to Vienna and engaged me to go to Boston. Since that time, I think, my career is sufficiently well known, so you will excuse me."

His Arm Trouble.

"But this arm trouble you have been suffering from lately; is that a common complaint?"

"Oh, no. I never had anything like it before. It is due, I think, to a wrench I gave my arm some time ago. When we were in Philadelphia, on our last tour—the one before this—I felt it, and, oh, it troubled me so that I had sleepless nights. Since then constant work at rehearsals and concerts has retarded its improvement."

"The labor of conducting is little understood by the musical public, I dare say."

Mr. Gericke shrugged his shoulders, and that was his answer. The fact is, he is loath to discuss his experiences or his opinions, fearing that he may be misinterpreted or misunderstood. Still, he says that it is since his career as a conductor began that conductors have been recognized as virtuosi. When he was a beginner the people simply looked over or to one side of the conductor's head, and to call a conductor upon the stage was unheard of.

Mr. Gericke's Influence.

Still, there is a story that goes to show not only Mr. Gericke's influence, but also the esprit de corps of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the way back to Boston, when Mr. Gericke was incapacitated, the orchestra played at Hartford, Mr. Kniesel conducting. The next morning one of the Hartford papers said that Mr. Gericke's absence made a great deal of difference; that it was sorely felt. As a matter of fact, the orchestra, not only to prove its loyalty to Mr. Kniesel, but also to prove that it had learned its lesson well from Mr. Gericke beforehand, performed with unusual brilliancy, and that critic wrote himself down a nincompoop.

The members of the orchestra are as devoted a band as a conductor ever beat time for. There is the spirit of pride in the past and in the present; and there is what might be called an orchestral spirit, which, in a way, is apart from the conductor's spirit. The feeling of superexcellence is strong in the orchestra; and it is generally justified. The orchestra has a way of commanding the applause even of rivals.

Nine Nationalities There.

Of the original members of the orchestra only a few remain. During his first conductorship Mr. Gericke brought over a number of Viennese players, most of whom still are members. The nationalities represented in the orchestra are German (which predominates numerically), French, Austrian, Hungarian, Polish, English, Dutch, Italian, Russian, Bohemian, Belgian and American. There are nine native Americans. The Frenchmen, it is a singular fact, are largely wood wind players, and they excel in their department.

The orchestra in its travels has not met any disaster; but the shadow cast by the loss of three players when the Bourgogne went down in 1898 is still present.

The orchestra has played at symphony concerts the compositions of two of its members, Gustav Strube and C. N. Loeffler. A former member is Campanari, the opera singer.

The concert given in New York Feb. 21 was the 2051st. Of all the concerts 1069 have been given in Boston, 171 in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University; 109 in Philadelphia, 105 in New York, 94 in Brooklyn, 92 in Baltimore, and the balance in New England and Western cities. The last Western tour took place the year of the Columbian Exposition.

The first conductor was Georg Henschel; the second, Mr. Gericke; the third, Arthur Nikisch; the fourth Emil Paur, and then came Mr. Gericke again, who has been with the orchestra these last five seasons.

Charles A. Ellis the Manager.

The manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the beginning has been Charles A. Ellis. Some years before Major Henry L. Higginson made his appeal to the public in behalf of a permanent orchestra in Boston—that was in 1881—Mr. Ellis had been in the Major's employ. Then he went to work for the Calumet & Hecla Company, and he was with this company when Major Higginson projected the Symphony Orchestra and engaged him to be the manager.

At first Mr. Ellis managed the orchestra incidentally to his work at the Calumet & Hecla office, but when A. P. Peck, who had been manager of the Music Hall, retired, Mr. Ellis left the office of "the fairy mine" and gave his whole attention to the orchestra and the hall. This took place during the first conductorship of Mr. Gericke.

It is a singular fact, by the way, that the first conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Henschel, should be engaged professionally in Boston at the present time. On Friday afternoon while on his way to his studio at the New England Conservatory of Music he generally meets the crowd bound for the symphony matinee.

Ellis Always Successful.

"In the early days," said Mr. Ellis, "the orchestra made monthly trips to New York and Philadelphia, and, in addition to those, after the close of the regular season in Boston, a tour of the principal cities as far west as Chicago. These spring tours were abandoned while Mr. Nikisch was conductor, and in their place we substituted the promenade concerts."

"Was the orchestra successful in the beginning?"

"Artistically, the orchestra has always been successful," said Mr. Ellis; "but it was the first permanent orchestra in the country, and it took some years for the public in general to realize what a permanent orchestra meant and to appreciate just what the orchestra was capable of doing."

"How is the orchestra selected?"

"That responsibility," Mr. Ellis answered, "rests upon the conductor. Originally the orchestra was made up of players found in Boston and New York. But it is of no consequence where an artist is found if his ability is of the highest. Locality plays no part in the matter of selection. The idea is simply to have the best players."

Notwithstanding his interest in the orchestra and his success as its manager, Mr. Ellis has little to say about his experiences of the last twenty-two years. The main reason for this, probably, is that he has been acting, not for himself, as was the case when he had his opera company on the road, but for Major Higginson, who originated the orchestra, and whose individual enterprise it has always been.

In fact, the Symphony Orchestra, as it stands today, is the result of the time, work and money that Major Higginson has devoted to it. But Major Higginson himself has been equally reticent concerning his influence with the orchestra; indeed, his public remarks on the subject have been limited to a speech made at the end of the final concert in the old Music Hall.

Major Higginson's Appeal.

The appeal which Major Higginson made to the public in 1881 read:

A WORD IN THE INTEREST OF

GOOD MUSIC.

Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full and permanent orchestra offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual, inasmuch as it is independent of societies or clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organization. Indeed, the first step, as well as the natural impulse, in announcing a new musical project, is to thank those who have brought us where we now stand.

Whatever may be done in the future to the Handel and Haydn Society and to the Harvard Musical Association we all owe the great part of our home education in music of a high character. Can we forget, either, how admirably their work has been supplemented by the taste and critical judgment of Mr. John S. Dwight, and by the artists who have identified themselves with the same cause in Boston? These have been our teachers. We build on the foundations they have laid.

Such details of this scheme as concern the public are stated below. The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians, their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, being engaged in advance. Mr. Georg Henschel will be the conductor for the coming season. The concerts will be twenty in number, given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings, from the middle of October to the middle of March. The intention is that the orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both as the condition and the result of success, the sympathy of the public is asked.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Mr. Ellis's Work.

Mr. Ellis was only twenty-six years of age when he undertook the management of the orchestra; but his good judgment has been proved no less thoroughly than his amiability. What was remarked of him by a New York critic when he launched his opera company in 1898 is as true today as it was then, that the fact that after so many years of "managerial life Mr. Ellis is only a name to the people for whom he has catered is characteristic of the man."

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Hugo Heermann, the German violinist, was the soloist at last week's Symphony concert, making his debut here in the great D major concerto by Beethoven. Mr. Schuecker, harpist, also appeared as a soloist in Widor's choral and variations for harp and orchestra, given here for the first time. Schubert's E minor overture and Haydn's D major symphony completed the program. Mr. Heermann quickly gave evidence of being an artist of rare ability, with genuine musical accomplishments, retiring in his manner and with a thorough mastery of all the resources of the instrument. Even in the most difficult and brilliant passage work his ease in manipulation was somewhat unusual, and although his playing was strongly individualized, there were no indications of exploiting the dexterity of the performer at the expense of the composer. It was a scholarly and masterly interpretation of one of the grandest concertos ever written for the violin; an appreciation of its many beauties illustrated with dignity, spirit and sentiment.

The first movement is really the most important of the three, and his reading throughout was highly satisfactory in every way, his bowing being vigorous and free, his tonal quality exquisite, and his double stopping, chord runs and rapid fingering in the cadenza showing almost flawless execution. The figurations in the second movement were splendid examples of left hand work, and in the closing movement Mr. Heermann exhibited a fire and dash than one would hardly expect from the style of the man. The elaborate cadenza presented no technical difficulty not easily met. Mr. Heermann's impression upon his audience was deep and enthusiastic applause greeted him at the close of each movement of the concerto and he was recalled again and again to the platform.

The Widor composition for harp and orchestra proved to be quite interesting. Mr. Schuecker's performance on the harp being the feature of course. The limitations of the instrument evidently had been carefully considered by the composer and its prominence has been closely maintained, despite the association with heavier bodies of instruments. Mr. Schuecker played with his usual skill and finish, his whole interpretation being of a nature to give great pleasure to his auditors, who accorded him hearty plaudits at the close of his playing.

The orchestral work in the Beethoven concert calls for special commendation for its association with the solo instrument was perfect in tempo and shadings, as if the splendid playing by Mr. Heermann called for the best efforts of Mr. Gericke's men. The Schubert overture was given with pleasing effect, as is to be expected from this orchestra, and the light and buoyant Haydn symphony went trippingly and joyously, the finale, "the chase," being specially appreciated by the audience.

This week's program will be as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; "Das Gefilde der Seligen," Weingartner; symphony No. 9, Schubert.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

ITS SOLOISTS ON HAND FOR ALL EMERGENCIES.

Schumann's Piano Concerto Gives Way to a Bach Concerto for Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet and the Audience Is Highly Delighted With the Result.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert last night at Carnegie Hall and had an audience of most substantial size. That audience had an opportunity to see what the Boston organization could do to extricate itself from a predicament. The soloist engaged for the concert was the Chicago player, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has been felicitously called the Sara Bernhardt of the piano. On Wednesday night she received a telegram informing her that her husband was seriously ill and she was compelled to start at once for Chicago. When the orchestra arrived here yesterday the manager, Frederick R. Comee, was confronted with the news that he had no soloist.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot furnish piano virtuosi, certainly not of the Sara Bernhardt description, but it has always on hand a full stock of virtuosi on all kinds of orchestral instruments. Those who were wise expected to be confronted with Timothee Adamowski, a few pages of Lalo, and a violin; but the blonde Adonis of Poland was not in his seat at all. Otto Roth sat there.

Mr. Gericke calmly led out a small squad of soloists and treated the audience to Bach's concerto, No. 2, in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. The soloists were Mr. Kneisel, violin; Mr. Macarre, flute; Mr. Longy, oboe and Mr. Knoepfel, trumpet. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler is a good pianist and the Schumann concerto is lovely music. Furthermore the lady is in a position to obtain sincere sympathy. Nevertheless there was an element of good fortune in the combination of circumstances which enabled last night's audience to hear the Bach concerto and such a performance of it.

The concerto, rarely heard, is one of the most precious gems in the inexhaustible treasury of Bach. It is one of those works in which the simplicity and chaste beauty of Bach's melodic thoughts are wedded most beautifully to his marvellous command of polyphonic composition, which gives such apparently spontaneous and unpremeditated results. Here is music in which perfect mastery is exhibited, in which musical science disports itself in the sheer delight of wielding its own mechanical devices, and in which the results are all exquisitely lovely.

And how those four artists did play! To hear the extraordinary ease of Mr. Knoepfel's handling of the difficult passages in the upper register of the trumpet was alone a sufficient joy; but to it was added the solid violin playing of Mr. Kneisel and the pure, flawless oboe art of Mr. Longy, with which we are all acquainted, and the wonderfully fine flute playing of Mr. Macarre. What an organization it is that contains such masters! And they did not make any parade of themselves, but played together in a most admirable ensemble, with a just balance and a most delicate sense of proportion. They were accompanied adequately by the orchestra, and Mr. Gericke presided over the performance with the skill of a sincere lover of Bach. The whole thing was a rare treat.

The other numbers on the programme were Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The overture of the talented old martinet of the Paris Conservatoire was played with admirable finish and classicism of style, but the grooves of the orchestra were best revealed in the Strauss number. The spectacle of the classic Gericke developing into an enthusiastic and discriminating interpreter of the ultra-pictorial Richard Strauss is full of suggestion. The sun do move, brethren. The orchestra played the musical description of final dissolution and regeneration most beautifully. The balance and quality of tone for which this band is famous made the richness of the score stand out in glowing tints. No matter what one may think about the material which Strauss has used as the background of this music, there can be nothing but admiration for his constructive skill and for such an interpretation of his thought as that given last night.

The delicacy of ear, the quickness of perception and the readiness of resource, necessary to the equipment of a really able orchestral conductor were exhibited on Thursday evening at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Mr. Gericke was conducting the performance of the Bach concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. It will be recalled that the composition was put on the programme at extremely short notice to fill the void occasioned by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler's inability to appear and play the Schumann piano concerto.

During the performance of the first movement the soloists sat at their desks in their accustomed positions. The orchestration of this movement, arranged for modern performance by Felix Mottl, is somewhat heavy, and the solo instruments did not stand out quite as prominently as they should have done. Before beginning the second movement Mr. Gericke brought the violin, flute and oboe forward a little and caused them to stand up. This made a decided difference in the effect of the instruments, which was naturally aided by the quieter character of the accompaniment.

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

When solo singers are prevented from keeping their engagements at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it need not mean disappointment to the audience. That was demonstrated last night. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was to have played the Schumann concerto at the fourth evening concert for this season in Carnegie Hall of the gentlemen artists from the New-England capital, but was summoned home to Chicago because of the illness of her husband. Instead of scurrying about for a substitute Mr. Gericke turned to his own forces and repaired the loss fourfold. Instead of Schumann's pianoforte concerto he gave the public Bach's second Brandenburg concerto grosso in the arrangement made by Felix Mottl. In this, a fascinating specimen of the old concerto grosso, with its small group of solo performers competing delightfully and harmoniously among themselves, and with the accompanying band, the solos were played by Mr. Kneisel (violin), Mr. Macarrie (flute), Mr. Longy (oboe) and Mr. Knöpfel (trumpet). There could not have been much special preparation under the circumstances, but the Boston artists seem to be always ready, and the performance was a delight, the slow movement, instinct with the tender loveliness of some of the "Passion Music," being particularly transporting. Such disappointments leave no sting.

The other numbers of the programme were Cherubini's eminently respectable overture to "Les Deux Journées," Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" and Beethoven's C minor symphony. To mention such pieces in a record of a concert by Mr. Gericke and his men is to convey a sufficient idea of the character of their performance; but a hymn of praise must be intoned at least for the manner in which Strauss's tone poem was sung, sung by one and sung by all till the swelling pæan expanded the hearts of the listeners in the triumphant close.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Hugo Heermann of Frankfort to Make a Boston Debut.

His European Reputation as a Violinist Sets Him in the Front Rank—Schubert's Overture in E Minor Will Be Given and Haydn's "Chase" as a Symphony Number.

The solo number of this week's Symphony programme provides for the introduction to Boston of Mr. Hugo Heermann, the Frankfort violinist, whose European reputation sets him in the front rank and of whom the critic of the New York Tribune, who is often inclined to be a little captious, said liberally, in relation to his performance of a Brahms concerto: "Brahms has a masterly interpreter, a true prophet, in the violinist from Frankfort, whose performance dwarfed all that has been heard in New York from travelling virtuosi for years. In his playing we have dignity, manliness, strength, sweetness and elegance combined; an all but impeccable technique, unimpeachable taste, absolute sincerity, noble self-effacement."

Mr. Heermann had announced for his debut Richard Strauss' violin concerto, which is rather a juvenile and conventional composition; but he has discarded it for the Beethoven concerto. That is a good choice in various ways. It is in itself magnificent and a test of all that is best in its player as technician and artist, while it affords the general listener a satisfactory basis for his judgment, having been heard here so often in the renderings of so many different performers. The symphony is Haydn's "Chase," the first of five which he composed in 1781. It takes its name from its finale, which suggests the hurry-scurry of a vigorous steeplechase or hunting meet, and was not originally intended for a symphonic movement, but for the introduction to the third act of an opera about the rewards of fidelity, wherein Diana protects and unites a faithful couple and slays their persecutor. The other three movements are in Haydn's usually genial and comfortable vein, and gave pleasure when first heard in Boston four years ago. The overture will be Schubert's enlivening one in E minor, and there will be novelty in a set of choral variations for harp and orchestra, composed by Widor and first performed on March 12, 1900, in the Salle Evard, Paris.

Talk of the Day

There will be no soloist at the Symphony concert this week. Inasmuch as there are subscribers who do not enjoy a concert unless there be some celebrated pianist, fiddler, or singing man, we respectfully call the attention of the manager to Mr. John B. Riley of York (Pa.), a veteran of the Civil War, who has more than a local reputation as "a trick violinist." We have no doubt that he could be secured for the concert, especially as his inimitable tour de force would not call for rehearsal; it is emphatically a solo performance. This astonishing virtuoso plays on the violin and cello simultaneously and keeps time on the cymbals, operated neatly by the right foot. His repertory includes all the masterpieces in fiddle-literature: "The Arkansaw Traveler," "Turkey in the Straw," "Old Dan Tucker," "Fisher's Hornpipe," and "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Nor is Mr. Riley narrowly musical. He dances jigs with a technique that is superb, in fact amazing, when you remember that he is seventy-five years old. Only the other day he challenged any man in Pennsylvania over fifty to a jig contest. "And I'll do me own fiddlin' sure," says Mr. Riley. There is talk of calling him the next scholastic year to take the chair of Jigs, Splits, Pigeon-Wings, Double-Shuffles and Statue-Clogs, which has just been established at Yale.

It would be the agreeable duty of the compiler of the program-book, in the case of Mr. Riley's engagement, to trace the relationship between this artist and that other virtuoso, One-Eyed Riley, who is said by some to have departed this life last fall in a far Western town, but whose virtues will be preserved in the memorable ballad so long as the English language shall endure.

The Symphony Orchestra netted nearly $3000 by its concert Sunday night in aid of its Pension Fund; and generous contributions swell this amount. There is talk of a second concert toward the end of the season, when Beethoven's ninth symphony may be performed with the aid of the Handel and Haydn chorus.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The sixteenth Symphony concert was given in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Franz Schubert: Overture in E minor.

Ludwig van Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 61.

Charles-Marie Widor: Choral and Variations for Harp and Orchestra, opus 74. (First time.)

Mr. Schuëcker, harp.

Josef Haydn: Symphony in D major, "La Chasse."

Mr. Hugo Heermann was the solo violinist.

It is hardly a thing worth making much fuss about, but it would be interesting in a way to find out by actual referendum how many persons in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening wished to hear Schubert's overture in E minor; also how many were glad they had heard it when it was over. Audiences are such queer things sometimes that one never knows what they will, or will not, like. Take, for instance, Mr. Heermann's playing of the Beethoven concerto. I have been to concerts in Boston pretty steadily for the last thirty-seven years; and I cannot remember any other violinist reaping such applause with just this concerto as was elicited by Mr. Heermann last Saturday evening. The audience simply went wild with delight. Now, except for an exceedingly brilliant cadenza, exceedingly brilliantly played, the most noteworthy feature of Mr. Heermann's performance was, as it seemed to me, its neutrality; he seemed to take the music in the most obvious way, with hardly an attempt at anything that could be called interpretation; if he have a musical individuality, he kept it to himself on this occasion. His technique is certainly adequate, especially as regards his left hand; but it would be stretching a point to call his tone in any way remarkable. And yet, as I have said, the audience went wild over him; one would have thought Melba had just sung the mad-scene from "Lucia." Of course all explanation of the why and wherefore must be conjectural. But one at least plausible explanation suggests itself to me; very much the explanation, upon the whole, that Wilhelm Hauff gave, in his once famous "Controverspredigt," of the popularity of H. Clauren's novels in Germany—a popularity that was as widespread and, one might almost say, furious as it was instantaneous. Said Hauff: "Ladies read Clauren, and forthwith exclaim, 'What easy naturalness, what truth to life! 'Tis tout comme chez nous; he describes us even to our very chemises, the delicious man!'" Now, I fancy there must have been a good deal of the "tout comme chez nous" feeling in Mr. Heermann's audience last Saturday evening; he played the concerto just about as nine out of ten of his hearers would have played it, if left to themselves—if they only had his fingers and bow arm. It was the very neutrality, or, to put it another way, the very average quality of his conception of the music that so strongly commended his performance to the average appreciation. One sees enough of this in life not to find it over-surprising; the most popular man by all odds in the French Revolution was neither Danton (the active energy of the movement), nor Marat (its brains), but Robespierre, who, as Taine has said, "for intellectual sterility seeks his fellow in history." Neither need one find much to regret in the matter; the general musical public is so open to being fooled by cheap tricks and charlatanry that it is even a source of pleasure, once in a while, to find its sympathy worked upon powerfully by great music, given simply as it stands, in a manner the severest charge that can justly be brought against which is that of lacking flavor.

Widor's new choral variations for harp and orchestra (considering the composer's ecclesiastical employment as organist at Saint-Eustache) remind one rather of what Zola (or was it Berlioz?) once said of the Catholic religion: "Le Catholicisme a du moins le mérite d'être une religion gaie." It is a most cheerful, not to say ballicose, composition (pardon the semi-classical neologism), which cheerfulness, however, does not prevent its getting duller and duller as it goes on. One would think it laughing at its own jokes. Still there exists so little bearable music for the harp, especially with orchestra, and this piece sets forth the instrument so brilliantly, that one can hear it once without grumbling. Mr. Schuëcker played it with the utmost dash and sparkle of style. The Haydn symphony—but then, there is no need of writing about Haydn symphonies in the present century.

The next programme is: Wagner, a Faust-Overture; Weingartner, "Das Gefilde der Seeligen" (new); Schubert, symphony No. 9, in C major. W. F. A.

MME. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKI-ADAMOWSKI.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, MARCH 1, 1903, at eight

FIRST CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Assisted by Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA

WHO HAS KINDLY VOLUNTEERED

PROGRAMME

- BEETHOVEN . . . Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
- SAINT-SAËNS . . . Septet in E-flat, Op. 65, for two Violins, Viola, 'Cello, Contrabass, Trumpet, and Piano. Full String Orchestra. Piano, Mme. SZUMOWSKA.
- TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," Op. 74.
- I. Adagio.
  - Allegro non troppo.
  - II. Allegro con grazia.
  - III. Allegro molto vivace.
  - IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
- WAGNER . . . . . Siegfried Passing through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2; and Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Götterdämmerung," Prologue.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin

A SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR THE PENSION FUND

Boston Shows Its Appreciation of Its Superb Orchestra.

REPRESENTATIVE PROGRAM

Pieces by Beethoven, Saint-Saens,
Tschaikowsky and Wagner—
Mrs. Szumowska as Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

Symphony Hall was filled last night with a brilliant and truly representative audience; representative because it was drawn from all classes of music lovers, who had come together to show their appreciation of the orchestra that is without a superior, and possibly without a rival. This concert was the orchestra's own concert. The players and Mr. Gericke, and Mrs. Szumowska, who has a peculiar interest in the orchestra and might justly be called one of the orchestral family, displayed their art on this occasion for the foundation of a pension fund.

The Fund Itself.

The reasonableness of the establishment of such a fund has already been discussed in the Journal. And yet there was no real need of such discussion. The musician, however dear he may be to the Muse, is not spared the accidents, the infirmities of common humanity; nor did Death forget his grim errand in listening to the lute of Orpheus. That no one of their body might look forward with foreboding or fear to useless and miserable days, that no one who had given hostages to fortune might be without some consolation at the thought of his own ending, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conceived this plan of a pension fund, in which both Mr. Higginson and Mr. Gericke are also deeply interested. The presence of so great an audience last night showed that this interest is shared by all lovers of music, by many who, though they may not be musical, nevertheless are moved by civic pride. The audience itself was a noble tribute to the orchestra.

The Program.

The program was admirably arranged. The composers whose works were chosen are illustrious in the ranks of orchestral writers. There was no narrowness in the choice, no partisanship, no spirit of clan or parish. Beethoven was there with his "Leonore." Saint-Saens, whose works are distinguished by the logical train of thought, the clearness and elegance of expression that have so long characterized that which is peculiarly French in art of every kind, was not represented by one of his orchestral masterpieces, but his chamber music enlarged for this occasion has its qualities; it provided a desirable contrast, and it added to the concert the charm of Mrs. Szumowska's presence. No musically sane person would dispute the supreme right of Tschaikowsky to be present with his symphony, that Iliad of woe; that epic of love and wild despair, of mad gaiety that would fain forget the inevitable end of every man's desire, of the hero's triumph, of the apotheosis that leads only to the tomb. And as Beethoven and Tschaikowsky are neither German nor Russian, but universal composers; as Saint-Saens is something more than a Frenchman of exquisite polish; so is Wagner not merely the man of Bayreuth but a world-man.

The Concert.

Of the concert itself it is not necessary to speak. It is enough to say that conductor, orchestra, pianist were all filled with the spirit of the occasion and that the audience was most sympathetic and appreciative. There was the fanfare to greet the conductor; there were wreaths; there was frequent and hearty applause. May this be only the first of many such concerts, so that this pension fund, established firmly through the efforts of orchestra and conductor, and the spontaneous aid of music lovers, may grow under wise administration, so that the honor of membership may more and more be enviable, so that the players may be the more closely knit together in bonds of sympathy and brotherhood, as well as by the thought that they are fellow servants in the temple of art.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Mme. Szumowska's Re-entry a Feature of the Evening.

Harold
Splendid Performance Before a Great and Distinguished Audience—Presentation to Mr. Gericke of a Large Silver Wreath—Many Gifts to the Fund.

The special concert for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra pension fund drew to the hall last evening a great and distinguished company, which filled its seating capacity, and heard, with many manifestations of high pleasure, a magnificent performance.

There had been selected for the orchestra three works of different schools and characters, in all of which the men have achieved signal triumphs of sense and spirit—Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, and from Wagner the three Siegfried episodes, so commonly and so oppositely linked together, his passage of the fiery barrier and his voyage up the Rhine in the early dawn.

It was necessary to provide something dignified and large for Mrs. Szumowska, who was to make here real re-entry for the season, and whose generously tendered service should be utilized by uniting it with the work of the orchestra. The programme being already long and serious a concerto was out of question, and an independent solo selection seemed undesirable. It was therefore necessary to take a piece of chamber music and enlarge its treatment to suit the occasion and the locality. The choice fell upon the E flat septet, for the five strings, trumpet and pianoforte, of Saint-Saens, the whole string band being employed, but the solo trumpet being left a unit. The composition itself did not suffer by such treatment, for it is rather of virtuoso than classic character and might be made a showpiece without distortion or much exaggeration.

Mme. Szumowska has always been distinguished for the delicate beauty, the tender grace and the appealing sensitiveness of her playing. But such virtues could not be hid, even in the amplification of their accompaniment, and it was further evident that Mme. Szumowska had ready at her command the developed elemental strength to cope with single parts, multiplied to a dozen or 16. In the first movement there was easy vigor, in the second firm clearness, in the third a duly gentle and emotional spirit, and in the finale positive but modest emphasis and effective nervous force. She was earnestly recalled and tendered a laurel wreath, whose diameter almost equalled her own height.

But hers were not the only laurels of the evening, for, as he took the stand, Mr. Gericke was saluted by a deputation, who gave him on behalf of the orchestra a large laurel wreath wrought in solid silver, whereupon there were fanfares and hurrahs, both band and audience rising spontaneously.

The general interest felt in the cause is great, and has been marked by a host of contributions, ranging from 50 cents to $5000, persons giving, as in the Roger Wolcott subscription, variably according to their purses, but always from their hearts. This amount has not been calculated, but last night's receipts will be about $3000. The total of the initial fund cannot be estimated, for there will be immediate additions to it; but it is sure to be a growing capital, if Mr. Higginson be among its trustees. He has been a wise and generous patron of the orchestra; in a fiduciary capacity he would be its good and faithful servant, increasing the talents put into his charge.

ORCHESTRA FUND CONCERT.

The concert at Symphony hall this evening, in aid of the pension fund of the Boston symphony orchestra, will make a notable event in the history of this organization. The object for which the concert is given has gained the favor of the public, and there has been a commendable disposition on the part of the patrons of the regular season to add their contributions to the fund. Mr. Gericke has selected a program of rare merit, and in its performance the men of the orchestra will undoubtedly strive to excel even the high standard established by their public performances in the concerts of the regular season.

The third "Leonora" overture will introduce the program, and this will be followed by Saint-Saens' septet in E flat, op. 65, for two violins, viola, cello, contrabass, trumpet and piano. In this number Mme. Szumowska, who has kindly volunteered her services, will sustain the piano part. The symphony "Pathetic," by Tschaikowsky, will follow, and the evening's selections will be concluded by scenes from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," by Wagner.

The second symphony concert was given last night. It was an extra one and was given in aid of a most worthy object. It was to form the nucleus of a fund to pension our symphony players when they are past service. Nothing can conduce more to the permanency of our orchestra than such a fund as this. Boston has led America in the matter of establishing a permanent orchestra and now she leads the way in establishing a safeguard around such an organization.

Judging by the very large audience, and by the fact that many contributed something beyond the price of their tickets, the donations ranged from 50 cents to 5000 dollars, we may hope to find the next-egg in the symphonic treasury and a new deed in favor of Frau Musica accomplished in our city.

The concert was of highest interest, per se, as may be seen by the following programme:—

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72...Beethoven
Septet in E-flat, op. 65, for two violins, viola, 'cello, contrabass, trumpet and piano; full string orchestra.....Saint-Saens Piano, Mme. Szumowska.

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74.....Tchaikovsky
Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," act III, scene 2; and morning dawn and Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine, from "Gotterdammerung," prologue.....Wagner

It is not customary to exert the critical function upon a concert given for beneficence, in which all the artists and the conductor donate their services for a good cause, but, were this not the case, one could still speak chiefly in enthusiastic praise of the work done upon this occasion.

All the works given were familiar ones except the Saint-Saens septette. The combination of instruments here is an unusual one differing from that used in the two other famous septettes, by Beethoven and Hummel, and the addition of full string orchestra causes it to stand midway between chamber-music and Sinfonietta or Concerto. Mme. Szumowska is not only a splendid soloist, she is also a chamber-musician of high rank, and the ensemble of the septette was excellent. It is one of the brightest of compositions. Mme. Szumowska was recalled several times and received a huge laurel wreath.

Richter's arrangement of portions of the last two operas of the Trilogy (made with Wagner's consent, we believe) is one of the very best of all concert arrangements of the great composer's operatic works. It was given in a manner that brought out all its subtle points. Altogether, the concert was one memorable in itself and doubly memorable because of its object.

Enthusiasm was constantly at fever heat. When Mr. Gericke appeared he was presented with a silver laurel wreath on a velvet cushion, on behalf of his loyal orchestra. The audience rose to their feet in homage, and the brass band played a "Tusch"—a fanfare—in the heartiest manner. Never was compliment better bestowed. Mr. Gericke has made our orchestra what it is—the very best of the entire world—and has labored for it beyond belief. This latest innovation, the Pension Fund, also owes much to his fertile brain and his unceasing efforts.

We only wish him one yet greater triumph: that he may some day be assisted to transport his orchestra to England, France and Germany, that Europe may hear and be astonished at how one American city has excelled her in the instrumental field. Louis C. Elson,

Symphony Hall: Orchestra Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, gave the first concert in aid of its pension fund in Symphony Hall last evening. The programme was:

Ludwig van Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Camille Saint-Saens: Septet for Strings, Trumpet and Piano, in E-flat major, opus 65.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74.
Richard Wagner: Scenes from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Just before the concert began a pretty little real scene was enacted: nothing hinted at what was coming—unless, indeed, it was the apparent determination of Mr. Georges Longy to play first violin, instead of oboe as usual—and most of the audience were probably as surprised as Mr. Gericke himself when, just as he was about to raise his baton, Mr. Kniesel stepped up to him and, in the name of the orchestra, presented him with a handsome silver laurel wreath on a velvet cushion, with the names of all the members of the orchestra engraved on the leaves. Then came a glorious "Tusch" from the band, in which the brass and percussion departments distinguished themselves particularly. This voluntary tribute of the orchestra to its conductor is worth more than a passing mention: it really means a good deal. There are still a good many men left who were members when Mr. Gericke made his parting bow from the platform of the old Music Hall in the spring of 1890, after his first five-year's engagement here; and, when we remember the state of mind in which the orchestra then bade him farewell, and compare it with that in which it now pays him this voluntary tribute of respect and affection, we can appreciate how much of sterling force of character and intrinsic manhood is implied in the change he has effected. No man ever better deserved a tribute of the sort than Mr. Gericke.

Of the excellent object of the concert little need be said here; it is one of those objects that commend themselves and need no talking-up. That it will increase the esprit de corps of the members is not the least of the benefits to be derived from the foundation of a pension fund.

The programme was chosen with excellent judgment, with an eye to popularity as well as to intrinsic musical value. The Saint-Saens septet was the only number to cause anything like surprise; but it sounded so much better "with all the strings" than it usually does as chamber-music that it really paid its way. Amid and against the larger mass of string tone, the trumpet lost not a little of that "unmannerliness" I once heard it charged with by a disturbed listener. Mme. Szumowska played the piano-forte part exquisitely.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" made good its high reputation for popularity, and was loudly applauded after every movement. And the Wagner selections—Siegfried passing through the fire; morning dawn and Siegfried's trip up the Rhine, closing with a few measures of the Walhalla-motive—made the concert end in a glow of color. W. F. A.

If everyone who has been edified, refreshed or spiritually uplifted by the magnificent playing of the Symphony Orchestra contributes, as he may, according to the measure of his gratitude and the length of his bank account, to the pension fund, every member of the orchestra will be able to live his last days in peace and comfort, so far as his material wants go. Though that, of course, will hardly happen. A great many people have none of that abstract gratitude, or public spirit, in their outfit, and though they are the prime losers by the omission, numbers of worthy objects are also losers. They make, or help to swell the army of folk, however, who are always ready to put out a dollar if they are to get their money's worth of enjoyment. Hence the annual pension fund concerts, the first of which was given last night, will receive their patronage, and judging by the attendance this support will prove a stable one while these concerts continue, and while such attractive programmes as that of last night are arranged.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, March 1, at eight
CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM GERICKE, Conductor
IN AID OF ITS
PENSION FUND
Assisted by Mme. Antoinette Szumowska
TICKETS NOW ON SALE.
[A]

No. 5, "La Chasse."

ist:

EERMANN.

---

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

WAGNER,

A FAUST OVERTURE.

WEINGARTNER,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Elysian Fields," op. 21.
(First time.)

---

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major.
I. Andante: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Faust Overture.....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "The Elysian Fields," op. 21.....Weingartner.
(First Time.)
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert.

A purely orchestral programme yet as interesting as any recent one of the series; although the public generally evinces more interest in a soloist than in any musical organization, our orchestra is quite able to hold attention without the assistance of singer, pianist or other solo attraction.

The "Faust" overture is interesting as showing the first glow of Wagner's genius, for, up to the time that he made the first version of this overture, he had been copying Italian and French models and had not given his own ideas full play; in "Faust" he first reveals his individuality. And it is characteristic that he should here dwell upon the discontented masculine rather than upon the "eternal feminine"; Gretchen is almost wholly banished and we are given a pessimistic bachelor of a hero. The work was finely interpreted, with moody caprice and bold contrasts.

After this the audience wandered in the Elysian Fields (a Teutonic "Champs Elysees") with Weingartner as guide. The work is the most impressive that this composer-conductor has yet given us. There is something of dreamy sweetness and of nirvana-like calm that suggests Gluck's view on a similar subject, and some baleful muted brass tones showed that trouble was not wholly absent even in Paradise. The work is founded upon a painting by Boecklin, and Weingartner has put a tag upon many a phrase in the composition to show exactly what he means. We do not believe in this kind of mood-cataloguing; nor do we find ourselves quite at home in the bizarre effects of orchestration and the unexpected progressions of the harmony. There are some points of great beauty in the work, but Weingartner does not have the sure touch and absolute authority of Richard Strauss.

The last number upon the programme spoke a language which we easily understood, and had a beauty that was readily comprehended. Yet, in its first days, the Schubert symphony in C major was considered remarkably abstruse and altogether too difficult for performance.

It was taken rather more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, and it lost some of its poetry in consequence. At the very beginning, the romantic horn solo was given too boldly, but the reproduction of the melody on oboe and clarinette was more effective. The trombones in the coda of the first movement were excellent. This very passage was a bold departure in its time. Before it was written Mozart had shown the threatening tone-color of the trombones, in his Requiem and in "Don Giovanni," and Beethoven had brought the instruments into the symphonic orchestra (first in his fifth symphony, then in the sixth and ninth) but the use of trombones in the Schubert work was in a bolder manner than had, up to its time, ever been heard in symphony.

Mr. Gerleke made every repeat in the composition. While we generally believe in the repeat of exposition in symphony, Schubert has so many repeats of themes that one would recommend cutting wherever possible.

The whole work is song-like. Dvorak recently wrote that Schubert was at his greatest in instrumental composition, but even the amateur will discern the song element in his symphonies and his chamber music. Schubert thought song, just as Beethoven thought orchestral and Schumann thought piano. The second movement is a series of beautiful songs in glorious contrast, and the gypsy element in this part of the work speaks eloquently of Schubert's stay at Zelesz, in Hungary, as a music teacher, and his catching up the Tsigany music which is still the leading folk-song characteristic of that country. The oboe was very prominent in this movement and was exquisitely played.

How earnestly Schubert worked at this symphony may be seen by the alterations which he made in the score; Schubert, the composer who generally never altered a note from his original sketch! The two most delightful themes, for flute and violins, were an afterthought. More might have been made of the trio, in that noble horn theme which Liszt afterwards borrowed in "Les Preludes."

While speaking of resemblances, however, one cannot avoid noticing the fact that the most important figure of the finale of this symphony, the figure of four repeated notes, like a giant knocking at the door, had been used (with a different development, however) by Beethoven in that wonderful violin concerto which Mr. Heermann played at the preceding concert. We wish that the two works had been heard at the same concert, so that the audience might have studied the same thought as developed by two different minds.

190

The audience stayed to the end of the symphony and applauded each movement. Yet, for once, we were not greatly aroused by the reading, which seemed to be rather perfunctory and not as excellent as we are accustomed to hear under our great conductor's baton.

Next Saturday we are to have some more of the worthy modern music, in the shape of Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" and Mr. Van Hoose is to sing Beethoven's "Adelaide" with orchestral accompaniment. Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Progressive Trinity in Music Afforded by Mr. Gericke.

The Selections Include the "Faust" Overture from Wagner, Weingartner's Symphonic Poem, "The Elysian Fields" and the Ninth Symphony of Schubert.

Mr. Gericke's 17th programme was remarkable for the intellectual and spiritual progression of the selections that composed it, three in number, thus representing that essential trinity which seems to pervade all that is perfect and complete in the universe.

It began by that "Faust" overture of Wagner, intended to be but the opening movement of a great philosophic and emotional symphony, but ultimately left isolated. It is all unrest, fatigue, despondency, doubtful questioning, and deep, but vague longing for what constantly appears, alluring and consolatory, close at hand, but ever just out of reach—a hope, but not a promise, an expectancy, not an assurance.

Then came Weingartner's symphonic poem about "The Elysian Fields." Rightly it is called a poem, whereas most compositions presented as such are rather declamatory or dramatic narratives, eager to display action, to cause excitement and demonstrate the superabundance of clamorous and struggling vitality. But Weingartner, realizing that beauty, charm, lofty but tranquil joy, peace and harmony of feeling and delicious illusions are the first attributes which poetry bestows upon its winning, gracious and shapely thought, has wrought toward dainty, soothing, appealing effects in his music, so that ear, fancy and nerve may be wooed to sensuous ease and soft delight.

It is true that he has analyzed his own pages and told what he desired to imply by this theme and what by his particular treatment of that other; but this is all needless. The music as it flows along, now languorously and now spiritedly, gayly or gravely, creates the melting moods—and no more is needed. One feels that a region, like Bunyan's Beulah, exquisitely dear and gracious, spreads before him, every feature a charm and an earnest of reposeful happiness; that within this landscape the blessed dance and sing and sport; calm, serious worship rises to a certain mild majesty, and then again placid, quiet enjoyment succeeds, and all sinks at last into its primal tranquillity. Nothing dignifies, exalts or fortifies the soul, and perhaps the grandest, gravest fancy of all is that which keeps the deep bass notes heard and felt almost constantly, as if to hint that all this delicious peace dwelt upon a sure, unchangeable, eternal foundation.

This poem delighted, but it left voids unfilled and longings without response. One needed to pass—and the opportunity was given—from the creation of talent and art, care and refinement, to the free eloquence of inspiration and genius, crying out in their last mortal days with appeal to the very soul of man, thrilling and uplifting it through its own spirituality. There is something in that ninth symphony of Schubert—something in its confidence, enthusiasm and insistence, its serene pathos, its gentle joy, its aspiration and its sense of glory, which even Beethoven does not give and which made Schumann, in his rhapsodic admiration, declare that such a work must be for all eternity, because it touched, expressed and vivified the highest, best and purest in human nature. Thus was the triad complete—mortal longings, sensuous contentment and immortal spiritual fruition.

The performance was as a whole at the level of the music. It was a pity, though, that the second harp asked by Weingartner could not have been provided. There never seems to be any difficulty about extra brass and beatable things for Wagner or Strauss, and in the larger ensembles of this poem, a single harp is absorbed and might almost as well be silenced. Just before the close of the poem there appears a single false touch—that is, unless it were laid on more heavily than was intended. A short phrase, reminiscent of the most sportive, jubilant episode of the poem, is inserted among the final strophes, which are all melting to soft repose and absolute evanescence. Were the phrase just barely audible, it might seem like a last dying echo of a long passed strain; but, sounding bright and clear, it startles and almost shocks.

The next programme will be this:

Overture, "Liebesfrühling." (first time) Schumann
Aria from "Euryanthe." "Unter den blühenden Mandelbäumen" Weber Overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" Tchaikowsky
Aria, "Adelaide," with orchestral accompaniment. Beethoven
"Impressions of Italy" Charpentier
Soloist, Mr. Ellison Van Hoose.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventeenth symphony concert was given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Richard Wagner: Eine Faust-Ouvertüre.
Felix Weingartner: Symphonic Poem, "Die Gefilde der Seeligen," opus 21.

(First time in Boston.)

Franz Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.

It seems a good while since Wagner's Faust-Ouvertüre was last heard here. Historically interesting the work will always be; for it was the first taste of the "later Wagner" the outer world got. And note how little there was in the work to scare the world at the time: some bold modulations, some rather "Weimarian" melody, but, upon the whole, so much of the old sonata form, and handled with such facile mastery! One wonders how people could have been shocked at it, as some unquestionably were. But it is not the new form, or the absence of old form, that the world at large most deplores in new and original composers of genius, but the new spirit; even the most conventional of old bottling will not reconcile conservative humanity to that. And, in spite of the old sonata form, one does find an enormous amount of originality of musical feeling in this Faust-Ouvertüre; quite apart from its historical interest, the work is still strong and fresh as it was half a century ago. One point is rather curious: in 1852 Liszt wrote to Wagner, about his first draught of the composition, "If . . . you introduced a soft, tender, melodious part, modulated à la Gretchen, I think I can assure you that your work would gain very much." And the "Gretchen" theme Wagner did introduce, following this advice, was about the only thing he ever wrote that reminds one strongly of Liszt! It sound almost like a plagiarism. The overture was beautifully played, and produced a profound effect.

As for Mr. Weingartner's "Gefilde der Seeligen," what can one really say of it? It shows a certain mastery over the resources of the modern orchestra; it is euphonious in a rather cloying way. But, upon the whole, one is tempted to call it Richard Strauss expurgated for nursery use. And one finds that Zola was quite right when he called expurgated things "terriblement fades" (terribly flat). There is no use trying to impute an interest to the music by connecting it with Böcklin's picture; the music is too dull, tame, tasteless in itself to be made interesting by any process whatever.

Schubert's great symphony came like sunshine after drizzle. Except for one or two (after all, slight) modifications of the rhythm in the last movement, the performance was one of the finest I ever heard. And there may be perfectly legitimate difference of opinion concerning the rhythmic modifications I object to. Only, the dominant spirit of the work seems to me so evident that I cannot but find it disturbing to have it contravened even in the slightest degree. This spirit is a machine-like persistency of rhythm. I know of only one other symphony which is at all to be compared to this one of Schubert's in this respect: Beethoven's No. 7, in A major: from a similar persistency of rhythm this has been called the "apotheosis of the Dance." Now, fitting as this term is to Beethoven's A major symphony, it is not quite so fitting to Schubert's in C major; here the persistency is more automatic-seeming, partakes more of the nature of fine machinery; its force and impressiveness reside in its inexorable regularity. I should much like to hear the symphony given once without any retarding or accelerating, absolutely like clock-work. I cannot help thinking it would be very exciting indeed. But it was a grand performance, all the same; it showed the work as one of those sporadic creations of genius which remain ever original, because there is nothing else in the world at all like them.

191

The next programme is: Georg Schumann, overture, "Liebesfrühling" (first time); — aria; Tchaikovsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" — aria; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy." Mr. Ellison van Hoose will be the singer.

W. F. A.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Musical Notions About Paradise to Be Offered as the Novelty.

Every man has his own notions about paradise, as has likewise every people. Mr. Gericke will give his audiences of this week their first chance to find out what Felix Weingartner thinks about it. Weingartner, as the reader doubtless knows, is one of the greatest European orchestral conductors and a past master of instrumentation. He belongs to the ultra Wagnerian school, and delights, like Strauss and Busoni, to let colors and effects melt into each other like dissolving views. His symphonic poem now to be presented, was written in 1897, and has been performed only a few times, generally leaving its auditors perplexed as to its course of thought, but still sufficiently impressed with its mood. Like Hans Huber's symphony, heard earlier in the season, the painter Böcklin inspired it by his famous picture, "Das Gefilde der Seeligen," which might be translated, "The Elysian Fields." The painting shows a small river sweeping through the middle distance; a centaur, bearing a nymph upon his back, is entering from the foreground to cross; near by are a couple of swans, and a short distance away a happy couple are disporting themselves in a little clump of reeds; on the farther shore, amid trees and flowering plants, are other figures, a bedecked altar, and a broad, placid landscape extending to the horizon. All suggests quietude, peace, restfulness and calm delight. Such moods the several phases of Weingartner's poem seem intended to evoke, rather through sensation and sentiment than through distinctly stated ideality. If they succeed in doing this, no more, perhaps, could reasonably be asked, for there would be no use in trying to represent the individual element of the pictorial composition. If the lovely celestial vistas and the spiritual peace and happiness provided for the blessed are borne in upon the hearer's fancy and acceptance, the composer has succeeded, even if his score confounds analysis. And, by the way, the score demands about the whole range of modern instrumentation; it particularly calls for two harps, and for a special "high flute," and it relies upon the band for many solo passages, which emerge for a while from the general flow, but soon sink back into it. There appear to be four principal phases in it, these including many minor modifications. The pervading temperament seems to be bland, suave and gently fluent, although the middle movements are lightly quick, warm, broad, moderately strong and gay. The composer's conductorship is indicated in the many instructions and hints as to the reading, which are set down upon the score for the guidance of other directors.

The programme begins with Wagner's "Faust" overture, which, as will be remembered, aims to delineate the restless, anxious, perturbed, spiritual state of the philosopher, and his belief in and hope for the relief of death.

The symphony—there are only three numbers on the bill—is that magnificent one in C, which Schubert wrote in 1828, and may be called the greatest, as it was the last important work of his life, because of its richness, exaltation, sumptuous splendor and exquisite sensitiveness, all rising in the finale to amazing fulness, impetuosity and fervor. Its movements are differently interpreted. Mr. Perabo, writing enthusiastically about them in April, 1889, classified them as representing dawn, expanding to the glory and strength of day; woods, with the charming life and light of nature; peasant pleasure, with dances and homely delights; a splendid sunset, accentuated by the sound of evening guns. But the hearer needs no precise pictures for his uplifting and delight.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 17th Symphony program had for its novelty Weingartner's symphonic poem, "The Elysian Fields," played for the first time at these concerts. The other selections were a "Faust" overture by Wagner and Schubert's ninth symphony. There were no soloists. The Weingartner poem was inspired by Arnold Böcklin's celebrated picture in which centaurs, youths and maidens are represented as enjoying the tranquil delights of the mythological elysium midst the meadows, flowery banks and waters of this undiscovered haven of bliss. The "poem" is very long, there are innumerable melodic contrasts typifying the various sports of the forms outlined upon the canvas, with the pastoral and different emotional effects illustrated skilfully by those instruments, singly and in combination, usually associated with similar episodes.

The work is of the class that depends very largely upon one's imagination for its proper appreciation, and if the composer's analysis is accepted and the auditor has a poetic temperament the musical narrative should prove very interesting. The effects produced by some of the instrumental combinations display considerable ingenuity on the part of the composer, who has no hesitancy in making bold progressions and cross harmonies, and he also shows great ability in handling the same theme by different instrumental bodies. The "atmosphere" is generally joyous, even the heavier instruments joining in the expressions of gaiety, and throughout the piece the prominence given to the woodwinds suggests the intensely pastoral nature of the poem.

The clarinet passages, echoed by the deeper tuba and trombone, and repeated by the solo violin, are very striking bits in the first part. There is a splendid episode later on, where a vigorous orchestral crescendo develops into a charming dance motif, played by the lighter instruments, and near the end of the poem the counter themes given to the brasses and woodwinds in opposition to the violins are admirably orchestrated. From this on the tone of the work assumes a more mysterious air and the delicacy of treatment is more marked till the poem gradually terminates in a pianissimo finale. The orchestra did its work thoroughly well, the episodes outlined above being given as effectively as one could wish to hear by the different contingents.

The "Faust" overture, with its somewhat uncanny scoring, received an adequate interpretation, in the Wagnerian spirit, which wouldn't, of course, be suitable for Gounod's description of the same subject. The Schubert symphony, so exquisite in development and sentiment, was the most enjoyable of the three selections, and its performance showed the orchestra in its most responsive mood.

This week's program will be as follows: George Schumann, overture, "Liebesfrühling"; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy." There will be vocal numbers, to be announced, by Mr. Ellison van Hoose.

FELIX WEINGARTNER'S "THE ELYSIAN FIELDS"

Produced Here Last Night at the 17th Symphony Concert.

MORE COLOR THAN CONTENTS

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the seventeenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

A Faust overture.....Wagner
Symphonic poem, "The Elysian Fields".....Weingartner
Symphony in C No 9.....Schubert

Weingartner's symphonic poem was played last night for the first time in this city. Produced at Mannheim in 1897, it was performed in New York in 1898.

Boecklin's Picture.

The composition was inspired by a celebrated picture by the fantastical Arnold Böcklin, which hangs in the National Gallery, Berlin. It is a tranquil landscape. In the foreground an old centaur is wading in smooth water toward the shore. He looks sadly at two swans and on his croup is a woman almost nude, who has arranged herself in a theatrical attitude, after the fashion of the Queen of Beauty and Delight in the transformation scene of a pantomime. Youths and maidens beyond, with garlands, dance about an altar, and lovers loll on a flowery bank. It was Weingartner's intention to put this picture into music, just as the aesthete in Punch was drawn, seated at a piano, and trying "to play the plate" on the rack before him. There is no reason why a composer should not write as a sub-title "Inspired by Böcklin," and then let the hearer, if he be so inclined, fit the music to the picture; but this composer wrote his own explanatory analysis, and no doubt now expects the hearer to hear exactly as he himself was moved by the painting.

Weingartner's Analysis.

Weingartner assigns themes to various things in and out of this picture. The chief theme is "the morning of blissful day by the side of the soundless, deep blue sea." A clarinet solo is the beautiful woman; sea gods and creatures are represented by trombones and tuba. There is the dance theme; the sanctuary theme. But why not the centaur theme? For the old centaur is the most prominent feature in the painting. (What sort of a theme would you give a centaur? How would you orchestrate it? Should a centaur wade in allegretto 6-8 or adagio 2-2? These are questions that might be asked at Conservatory examinations.) Weingartner is here particular instead of general in his musical argument. He is not content with a romantically vague impression, with a dreamy and yet sympathetic mood. He must make all of his little points, so that there can be no possible mistake. He sets carefully his guide posts.

His Results.

Weingartner's themes are not remarkable in any way; on the contrary they are for the most part common; they are not of such beauty or significance that they arrest immediately the attention or come back to one after he leaves the hall. There is a certain ingenuity in the manner of combination, but there are also holes in his work, there are passages that lead to nothing and others that suggest an emptiness which he had intended to fill. He had at his command all the resources of the modern orchestra, yes, he even called in an alto-flute made for him to gain a special sonority, a flute, made in Germany, but what did he gain with all this? Nothing. There are amiable shades of color, but there is no exquisite and memorable nuance. There are agreeable groupings of instruments; there are well-contrasted bodies of tone; there is respectable routine work; but there is no sustained poetic flight. Take away the coloring, such as it is, and what is left? The musical thought is labored commonplace.

Elysium in Music.

There may be various views concerning the precise nature of the enjoyment in the Elysian Fields. Gargantua in the marvelous discourse delivered to his father, Grandgousier gave his opinion, which appealed strongly to no less a man than Robert Southey, but many would agree with him and Rabelais was a reporter rather than a judge in the matter. Weingartner might say he followed Böcklin's fancy; but in the painter's fancy there is classic serenity, which wholly escaped the composer. Why this brass band in the sanctuary? What have sea gods and sea creatures to do with the joys of the peaceful dwellers of the plain? Long ago a man named Gluck, who did not experiment with counterpoint, wrote in his opera "Orpheus" music for the chorus of the blessed and also for their solemn movements. He had a small orchestra; he wrote for it and his voices simple music of imperishable beauty, and in this music is the classic, unearthly serenity, sung by the ancient poets. This music of the Chevalier Gluck should always follow in concert the symphonic poem of Felix Weingartner, Edler von Muenzberg.

The Other Pieces.

Wagner's "Faust" overture now seems a highly orthodox composition in strict sonata form in comparison with the mirific tone-poems of the ultra-modern school. It is interesting to trace in it musical thoughts that also appear in "The Flying Dutchman," and some that sound as though they belonged even to "The Ring." Schubert's great symphony brought the long end. What wonderful pages it contains! The preparation for the entrance of the trombones in the first movement; the trombone measures themselves; the famous horn passage in the second movement; but when one begins to speak of the second movement he might vie with Schubert in length. This movement, by the way, was played delightfully, and for that matter the performance throughout the evening was of the best.

194

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |               |   |
|---------------|---|
| SCHUMANN,     | OVERTURE, "Dawn of Love." op. 28.(First time.)  |
| WEBER,        | ROMANCE, "Neath the Almond Blossom," from"Euryanthe." (Act I., No. 2.)  |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY, | OVERTURE FANTASIA, "Romeo and Juliet."(After Shakespeare.)  |
| BEETHOVEN,    | CANTATA, "Adelaide," op. 46, with Orchestralaccompaniment.  |
| CHARPENTIER,  | SUITE for ORCHESTRA, "Impressions of Italy."I. Serenade.II. At the Fountain.III. On Muleback.IV. On the Summit.V. Naples. |

Mr. Van Hoose being ill }
his solos were omitted }

Soloist:

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

195

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Georg Schumann, Overture, "The Dawn of Love"
Tschalkowsky, Overture, "Romeo and Juliet."
Charpentier, Suite, "Impressions of Italy."

Mr. Van Hoose was to have been the vocalist, but a sudden illness eliminated his numbers and made the concert, as the one of the preceding week, a purely orchestral performance. Nor was this altogether to be regretted; we confess to enjoying the orchestra under such conditions quite as well as when garnished with this or that celebrity. Boston might take a leaf from the orchestral enterprise of Philadelphia, in this matter, for Mr. Fritz Scheel, the enthusiastic and able conductor of the orchestra of that city has arranged a cycle of five concerts there, from March 20 to 26, at which an entire Beethoven orchestral series is to be presented; nine symphonies, five overtures and the Emperor Concerto, in which only the concerto and the ninth symphony will call for solo talent, almost every concert being purely orchestral.

Georg Schumann is not a genius, yet he is more than a routine composer. He is a master of the modern orchestra; but so many have become masters of this mighty musical engine that a modern composer with the skill of a Berlioz no longer attracts much attention. Schumann is also an adept at figure development and is not incoherent, but logical, in the unfolding of his musical form; but he seems to have yielded to the modern impulse, which is working so much havoc in the latter-day repertoire, of desiring to say something definite in instrumental music, of forcing his orchestra to tell an intelligible story. Had the work been labelled "Concert Overture, Op. 28" we could have been more at ease; but when the title—"The Dawn of Love"—was foisted upon us, we could not avoid thinking that the amatory attack was very sudden; the horn passages (very difficult and well-played) only intimated to us that the lovers were in a dilemma; the heavy outbursts in fortissimo could suggest nothing else but the young lady's irate father.

The composition would be quite as consistent if one named it "A Day on the Stock Exchange;" the ascending passages on the brass might mean a rise in copper, the downward rush of the strings might illustrate the course of Dominion Coal and Iron, the oboe might illustrate the bleating of the lambs, the horns the prospect of a bull market, etc., etc. We have too much of the photographic element in instrumental music nowadays; the charm and beauty of its vagueness is gone.

Tschalkowsky is still a name to conjure with,—and to mispronounce. Brahms, Richard Strauss and Tschalkowsky are to us the triumvirate of recent instrumental music; Tschalkowsky was the superior of the first-named in scoring and possibly not the least of the three in poetic content. This "Romeo and Juliet" overture is largely given over to the combats of Montagues and Capulets, but when the lovers do appear we have passages more tender and romantic than either Brahms or Strauss could evolve. Of course, when an instrumental work is built upon a play, the auditor has plenty of pegs whereupon legitimately to hang definite meanings, and there is no great danger of his dilating with the wrong emotion. The overture is great music and it was nobly played on this occasion.

Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" is also in the more reasonable style of picture-music, for who can see Southern Italy and not think either music or poetry! Charpentier has individuality, just as Bizet had individuality, and he approaches nearer to that master than any other living Frenchman, although he has not (and nobody has) the exquisite melodic grace of the creator of "Carmen." The suite is uneven; the first movement is decidedly original and impressive. The bold and long-continued employment of unison work, the beautiful viola solo, the harp effects imitative of mandoline (by playing near the edge of the strings), all combine to make a fascinating picture. The oboe work of the second movement deserves a word of praise. The muleteer movement is rather obvious in its effects but is melodic and graceful, and particularly effective is the simple song of the maidens, a flute theme in thirds.

We find the last two movements less remarkable; Sorrento is worthy of a much more poetic portrayal than is here given, and the jumble of tunes and rhythms that stands for Naples does rank injustice to the most exciting city in the world. Elgar's "Cockaigne" overture might as well picture the Vesuvian city as such a mixture of marches and tarantellas. But Charpentier has something to say and when he gets his muse more fully under control he may rattle around in Bizet's vacant place, which no one has ever filled.

Adm. Mar 16 1903

Louis C. Elson.

Mr. Van Hoose's Illness Causes Gaps in the Programme.

It begins to seem as if a vocal engagement for a Symphony must carry with it a billet for an illness this season. Sturdy Mme. Schumann-Heinck, although she had been hale and hearty until her Boston date approached, was then incapacitated, and Mr. Van Hoose, who was to all appearances well on Thursday, was so ill on Friday morning that his return home and care was necessary if he hoped to resume work next week. His own disappointment was great, for this was his first inability to meet an engagement. It would seem as though two vocal numbers might be supplied offhand here in Boston. But many considerations must be taken into account by the conductor—the calibre of the artist, the arias held ready by him or her for immediate performance, the consonancy of these with the other selections, and the possibility of obtaining at once the proper orchestral parts. A hasty canvass was made and inquiry was also made in New York; but it was thought best simply to drop Mr. Van Hoose's numbers and proceed without them. The instrumental part of the programme was varied and affluent of beauty and spirit.

The new overture led off bravely. Originally christened "Spring Festival," it was thought to be too vehemently jubilant for a season in which renascent vitality assumes the guise of "ethereal mildness" and owns aspirations that melt rather than burst into active efflorescence. Whether anything was really gained by changing the title to the "Dawn of Love" may be questioned. For the lively themes, one a trifle more sustained and poised than the other, soon grow so enthusiastic, not to say excited, and so full-voiced and emphatic that they would seem to represent the high noon of love's heyday rather than its dawning. Technically, the treatment, elastic, inventive and brilliantly colored, follows convention, and the work gives plentiful and buoyant pleasure.

Tschalkowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia made its usual deep and passionate effect. The sombre, presaging, fateful introduction; the two periods of storm, anger and conflict, holding between them the one short episode of soul-felt bliss and mutual love, and then the fading away of all in "dire defeat," sorrow and plaintive wail, came in turn and commanded ready and changing sympathy.

The "Italian Impressions" of Charpentier, now heard for the second time, having been first played in Boston at a Symphony concert almost exactly two years ago, brought the concert to a cheery and early conclusion. They would be entertaining to anybody, but their full value and appropriateness would be obvious only to those who have not merely visited Italy, but have known it. In the first section one feels the long, lazy, lounging swing of the young fellows as they stroll homeward drawing from violin string or striking from chords of mandolin and guitar their passing serenade, pausing, perhaps, under a window here and there, to catch a laughing response, a flower, or a "cornetto" to the "dolet." It holds the same spirit as Paladilre's "Mandolinata," but it moves more heavily and prosaically. The quieter, gayety of the water bearers as they gather about the mossy great stone basins, into which the fountains pour, the tread of their firm feet, and then the reciprocal merriment of men and maids when the mule trains come trotting homeward over the hills, which form the next two sections, are faithfully suggested. Parts of the section which hints at the great stillness that lies over the "desert of Sorrento," and is only smitten now and then by the sound of a church bell from far below, a voice in outcry, or a wind among the scattered trees, lacks expansive poetic imagination, although it is good enough so far as it extends. So, also, the final section, "Naples," is rather a collection of sketches and suggestions than a transcription of realisms, or a romance of idealities. It is lively, sharp, strong and shifty; but none of its pictures are quite complete, and the one consistent underlying notion is that of the rattle and scuffle of the farantella. It is better taken as a bustling, stirring olio, than as a real Neapolitan "piatto misto." When Charpentier tried his hand upon home subjects, later on, he found his descriptive talent come into sharper play, and he colored his work to his own peculiar fancies, until his results were almost excessive.

The orchestra played to perfection all the evening, as if to make up in quality the evening, as if to make up in quality. Next week there will be no rehearsal or concert, and a week later will come this programme:

Symphony No. 38, in D major (Koechel.
504).....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2
Saint-Saens
Two movements from suite.....Arthur Foote
"Carnival in Paris".....Svendсен
Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.

A Composition by Georg, Not Robert, Produced Last Night.

Mr. Arthur Hochman's Second Piano Recital Yesterday Afternoon Was Well Attended.

Journal ——— Mar 15/903
By PHILIP HALE.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Dawn of Love"
(first time).....Georg Schumann Overture—Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Impressions of Italy".....
Charpentier

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, who was to sing at this concert, rehearsed, but was suddenly taken ill before the concert of Friday, to the disappointment of all that have heard him. And yet there was music enough last night; nor is it too much to say that the concert was one of the most interesting of the season.

George Schumann, as an orchestral writer, was introduced to us last season, when he brought with him a more or less perfunctory set of variations on a choral. He then seemed an eminently serious person who wrote music as he would write a treatise, conscientiously and laboriously. Last night we found him a more genial man with longings and blood. His overture is in classic form, but the contents are modern, and although his technical skill is abundantly shown, the overture was not written primarily as an exhibition of knowledge. The exultant chief theme is well found; it is more characteristic than the contrasting theme, which has little distinction of any kind, and is merely amiable, without sensuousness, without any subjective or objective beauty; it serves chiefly as a contrast. When the overture was first produced in Berlin (April 1, 1901) it was entitled "The Celebration of Spring's Return," but a program note said that the music was intended to picture "the jubilation which bursts forth from the dull feelings of man in the flesh of his being." The work was criticized as being too energetic an expression of the thoughts suggested by the title, and for this reason possibly Schumann chose the title which now stands. Surely whether spring or love were in his thoughts, it comes with a rush, for we are at once in swing and exultation. In the detail the invention flags occasionally, and there is highly respectable routine work; but as a whole there is a go, a spontaneity, a freshness to the music that raise it above the level of the German chapel-master compositions of the day. Its clearly defined scheme and the sureness of the development are more satisfactory than works which suggest the composer teeming with vast ideas but unable to express them.

The overture by Tschalkowsky and the suite by Charpentier have been played at these concerts. The former is most Tschalkowskian in scenario and expression. It is a song of love and death, and seldom has such a rapturous song of love that mocks time and space been sung. How exquisite the amorous mystery of the passage that follows the first exposition of the great theme! It is as the invocation of Juliet to the night of nights! And when the chief theme breaks out and soars above clashing feud and confusion, one is tempted to cry out in wonder: "O Tschalkowsky!" as Berlioz was moved to invoke von Weber at the thought of the clarinet entrance in the "Der Freischuetz" overture. If only the overture were without those few final orchestral strokes! Charpentier's suite is deliberately picturesque, scenic. It is a good thing to hear such music, to revel in rhythm and color, to be reminded of Italian song as heard under an Italian sky. The suite is diabolically clever; and it is something more than this; for there is imagination, there is audacity. Nor is Charpentier here merely a scene-painter: there are passages of charming detail; there are sudden and surprising modulations that are in themselves a radiant or haunting poem. There is nuance after nuance. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant throughout the evening, and the various solo passages were gems of artistry.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

A New Overture and Arias for Mr. Van Hoose. March 13, 1902

As the fancies of young folk are declared by the poet to turn lightly to love thoughts in spring, it is no doubt all right that love should have a little spring season for its own delectation. At any rate, that seems to be the idea of Georg Schumann, whose overture, "Love's Spring," new to Boston, stands at the head of this week's Symphony programme. His music was first heard last season, an elaborate, skilful and rather elegant series of orchestral variations upon a chorale theme having been introduced at the second concert. How finely poetical he can be he has here the chance to show.

The next orchestral selection pushes from love's spring to its autumn, and shows—to quote from Charles James Sprague—

"Young Love, with eye of tender gloom,
Brooding o'er the hallowed tomb
Where his plighted lovers lie—
Where they met, but met to die."

For it is Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture in the fantasia form, rhapsodical and pathetic by turns. It is moody, rather than idealistic, and presents, in sequence, the religious, the martial, the amatory and the funereal emotions of the tragedy.

The only other orchestral number will be Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," which was the first important result of his residence in that country as winner of the grand prix de Rome for 1887. It is divided into five sections, about which a somewhat fantastic analysis was written by one of the composer's friends. First is an allegro, supposed to be significant of a serenade situation. The young men sally gayly from the wine shops and cafes as midnight approaches, and go singing cheerfully along the streets to the tinkling of their mandolins and the occasional responses of the other sex. Second, tranquillo, a fountain scene. The streams come down into deep pools, and there the maidens gather to fill the vessels which they bear cheerily away upon their shoulders. Then comes an andantino to represent the home-returning of the mule train. The hoofs patter along regularly, and by turns the young men and young women sing in jovial chorus. A moderato follows, suggesting the calm upon the heights of Sant Agata, in what is known as "the desert," over and above Sorrento. The peninsula, with its villas and its fruitful orchards, lies far below, projecting into the Mediterranean, that stretches away to the horizon. Thence, for the final allegro, the scene shifts to Naples, with its bustle, its hubbub, its rush of life, its military order, its cries, its dances upon the quays and pavements, and its never slackening vitality. The comment has been made that this suite is made up rather of characteristic noises than descriptive music, and that it loses possible ideality or fidelity to fact. This remains to be seen.

The recurrence in December of the anniversary of Weber's birth seems to have attracted attention in many places to his "Euryanthe," which was then sung on several stages. A Vienna correspondent writes:

"Much earnest study has been devoted recently to a revival of Weber's 'Euryanthe,' that most hopeless of all masterpieces, which, in spite of its glorious music, has at no time and in no place ever succeeded in holding the attention of the general public. Each one of the important opera houses of Germany counts in the history of its essays and achievements various attempts to galvanize into life a work that, but for the impossible libretto of Wilhelm von Chezy, would probably be accounted prime favorite among those which Carl Maria von Weber wrote."

In this country the opera is known by its overture and the hunters' horns, and by little else, although, in December, 1887, the Metropolitan revived it with a great cast, including Lehmann, Brandt, Alvary, Fischer and Elmblad. But, just at this time, some other samples are offered. Mr. Bispham is to sing the villain Lysart's scene from it on Saturday night in Philadelphia, and Mr. Van Hoose draws upon it for his first song on this programme, taking the opening song of the lover, Adolar, who exalts his sweetheart in a kind of troubadour lay. The story, it may be remembered, traverses similar ground to that of Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," the lovers being at last happily reunited. Mr. Van Hoose's second selection falls upon Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestral arrangement of the accompaniment.

SYMPHONY CONCERT. St. Louis

There was no soloist at the 18th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, had been engaged to sing a romance from Weber's "Euryanthe" and the cantata from Beethoven's "Adelaide," but because of a severe cold he was obliged to cancel the engagement. Mr. Van Hoose is highly regarded here and his inability to appear was naturally a great disappointment to the audiences at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and last evening's concert.

Conductor Gerike offered no substitutes for the numbers omitted because of the tenor's illness, rightly considering that the remaining numbers provided a program of sufficient length. It is probable that if the wishes of a majority of the Symphony concert's patrons were complied with the concerts would never be of more than one and one-half hours' duration.

Three selections were played, "The Dawn of Love" overture by Georg Schumann, Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia and Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." The Schumann overture was the only novelty, the other two works having been frequently played here.

"The Dawn of Love" overture is a less joyous composition than its title would indicate, granting that love and happiness are necessarily closely allied. Mr. Schumann evidently regards the awakening of love as a very serious affair, for he writes about it in a heavy and unimpassioned style. It cannot be said that his music is exactly cold, for there is at times fiery intensity and emotional tumult, but there is little real warmth in his fire, and the sentiments expressed are those of the brain rather than of the heart. Technically considered, the work is well written and is constructed in a severely classical form, notwithstanding that the instrumentation is modern in its exceeding elaborateness. There is not much melody in the work, but the two principal themes are interesting and are often treated with great brilliancy. The overture was splendidly played, but it failed to receive more than a mild demonstration of approval from the audience.

Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture is undoubtedly a splendid composition, superb in its richness and beauty of themes, impressive in its intensity of devotional fervor and magnificent in its splendor of tonal color, but the Russian composer is more a realist than an idealist and there is less tender sentiment in his treatment of the Venetian love tragedy than would be welcome.

Charpentier's fascinatingly brilliant orchestral suite was the most thoroughly enjoyed offering of the concert. The performance was masterly in precision of execution, deliciously dainty and graceful in bringing out the shadings and delicate contrasts of color and at all times most happy, most delightful in giving expression to the composer's sentiments. The work has frequently been given a place on the Symphony orchestra's programs in the past and it will ever be welcome in the future.

There will be no symphony concert this week. For the week following the program will be: Symphony No. 38 in D major, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2 Saint-Saëns; two movements from suite, Arthur Foote; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen; soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony Concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Georg Schumann: Overture, "The Dawn of Love," opus 28.

(First time in Boston.)
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikowsky: "Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasia after Shakspeare, opus 67, No. 1.

Gustave Charpentier: "Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite.

Mr. Ellison van Hoose was to have sung Adolar's aria from Weber's "Euryanthe," Adolar's aria from Weber's "Euryanthe," and Beethoven's "Adelaide" with an orchestra accompaniment; but he was suddenly taken ill before the concert, and could not appear. As it was, the three orchestral numbers made up a delightful programme, though it is always a disappointment not to hear Mr. van Hoose sing.

Georg Schumann's overture lies on the border between Kapellmeistermusik and effectual composition. One can listen to it with pleasure, although one would hardly cross the street for the sole purpose of hearing it. The thing is a good example of the romantic treatment of a classical form, or, if you prefer, of putting new wine into old bottles. The character of the themes, the whole atmosphere of the piece, are distinctly modern, contemporary; the form is the good, old sonata form, but treated with so much mastery, so easily and to the manner born, that it puts no shackles upon the composer's expression of emotion. Best of all, the work is vivacious and lively, it plunges right in medias res with Beethovenish impetuosity; there is nothing soporific about it. Then, too, it does not make the impression of having been written simply for the sake of giving the composer a chance to orchestrate something; the musical ideas it is based on have a life of their own, they are not merely scaffoldings for the display of patches of color. In fact, there is so much that is good, so much that is very good, in this overture that its stopping short on the hither side of greatness gives one food for reflection, spurs one on to thinking of what a positively enormous output of force it takes to create anything really and truly great! We hear that a pianist must exert the equivalent of three tons (in foot-pounds) of force to play Chopin's E minor concerto; think of what an output of nervous energy and creative vitality it must have taken to write it!

There are two ways of playing Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet"; one makes it sound well, the other makes it dramatically expressive. Of course the latter is the true method; but the former has certain advantages, nevertheless. For one thing, it makes the bellicose scenes in the work less repulsively reminiscent of Meyerbeer. Still, if you wish for the genuine, unadulterated Tchaikowsky, you had best not lay too much stress upon mere euphony; for it is written in Music's Book of Fate that the impeccable performance shall never be the most poignant one, and Tchaikowsky is nothing if not poignant. When first Mr. Gerike conducted the overture-fantasia here, treading hard upon Emil Paur's heels, one musician exclaimed in my hearing: "Well, at least he makes it sound well!" But I heard afterwards that others, who held Tchaikowsky in their heart of heart, wept actually salt drops in the lobby over the too, too, smoothly-combed rendering of their idol's work. Last Saturday evening, however, it seemed to me that Mr. Gerike performed the rather superhuman feat of leaving the Scylla of elegant, euphonious flaccidity well to port, while the Charybdis of over-bolsterous passionateness clutched in vain at his starboard bilge. From which anyone can see that the motive breeze blew from Charybdis toward Scylla, and not the other way. In a word, the performance was as impassioned and dramatic as is compatible with an ordinary regard for high finish.

Charpentier's Italian suite betters the fine impression it made when first given here. One feels more and more sure of the man's being really a genius; with all his Gallic lightness of touch, his rather irresponsible fancifulness, you feel that there is an undercurrent of deep emotion beneath the glittering surface of his expression such as bespeaks the true poet. Where some of his compatriots have fallen to raving over a beautiful bit of nature, he rises to the pitch of ecstasy: where they have shown exquisite taste, he betrays a profound feeling for beauty. Then he has something to say, and knows how to say it. The performance was simply masterly, perfect at every point; especially admirable was the playing of the frequent solo passages, notably by Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Longy.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony No. 38, in D major (Koechel, No. 504); Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor; Arthur Foote, two movements from suite; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris." Mme. Antoinette Szumowska will be the pianist. W. F. A.

202

"Szumowska"

MRS. JOSEPH ADAMOWSKI,
The Boston Cousin of M<sup>rs</sup>. Paderewski.

203

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |               |   |
|---------------|---|
| MOZART,       | SYMPHONY in D major, "without minuet," (K. 504)I. Adagio: Allegro.II. Andante.III. Finale: Presto.              |
| SAINT-SAËNS,  | CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G minor, No. 2,op. 22.I. Andante sostenutoII. Allegretto scherzando.III. Presto. |
| ARTHUR FOOTE, | SUITE in D minor, op. 36.I. Allegro energico.II. Espressivo, non troppo adagio.                                     |
| SVENDSEN,     | "CARNIVAL AT PARIS." Episode for Orchestra,op. 9.   |

Soloist:

Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

Szumowska

MRS. JOSEPH ADAMOWSKI,

The Boston Cousin of M<sup>re</sup>. Paderewski.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in D major, "without minuet," (K. 504)

I. Adagio: Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Finale: Presto.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G minor, No. 2,
op. 22.

I. Andante sostenuto

II. Allegretto scherzando.

III. Presto.

ARTHUR FOOTE,

SUITE in D minor, op. 36.

I. Allegro energico.

II. Espressivo, non troppo adagio.

SVENDSEN,

"CARNIVAL AT PARIS." Episode for Orchestra,
op. 9.

Soloist:

Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Great is singing, but greater still is music. An excellent symphony programme on the same night with an opera that contained real orchestral beauty, gave proof last Saturday night that there are at least a few thousand Bostonians who care more for worthy musical thoughts than for mere technical display in their execution.

The programme of the Symphony was as follows:—

- Symphony in D major, "without minuet".... Mozart
- Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for piano-forte..... Saint-Saens
- Suite in D minor, Op. 36 (two movements)..... Foote
- Orchestral Episode, "Carnival at Paris"..... Svendsen
- Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.

The Mozart symphony proved itself a thing of beauty and a joy forever. Though usually rated less important than the great "Jupiter" symphony, or the G minor work, it seemed well able to stand comparison with these two masterpieces. From the very opening note, its clear, concise themes seemed fraught with expressive charm, and flowed on with that perfection of appropriateness and balance that makes the composer's works immortal. Such music will never grow old.

The andante also possessed its full measure of charm, but all slow movements of the 18th century run the risk of seeming too quiet and self-contained for modern ears. Some one has reminded us, by quotations, of its "exquisite grace" and "spring freshness"; and it still makes good its claim to this praise. Yet the music of old times, even in its most strenuous moments, lacks the modern element of orchestral power, and its subdued passages suffer still more by comparison. It was decidedly a case of "Spring, gentle Spring!" The rushing presto brought the work to a successful close, and Mr. Gericke earned decided praise for his sensible unaffected reading of it.

The Saint-Saens concerto must always be a thankful task for the soloist. The pleasing sincerity of its first movement, the inimitable delicacy of the second, and the lively brilliancy of the finale are sure to appeal strongly to the audience, and allow the performer to display his (or her) powers in varied forms. That Mme. Szumowska read the work with sympathetic understanding, and played it with consummate skill, may almost be taken for granted. Her thorough musicianship is now accepted as a matter of course, and Boston auditors always expect a treat when her name appears on symphony or recital programmes. The large number of recalls that she won last Saturday were a well-merited tribute to her greatness.

The word "suite" covers a multitude of orchestral efforts, varying from the light arrangements of Bizet and Grieg to the more serious, if less dainty, works of Lachner, or Tchaikowsky. Arthur Foote's suite is a work of so much breadth and such dignified earnestness that, but for the absence of strict symphonic form in the first movement, the composer may well be accused of excessive modesty in his employment of the term. The piece is animated throughout by a noble seriousness of musical thought and expression, and appeals strongly to all lovers of real beauty in the art. Such a composition as this proves that a true musician may still find worthy material without taking refuge in excesses of labored tone-coloring or bizarre harmonic effects. It should stand as a lasting rebuke to those aspirants who indulge in the wild discords of the modern metaphysical school.

Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" was the least important number on the programme. The reviewer (who, of course, does not presume to be an authority on riotous times in Paris) receives from the work a general impression that horns, trumpets and bassoons pervade the streets of the gay capital, occasionally getting lost in wild rushes of the other instruments, but usually able to hold their own in the fracas. There are some worthy passages in the score, but much of the material is of little value and none too well arranged.

Next Saturday we are to hear Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, also a new Symphony in D minor by Dohnanyi. Whether we are to have more numbers, or whether the programme is mercifully shortened because of the opera season, is left a matter of doubt.

Arthur Elson.

Frederic R. Comtee, he of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's business department, he of the name of more versions than a folk legend, has ascended into the "circumambient ether" because of a jestful paragraph in this department. Many a time and oft—not upon the Rialto—has the writer of this column animadverted and reverted as to the perverted programme books used and abused at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. People insist on rattling the leaves of the condemned things when Mr. Gericke is operating one of his long-distance-telephone pianissimos and the effect is well nigh maddening. THE SUN recently said it would be a good scheme to send these books to the subscribers a week or two before the concerts and let them "bone up," as they say at Annapolis. Mr. Comee comes back at THE SUN in his best Harvard English, thus:

"Why the suggestion about sending the programme to subscribers a week ahead? We've been doing this for fifteen years and always advertise to do this in all the papers. Wake up, old man, and I'll have a cold bottle with you the next time we meet—perhaps two."

Notice the deep suggestiveness of the iteration of the "this;" also of the bottles.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Saint-Saens Piano Concerto Given by Mme. Szumowska.

B Herald — Mar 29 1902

Mozart Symphony in D Major is Mr. Gericke's choice for starting his Programme—Two Numbers from Arthur Foote's Orchestral Suite are rendered. H M T

It is true in a general way that the earlier classic symphonies are at a disadvantage when assigned to a modern orchestra for performance in a great hall, although it is on record that some of them have been played on special or festival occasions by even larger bands than are often heard nowadays. If their thought be sturdy, their phrasing sonorous, or if their quieter parts can be delivered with the tempered richness of restrained and concentrated power, they may hold their own with their successors, written with other objects and means in view.

Such is the Mozart symphony in D major, with which Mr. Gericke began his 19th programme. When first played at Prague, in 1787, under the author's direction, it not only invited, but commanded admiration; and it has held such a proud position ever since. Like a few others of his writing, it begins with a short, slow movement, and it has no minuet. It opens vigorously and distinctly, and its final presto is also full of life and of positivism in statement; but between these direct and emphatic movements, large, solid and assertive enough for present day conditions, is set a delicate, fresh and gracious andante, in which is a propitious tenderness as of budding spring—Mozart in his blindest and finest mood, as in the others he shows his strength and decision. The symphony was all well played, the subdued and rounded quality of the strings and wooden wind being particularly gratifying in the andante, in which no drums or trumpets are used.

Mme. Szumowska, as the occasion's soloist, followed with the G minor pianoforte sonata (No. 2, opus 22,) of Saint Saens, her performance of which deserved the several recalls that were accorded her. The concerto, which begins with a self-assertive cadenza-shaped passage for the solo instrument, shows the composer's skill in writing what may be called music for the virtuosos, and gives scope for the player's exhibition of many qualities. Its grace, its fancy, its gaiety, its elegant ornamentation and its light speed fitted with Mme. Szumowska's best traits and were presented beautifully. Only in the heavier portions could one wish her to be other than she is; she has, indeed, the requisite strength of hand and arm for them, but she has not by nature the desirable forcefulness,—and as the distinction is spiritual and characteristic, one cannot expect it to disappear. The artist may by virtue of his art create the true form, but he can only vivify it from his own interior personality.

Next were given two numbers from Mr. Arthur Foote's orchestral suite, first played in Boston about seven years ago—an allegro and an adagio, of which the former is the more interesting, hearty and substantial, although not better written than the other.

The programme ended with a good rendering of Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," which gave no exceptional pleasure. It is lively, but not merry, and clamorous rather than significant. It might serve as suggestive of a picnic, a country fair or a "high old time" almost anywhere, for all the individuality it possesses. It goes, but its ending seems to rather a dispersion of ghosts after a "danse macabre," or a scattering of revellers before an onslaught of authority. The band played it for all it is worth, but the audience did not seem to care greatly for it.

For the next concert are announced the "overture, scherzo and finale" group of Schumann and the first presentation of Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor.

Frederic R. Comee, he of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's business department, he of the name of more verbiage than a folk legend, has ascended into "circumambient ether" because of a full paragraph in this department. Mr. a time and oft—not upon the Rialto—the writer of this column animadverted and reverted as to the perverted program books used and abused at the concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Per insist on rattling the leaves of the damned things when Mr. Gericke is creating one of his long-distance-telephonic pianissimos and the effect is well maddening. THE SUN recently said would be a good scheme to send these books to the subscribers a week or two before the concerts and let them "bone up," they say at Annapolis. Mr. Comee comes back at THE SUN in his best Harvard English, thus:

"Why the suggestion about sending the programme to subscribers a week ahead? We've been doing this for fifteen years and always advertise to do this in all papers. Wake up, old man, and I'll have a cold bottle with you the next time we meet—perhaps two."

Notice the deep suggestiveness of the iteration of the "this;" also of the bottles.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme Antoinette Szumowska was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert and played her part in the brilliant concerto in G minor by Saint-Saens in a thoroughly intelligent way. Since this composition was first heard in Boston in 1876, with B. J. Lang at the piano, in the Harvard musical association concert, it has been heard here less than a dozen times, and certainly not Gebhart's, nor Seveking's, nor Bendix', nor Mme Hopekirk's interpretation was so satisfying or so poetically sympathetic as was Mme Szumowska's.

The dainty theme opening with the second movement, in which the declamatory passages by the piano alone are answered and repeated by the orchestration, was done with the pearly touch and perfection of technique characterizing authoritative interpretation. Mme Szumowska, as has been said before, is free from the mannerisms of lesser artists, and plays with a contagious but wholly dignified enthusiasm. Her number was treated with the rarest delicacy, and the delivery of the graceful theme of the concerto was surpassed only by the really masterly performance of its variations. Her playing was greeted with great applause and repeated recalls.

The rest of the program was in keeping with its florid Saint-Saens "key-note." That wonderfully resonant example of latter-day musical culture, Mr Foote's D minor suite, originally in four movements, but given yesterday with only two, was also accorded deserved and generous praise, Mr Gericke's reading of these two must have delighted the composer; but it seems a pity that such a noble composition is ever given cut in two. It was first played in Boston in 1896 in its entirety, and was well received. The Mozart symphony in D major, which opened the concert, is notable for the announcement, "without minuet," which accompanies its program mention. This was the symphony which aroused such enthusiasm in Prague in 1787, when the composer played the piano and when Anna Sterace, soprano, sung. All three of its movements were played by the splendid orchestra of which Boston may feel so justly proud in a way that would have delighted the composer who heard it originally with only six violins, two violas, two basses and the piano. The breadth and power of the conductor's reading was never more clearly exemplified.

The picturesque "Carnival at Paris," by John Svendsen, now living in Denmark, was the fitting close to this brilliant concert. The composition is truly called an episode—for it is just like no other work in the whole range of descriptive music. The bal masque, the opera procession and all the accompanying gaiety are strongly brought out in this exceedingly florid composition, and the idyllic theme of its closing measure, not more perhaps than the manner of its performance, wrought the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

There was unusual breadth and variety to this program, and the audience showed to a rare degree its mid-Lent, but emphatic enthusiasm.

The program for the next concert will include Schumann's overture, scherzo, and finale, and Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor, the later for the first time here. 9 Love Mel. 29. 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

While at the Boston Theatre there was opera going forward, with Siegmund drawing swords and singing passionately of love and moonshine, Brünnhilde springing from rock to rock shouting "Yo te ho!", Fricka storming and Wotan putting the disobedient Brünnhilde to sleep behind the magic wall of fire; while all these stirring incidents were occurring, there was at Symphony Hall music of quite a different complexion. Saturday night all was elegance, grace and refinement. First came a Mozart symphony, that in D major, without a minuet. Then there was Mme. Antoinette Szumowska Adamowska, who played Saint-Saens's G minor concerto. There followed two movements of a suite, in D minor, by Mr. Arthur Foote, and eventually, at a rather late hour, the concert was ended by Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris."

This was an evening of quiet enjoyment, with nothing to excite the emotions or to tax the intellect, all the compositions being well known at their full worth. The symphony received a reading that made it a delight to hear, careful, graceful, lively. Never has a Mozart orchestral work in Symphony Hall sounded so well worth while and so little harsh. Its lovely performance was heartily appreciated. Mr. Foote's suite was also very beautifully played. This work, first played at a Symphony concert in 1896, and by the Thomas Orchestra in 1899, was good to hear again. Skillfully written and charmingly melodious, it has several dramatic moments that bring out advantageously the quieter beauties of the whole composition.

Mme. Szumowska was not happy in her choice of a pianoforte concerto. That in G minor by Saint-Saens, if in no sense very big or profound, has many passages, notably the opening, that must be played as though they were. The scherzo, too, and no less the finale, must be played with sparkling brilliancy and with a very sharp rhythm. Strength, brilliancy, and a keen feeling for rhythm are not Mme. Szumowska's. All her playing was musicianly, tasteful and well-sounding; also graceful, but something more is required to do full justice to the composition. To hear this artist play a Mozart concerto would be a treat. Mme. Szumowska was heartily applauded.

This week's programme consists of Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale," and a symphony, in D minor, by Dohnanyi. Mel. 30. 1903 R. R. G.

SYMPHONY HALL
Sunday Evening, March 1, at 8, Concert by the
Boston Symphony Orchestra
In Aid of Its Pension Fund

Tickets on sale at Symphony Hall, Friday, Feb. 13.
4t[A] fell

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WITKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY in D minor.

- I. Lent et solennel. Animé.
- II. Très lent.
- III. Animé.

(First time.)

MARTINI.

SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE.

WEKERLIN.
Old French Songs 18th cent.

- a) "Plaisir d'Amour."
- b) Menuet d'exaudet.
- c) "Jeunes fillettes."

HUGO REINHOLD,

PRELUDE, MENUET AND FUGUE, for Strings,
op. 16.

- I. Prelude, Andante.
- II. Menuet, grazioso.
- III. Fugue. Allegro.

MASSENET,
MASSE,

SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE.

Pensé d'Automne,

"L'oiseau s'envole là-bas," from "Paul et Virginie."

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE, SCHERZO, AND FINALE.

Soloist:

M. CHARLES GILIBERT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Because of Good Friday the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday, April 9.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Chas. Gilibert Sings With
Symphony Orchestra.

Bach's Mass in B Minor to Be Given
This Week by the Cecilia Society.

Easter Concert Offerings—Pre-
ludes and Echoes.

Clede Apr 5 1903

The Dohnanyi symphony in D minor, announced as an attraction for the past week's symphony concert program was changed almost at the last minute for an equally unfamiliar composition by G. M. Witkowski, like the rejected one a "first-time," three-movement symphony in D minor. It was first performed in Paris in March, 1901, with Vincent D'Indy as conductor, and a year later in Brussels under Ysaye, but little seems to be known of the composer, who is believed to be a lieutenant of cuirassiers in the French army.

The main theme of the symphony is a Lower Brittany folk song, liturgic in character, elaborated and metamorphosed through three rather stately movements, the finale being a musical representation of a "Kermesse," or annual carnival, full of merry "low country" vivacity. The "Lent et Solennel" and "tres lent" movements were rather tame, but the anime was full of effective coloring and was generously applauded. Of the Hugo Reinhold "prelude, minuet and fugue for strings" it can justly be said that it more nearly approached the austerity of lenten music approved by the church than any other feature of the program.

The fugue was pretty thin, with its lonesome strings, and the minuet was the most pleasing of its movements. By far the best of the orchestra's efforts was the Robert Schumann "Overture, scherzo and finale" full of the haunting melody for which he was famous. It was first performed in Leipzig in 1841, and its "first time" in Boston was at a concert of the Howard musical association, Dec 2, 1869. It is in symphonic form, but the composer refused at first to recognize it as a symphony. This light and buoyant overture and fervid spirit of the "vivace" finale were performed delightfully by the musicians under Mr Gericke's superb and masterly control.

Chief interest centered in the appearance of one of the Metropolitan opera company's most valued singers, Charles Gilibert, the Parisian baritone, who, from the time of his first Boston appearance in April, 1901, as the sacristan in "La Tosca," has been a favorite with Boston audiences. In the title role of Don Pasquale, and as Masetto in "Don Giovanni," he has more recently won the praise of local music lovers.

He gave yesterday two "groups" of songs, with the pianoforte, the first three being 18th century melodies. The first was a Martini "Plaisir d'Amour," very Frenchy in style; and the second was a "Menuet" by Joseph Exaudet, its words taken from a Favart comedy. These two were only moderately well received. The Wekerlin "Jeunes Fillettes" received the most generous applause—rollicking in movement, yet given with extreme delicacy, resulting in three recalls. The second group was not so enthusiastically greeted, though it included a charming poetical tribute by Massenet and Silvestre to Sibyl Sanderson, called "Pensee d'Automne," and a tuneful "chanson" from "Paul and Virginia," as sung by Domingue in the first scene of the second act. M Gilibert was in excellent voice, and could have felt no doubt of the friendliness of this city's musical colony. He sang with ease and intelligence, and showed that he was as fitted for concert as for opera.

The 21st rehearsal and concert will have Mr Ben Davies for soloist, the Englishman who has countless American admirers, and who has deserted Italian opera for the concert and oratorio platform. The program will contain two "first-time" numbers, an overture, "King Lear," by Litolf, and F. S. Converse's romance, "Endymion's Narrative." An aria from Mozart's "Don Juan," Guilmot's symphony in D minor, with organ, and the aria, "O Vision Entrancing," from A. Goring Thomas' "Esmeralda," are also likely to be included in the program.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

As we mentioned, a couple of days ago, Mr. Gericke has made one of his sudden changes of programme, and will retain for this week's rehearsal and concert only one work which he had promised—the symphony without a slow movement by Schumann, which goes under the long title of "Overture, Scherzo and Finale." He has proposed a new symphony by the pianist Dohnanyi, but he has substituted for it another unknown quantity, which is a symphony by Witkowski, who is spoken of as a pupil of Cesar Franck, an associate of D'Indy, and an extremist in modern orchestral thought and expression. From what can be learned about it, it is pretty queer, and may even be found quite ugly in parts. Indeed, the rumor leaks out that the first rehearsal quite staggered and phased the orchestra, but that now they are beginning to find more sense and coherence in the score. There will be less strain over a prelude, minuet and fugue by Hugo Reinhold, and there will surely be much pleasure to derive from a couple of groups of songs which Mr. Charles Gilibert of the Metropolitan company will sing. Clede 3.1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

Mr. Charles Gilibert was the soloist at the twentieth Symphony Concert, of which this was the programme:

Witkowski: Symphony in D minor. (First time.)
Songs with Pianoforte—
Martini: "Plaisir d'Amour."
Wekerlin: Menuet d'Exaudet.
Old French Songs, 18th cent.: "Jeunes fillettes."
Hugo Reinhold: Prelude, Menuet and Fugue, for Strings, op. 16.
Songs with Pianoforte—
Massenet: "Pensee d'Automne."

212
 Masse: "L'oiseau s'envole en bas," from "Paul et Virginie."
 Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale.

For new works of note let us always be grateful whether we like them or not. The novelty of this last concert, the symphony by one Witkowski, is so exceedingly unusual that there is, apparently, nothing known about its composer beyond the bare facts that he is a lieutenant of cuirassiers in the French army, and that he has studied music with Vincent d'Indy, who conducted the symphony at a Paris concert in 1901. The work, after one hearing, seems to be as vague and indefinite as its author. All three movements are based on a single motive, a method of procedure well enough, provided the single motive is strong enough to stand the strain of being continually harped upon for half or three-quarters of an hour. In this instance, the motive is "a melody of Lower Brittany, of folk origin and liturgic character." Despite its fine source, however, the theme is not of striking character.

For three movements the music wanders on, now majestically, as at the very first, now in a gay march rhythm, now passionately, when the second movement sets out, and finally hilariously, for the third part of the symphony is stated to suggest a kermesse. If one can bring himself to the point of throwing all reason to the winds, so that he can refrain from wondering why a grandiose passage played by trombones and the like should occur cheek by jowl with a skittish march measure, or why stopped horns, with their ill-boding sounds, should suddenly make way for a pretty flute solo; if one can do this, then he surely will find, perhaps to his wonderment, the symphony interesting to listen to. Probably, decades ago, just so did the "Götterdämmerung" seem to the lovers of Rossini. The performance was magnificent, but nobody liked the symphony at all.

Far better were the people pleased with the composition by Mr. Hugo Reinhold of Vienna, the composer who wrote the charming "Tanzweisen" for pianoforte. This little suite is, at all events, no work to keep one wondering, for all in it is straightforward, natural and agreeable to hear. The minuet in particular gave pleasure.

The feature of the evening, however, was Mr. Gilibert's exquisite singing of the old French songs and the two modern ones. For excellence of voice, production, purity of style, elegance of phrasing and of diction, and delicacy of sentiment, Mr. Gilibert's singing has never been surpassed by any that has been heard in Symphony Hall. It was, in short, perfect. The applause after both groups of songs was tremendous.

Mr. Ben Davies will sing at the next concert, the rehearsal of which, on account of Good Friday, will be held Thursday instead of Friday. The programme is as follows: Litoff, overture to "King Lear" (first time). Mozart, aria, "Don Juan." F. S. Converse, Romance for full orchestra, "Endymion's Narrative," Op. 10 (first time). A. Goring Thomas, aria, "O Vision Entrancing," from "Esmeralda." Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, in D minor, with organ (first time at these concerts). (Organ, Mr. Wallace, Goodrich.)

R. R. G.

213
 Journal Apr. 5, 1903
 The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night at Symphony Hall. The program included these orchestral works: Witkowski's symphony in D minor (first time); Reinhold's Prelude, Minuet and Fugue for strings; Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Witkowski is an officer in the French army and a pupil in music of Vincent d'Indy. His first work of any pretensions was a quintet, produced in 1898. This symphony is apparently his second, and it is a remarkable composition. It is in three movements, and the thematic material is derived from one chief or generative motive, viz.: a melody of Lower Brittany, of folk origin and liturgic character. All the developments have their source in this theme. The composer is naturally of that wing of the ultra-modern French school represented today by d'Indy, Ropartz and adherents of the Schola Cantorum, the music school in Paris which is of radical tendencies and is impatient with all manner of formalism and routine.

Witkowski's Symphony.

The first movement opens with a solemn prelude in which there are harmonies that recall "Parsifal." This is followed by the main body of the movement, an allegro which is made up of successive metamorphoses of the theme relieved by contrasting sections of a less stern character. This movement as a whole and after one hearing seems dry, although there are passages of interesting orchestration. The music is for the most part austere. The second movement is an amplification of a broad phrase sung sonorously by the strings. The finale is the musical portrayal of a kermesse, of "humanity in its cups." It is full of rhythmic changes; it is not picturesque or pictorial; it is at times brutally and ineffectively noisy; and yet the slower sections have genuine charm. Witkowski seems to me to be a close follower of d'Indy, but he has caught his occasional austerity and grimness rather than his sense of proportion and exquisite taste, his ability to put into music the sentiment of a landscape. Witkowski is not rich in melodic thought, or he prefers to choke such thought in his anxiety to shun the commonplace. Whether you like or dislike the symphony, you must admit the high purpose of the composer, who leaves lush meadows and the joy of the town to live on the heights or even in the clouds; for his kermesse is not really of the town or village and the only drunkenness is in the brass.

Mr. Gilibert.

Mr. Gilibert of the Metropolitan Opera Company sang Martini's "Plaisir d'Amour," the "Menuet d'Exaudet," "Jeunes Fillettes," Massenet's "Pensee d'Automne," and the slave song from "Paul and Virginia." He sang with rare art so far as vocal technic was concerned. Seldom is such admirable management of the voice observed in Boston. His diction was a joy, it was so true, so sincere, so effective. The sentiment was pure; there was constant suggestion as well as immediate and irresistible appeal. No wonder that he was recalled again and again.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Chas. Gilibert Sings With
 Symphony Orchestra.

Bach's Mass in B Minor to Be Given
 This Week by the Cecilia Society.

Easter Concert Offerings—Pre-
 ludes and Echoes.

Apr. 5, 1903
 The Dohnanyi symphony in D minor, announced as an attraction for the past week's symphony concert program was changed almost at the last minute for an equally unfamiliar composition by G. M. Witkowski, like the rejected one a "first-time," three-movement symphony in D minor. It was first performed in Paris in March, 1901, with Vincent d'Indy as conductor, and a year later in Brussels under Ysaye, but little seems to be known of the composer, who is believed to be a lieutenant of cuirassiers in the French army.

The main theme of the symphony is a Lower Brittany folk song, liturgic in character, elaborated and metamorphosed through three rather stately movements, the finale being a musical representation of a "Kermesse," or annual carnival, full of merry "low country" vivacity. The "Lent et Solennel" and "tres lent" movements were rather tame, but the anime was full of effective coloring and was generously applauded. Of the Hugo Reinhold "prelude, minuet and fugue for strings" it can justly be said that it more nearly approached the austerity of lenten music approved by the church than any other feature of the program.

213
 The fugue was pretty thin, with its lonesome strings, and the minuet was the most pleasing of its movements. By far the best of the orchestra's efforts was the Robert Schumann "Overture, scherzo and finale" full of the haunting melody for which he was famous. It was first performed in Leipzig in 1841, and its "first time" in Boston was at a concert of the Howard musical association, Dec 2, 1869. It is in symphonic form, but the composer refused at first to recognize it as a symphony. This light and bouyant overture and fervid spirit of the "vivace" finale were performed delightfully by the musicians under Mr Gericke's superb and masterly control.

Chief interest centered in the appearance of one of the Metropolitan opera company's most valued singers, Charles Gilibert, the Parisian baritone, who, from the time of his first Boston appearance in April, 1901, as the sacrilegious in "La Tosca," has been a favorite with Boston audiences. In the title role of Don Pasquale, and as Masetto in "Don Giovanni," he has more recently won the praise of local music lovers.

He gave yesterday two "groups" of songs, with the pianoforte, the first three being 18th century melodies. The first was a Martini "Plaisir d'Amour," very Frenchy in style; and the second was a "Menuet" by Joseph Exaudet, its words taken from a Favart comedy. These two were only moderately well received. The Wekerlin "Jeunes Fillettes" received the most generous applause—rollicking in movement, yet given with extreme delicacy, resulting in three recalls. The second group was not so enthusiastically greeted, though it included a charming poetical tribute by Massenet and Silvestre to Sibyl Sanderson, called "Pensee d'Automne," and a tuneful "chanson" from "Paul and Virginia," as sung by Domingue in the first scene of the second act. Mr Gilibert was in excellent voice, and could have felt no doubt of the friendliness of this city's musical colony. He sang with ease and intelligence, and showed that he was as fitted for concert as for opera.

The 21st rehearsal and concert will have Mr Ben Davies for soloist, the Englishman who has countless American admirers, and who has deserted Italian opera for the concert and oratorio platform. The program will contain two "first-time" numbers, an overture, "King Lear," by Litoff, and F. S. Converse's romance, "Endymion's Narrative." An aria from Mozart's "Don Juan," Guilmant's symphony in D minor, with organ, and the aria, "O Vision Entrancing," from A. Goring Thomas' "Esmeralda," are also likely to be included in the program.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tiresome New Composition by a French Cavalry Officer.

Apr. 5, 1903
 The Reinhold Number a Soothing and Pleasant One—Mr. Gilibert
 Sings Delightfully Two Groups of French Songs—The Programme for the Next Concert.

HERE is just one way in which to endure comfortably such a piece of composition as Mr. Gerlicke inflicted upon a patient and unresponsive audience in the new symphony by one G. M. Witkowski, of whom all the available information seems to condense itself into the facts that he is a lieutenant of the French cuirassiers, and that he studied music with Vincent d'Indy. That way is, to put reflection and reason aside and to resign one's self abjectly to the music, letting its flow do what it will and may with ears and nerves. Encouraging this spirit of resignation, one feels some calmly moulded music in the second or very slow movement; but while the others may be a little exciting, they are rather noisy than sonorous, and their speech is less a clear message than a confused jargon.

All the three movements—for there is no scherzo—which range nominally from the "slow and solemn" to the "animated," are said to have been built upon a single ecclesiastical theme which is finally perverted into the central emblem of a kermesse or fair. The treatment of this theme, which possibly the scholiast could trace, suggests something like the evolution of a school for the battalion from the use to be made of a squad of four as the elemental unit; and when there is in the course of the complicated development any definite idea or picture, it hints of a military melee or a crowding confusion. There is undeniable skill in the mixing up of instruments and their colors, but the most ambitious effects are the most ugly, and the work is one which, if it could not be "left in the pen," as the French say, might very well be left upon the shelf.

The world is full of beautiful, wholesome, gift-bestowing music. Why not be content to take that and leave alone what can at best gratify curiosity and at worst will weary and depress? The audience evidently did not care for the thing at all, but applauded with mild conventionality its conclusion, out of compliment to Mr. Gerlicke.

The Reinhold number was more soothing and pleasant, for it is instinct with soft-falling fancies and stated with delicate taste.

Mr. Gilibert again demonstrated, as before at Mme. Calve's concert, what a fine singer of songs he is. His choice was discreet, serious and dainty, and his delivery was quite perfection. The drole, quaint comedian gives place to the elegant, polished artist, in whom all must needs admire the bland quality of tone, and finished execution, the exact enunciation and the interpenetrative sentiment.

The programme for the concert, as reconstructed by Mr. Gerlicke, stood finally thus:

Symphony in D minor (first time)...Witowski
Songs with pianoforte.
a. "Plaisir d'Amour".....Martini
b. "Menuet d'Exaudet".....Wekerlin
c. "Jeunes Fillettes".....Wekerlin
(Old songs of the 18th century.)
Prelude, minuet and fugue for strings,
op. 10.....Reinhold

Songs with pianoforte.
a. "Pensee d'Automne".....Massenet
b. Chanson from "Paul et Virginie".....Masse
Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Charles Gilibert.

The next programme will be this:
Overture, "King Lear" (first time).....Litolff
Aria, "Don Juan".....Mozart
Romance for full orchestra "Endymion's Narrative," op. 10 (first time) F. S. Converse Aria, "O Vision Enchanting," from "Esmeralda".....A. Goring Thomas
Symphony No. 1, in D minor, with organ
(first time).....Gullmant Organ, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.
Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

Witkowski's Symphony at Twentieth Concert

Operatic Finale With "Carmen" and "Gotterdammerung" as Attractions—Camille Seygard Appears as Bizet's Heroine.

By PHILIP HALE.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gerlicke conductor, was given last night at Symphony Hall. The program included these orchestral works: Witkowski's symphony in D minor (first time); Reinhold's Prelude, Minuet and Fugue for strings; Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Witkowski is an officer in the French army and a pupil in music of Vincent d'Indy. His first work of any pretensions was a quintet, produced in 1898. This symphony is apparently his second, and it is a remarkable composition. It is in three movements, and the thematic material is derived from one chief or generative motive, viz.: a melody of Lower Brittany, of folk origin and liturgic character. All the developments have their source in this theme. The composer is naturally of that wing of the ultra-modern French school represented today by d'Indy, Ropartz and adherents of the Schola Cantorum, the music school in Paris which is of radical tendencies and is impatient with all manner of formalism and routine.

Witkowski's Symphony.

The first movement opens with a solemn prelude in which there are harmonies that recall "Parsifal." This is followed by the main body of the movement, an allegro which is made up of successive metamorphoses of the theme relieved by contrasting sections of a less stern character. This movement as a whole and after one hearing seems dry, although there are passages of interesting orchestration. The music is for the most part austere. The second movement is an amplification of a broad phrase sung sonorously by the strings. The finale is the musical portrayal of a kermesse, of "humanity in its cups." It is full of rhythmic changes; it is not picturesque or pictorial; it is at times brutally and ineffectively noisy; and yet the slower sections have genuine charm. Witkowski seems to me to be a close follower of d'Indy, but he has caught his occasional austerity and grimness rather than his sense of proportion and exquisite taste, his ability to put into music the sentiment of a landscape. Witkowski is not rich in melodic thought, or he prefers to choke such thought in his anxiety to shun the commonplace. Whether you like or dislike the symphony, you must admit the high purpose of the composer, who leaves lush meadows and the joy of the town to live on the heights or even in the clouds; for his kermesse is not really of the town or village and the only drunkenness is in the brass.

Mr. Gilibert.

Mr. Gilibert of the Metropolitan Opera Company sang Martini's "Plaisir d'Amour," the "Menuet d'Exaudet," "Jeunes Fillettes," Massenet's "Pensee d'Automne," and the slave song from "Paul and Virginia." He sang with rare art so far as vocal technique was concerned. Seldom is such admirable management of the voice observed in Boston. His diction was a joy, it was so true, so sincere, so effective. The sentiment was pure; there was constant suggestion as well as immediate and irresistible appeal. No wonder that he was recalled again and again.

Ben Davies.

From a photograph by Elliott & Fry, London.

217

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

LITOLFF,

OVERTURE to the Opera "King Lear."
(First time.)

MOZART,

ARIA, "Il mio tesoro," from "Don Giovanni."

F. S. CONVERSE,

"ENDYMION'S NARRATIVE," for ORCHESTRA,
op. 10.
(First time.)

A. GORING THOMAS,

ARIA, "O Vision Entrancing," from the Opera
"Esmeralda."

GUILMANT,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, for ORGAN and
ORCHESTRA, op. 42.
I. Largo e maestoso: Allegro.
II. Pastorale. Andante quasi allegretto.
III. Finale. Allegro assai.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloists:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

Ben Davies.

From a photograph by Elliott & Fry, London.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

LITOLFF,

OVERTURE to the Opera "King Lear."
(First time.)

MOZART,

ARIA, "Il mio tesoro," from "Don Giovanni."

F. S. CONVERSE,

"ENDYMION'S NARRATIVE," for ORCHESTRA,
op. 10.
(First time.)

A. GORING THOMAS,

ARIA, "O Vision Entrancing," from the Opera
"Esmeralda."

GUILMANT,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, for ORGAN and
ORCHESTRA, op. 42.
I. Largo e maestoso: Allegro.
II. Pastorale. Andante quasi allegretto.
III. Finale. Allegro assai.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloists:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

FREDERICK CONVERSE'S ORCHESTRAL ROMANCE

Journal —
Produced Last Evening at the 21st
Symphony Concert.

LITOLFF'S "LEAR" OVERTURE

Guilmant's Symphony, With Mr.
Wallace Goodrich Organist and Mr. Ben Davies Tenor.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor was as follows:

Overture, "King Lear".....Litolf
Aria, "Il mio tesoro".....Mozart
Romance, "Endymion's Narrative".....Converse

Aria from "Esmeralda".....Goring Thomas
Symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1.....Guilmant

Litolff's overture was played for the first time in Boston, and probably for the first time in this country. Mr. Converse's Romance was played for the first time. Guilmant's Symphony was played for the first time at these concerts.

Flamboyant Litolf.

Liszt, who evidently admired the talent of Litolf, nevertheless characterized it as flamboyant. This adjective described the man, the pianist, the composer. It is hard for us of today to realize that Litolf was once an indisputable influence, but his concertos and early overtures found imitators in the Byronic vein. This overture to "King Lear" was composed probably during his dark, sad days in Paris. There are traces of the old extravagant spirit which now seems rather formal and antiquated, just as "Lara" is today a much older and more primitive poem than the "Atys" of Catullus or the fourth book of the "Aeneid." Litolf's Lear struts across the stage and his Cordella anticipated a play-actress something like Virginia Buchanan. There is little romance, there is no passion in this music. And thus again we learn that extreme modernity runs a great risk of speedy dissolution and oblivion.

"Endymion's Narrative."

This is the second of Mr. Converse's orchestral romances. It was not suggested by the old legend nor was it inspired by the story of Endymion, who was expelled from his kingdom for being vanquished at the Olympian games; "upon which he retired into Caria to Latmos, where he applied himself to the observations of the stars, but chiefly of the moon, which gave the poets an occasion to feign that he was beloved by the moon, who came to visit him every night as he lay asleep upon the top of that hill." Mr. Converse was moved by the narrative of Keats's Endymion, who leaves the Festival of Pan, and talks with his sister Peona, like the walrus and the carpenter, of many things. There is no lavish attempt to follow the text, and the composer sensibly wishes his Romance to be judged first of all as music. After that the hearer can ponder the relationship of the music with the expression of a mind, bound by affection and material conditions, which yearns for an ideal beyond the common view. It is easier to enjoy the Romance and to speak of it as absolute music without esoteric significance. This Romance is an advance on its predecessor, "The Festival of Pan" (1900). The composer is surer of his strength, his imaginative flight is higher, his speech is more certain and eloquent. The music is sanely modern. There is little or nothing that seems experimental; there is no affectation of originality; there is clear melodic outline; but there is also modern feeling, modern expression. Mr. Converse has made a marked advance in orchestral ease. His orchestral speech is natural, entertaining, and at times it rises to true eloquence. The Romance is, indeed, an interesting work, full of musical matter, with the thought of ideals of beauty, free from materialism. The applause that followed the excellent performance and was acknowledged by the composer from the stage was much more than a courteous compliment.

Guilmant's Symphony, Etc.

Guilmant's symphony for organ and orchestra is familiar to many in its sonata form for organ alone. In the symphony Guilmant succeeded in the difficult task of reconciling organ and orchestra, chiefly by letting each in turn have the appointed say. There is antiphonal use of the rivals, or the orchestra is so employed that it does not quarrel with the less elastic organ. Mr. Goodrich played with taste and musical intelligence, and the Pastorale gave the audience special pleasure.

Mr. Ben Davies did not sing "Waft Her, Angels." He chose Don Ottavio's aria and Phoebus's chief tune from Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda." It ade little difference now he sang the latter frothy salon aria, but "Il mio tesoro" demands supreme elegance as well as the finest vocal artistry. Mr. Davies sang this air in a bluff, hearty, England - expects every man to do his duty manner, and Mozart suffered.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Herald

Unfamiliar Overture and a New Orchestral Romance Played.

Mr. Ben Davies, the English Tenor, Sings Delightfully and Broadly, and the New Music of "King Lear," Wild, Sweeping and Turbulent, Stands Approved.

When "King Lear" is mentioned, the mind naturally first recurs to the drear, helpless, awesome madness of the old king and his piteous death with the corpse of his devoted daughter in his arms. Yet these are, after all, but episodes—fatal and final, indeed—in a great, bitter drama of a rude, wild epoch, which Mr. Henry A. Clapp has well called an age of iron, characterizing as people of iron all who participated in it, not even excluding Cordelia, whose firmness he thinks proceeded rather from personal obstinacy than adherence to an abstract principle. It is a drama of anger and conflict, of political antagonisms, of internecine and foreign wars, of treachery, jealousy, hatred, violence and murder. No natural relationship guarantees peace, love and concord, but all evils follow upon the action of the affectionate, but rash and foolish, monarch, who resigns all only to see his realm dismembered, himself insulted and outraged, his children enemies and his one true daughter restored with his own wits only in his dying moments.

It seems to be more this general state of turbulence, revolt and battle in Britain that Litloff has undertaken to symbolize in the "King Lear" overture, which Mr. Gericke introduced at the Symphony concert, rather than any specific persons or phases of the story. It begins with a wild, sweeping rush of violins, to be sure, and it has the usual antithesis of a severe and a gentle theme; but without a name, the listener would be apt to assign it to a military or bellicose subject. Scarcely has the first onset of strings begun, when it is arrested by imperative trumpets; and, as the overture proceeds, there are ever and anon heard through or over its development of contrasted themes the rattle of drums and the dogmatic summons of trumpets, thus suggesting more the ebb and flow of battle than individual oppositions. It is a powerful, vivid and exciting composition, and was strikingly played.

Mr. F. S. Converse's "Endymion" romance for orchestra was in altogether a different vein, and as immaterial and metaphysical in its essence and suggestion as the other was material and demonstrative. The composer has gone to Keats for his subject, rather than to vague mythology, and he has chosen that part of the poem wherein Endymion confides to his anxious sister, Peona, his more than earthly ambitions and longings, his doubts and distrusts, his strange slumbers, the exquisite visits of the goddess, which he remembers as one might perfect dreams; his pain at finding only memory remains when he awakes, and his hope that truth and realization may yet be vouchsafed him. Mr. Converse will not even intimate what lines of the poet impressed him most, and he will give no programme or clew for guidance through his romance, which he wishes to be heard and judged as absolute music. Taking it thus, then, it is a music of moods, which each listener must interpret according to his imagination and his nervous susceptibility. We should derive from it some such sequence as this: A placid, peaceful, rural, idyllic environment, through which passes a contemplative figure, grave, depressed and even suffering in spirit, beside whom moves a figure of consolation, and before whom ever rises an alluring but elusive ideal, and across whose mind constantly pass light-floating fancies. His moods are many, antagonistic, variable with despair and hope, but his persistent aspiration and faith uphold him, and he casts himself boldly and strenuously into the struggle for ascent and liberty. Such would appear to be the naturally and logically developed course of thought and feeling; but that others will feel so, or that this was the composer's order of thought and purpose in construction, cannot here be more than guessed. At all events, the music is beautiful, and both charms and constrains attention. It is freely and liberally melodious, it is picturesque in proportion, and its instrumental devices, while not fantastic, abstruse or far-fetched, are various, ingenious and effective. It recognizes the orchestral development of today, but it does not try to anticipate that of the future.

The Gullmant organ symphony, in which Mr. Wallace Goodrich sustained the solo part with dignity, address and taste, made its due impression and was much enjoyed. What an advantage it had in this representation over any former ones! For now organist and conductor have no longer to communicate with each other through the reversing and deceptive medium of a mirror; but can regard each other, eye to eye, and place the solo lead or the massive support instantly just where it belongs in the general scheme.

It was pleasant to hear again Mr. Ben Davies sing, as it is always pleasant to hear a good tenor of the English school. They give their voices with such unstinting frankness, they are so honest in their style and so substantially human in their expression. They do not strive for finical or falsetto high Cs, but are content with full, genuine As, with possibly an occasional B flat. They may lack something of poetry and romance, but one can spare that for the sake of hearty manliness. Mr. Davies sang the "Esmeralda" air too sturdily, perhaps, for the declaration of a lover who says that he "faints for delight;" but it sounded as if he were honorable and sincere, at all events, while, on the other hand, he delivered Don Ottavio's "Il mio tesoro" so assuringly as to give the idea that that gentleman might not have been such a milkop as he usually appears, and might have been capable of doing as he says and "only returning to announce slaughters and deaths." Mr. Davies was cordially welcomed and applauded.

For the ensuing rehearsal and concert there has been appointed this programme:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Burleske in D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.....Richard Strauss
(First time.)
A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Symphony in D minor.....Walter Rabi
(First time.)
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Rehearsal This Afternoon to Avoid Good Friday.

Mr. Ben Davies, Tenor, to Sing an Air from "Don Giovanni" and a Gem from "Esmeralda"—"King Lear" Overture by Litloff to Be Heard for the First Time.

The public rehearsal of the 21st Symphony programme will occur this afternoon, so that Good Friday observances may not be by it disturbed. There are several novelties to be produced, and there will be the further gratification of two tenor airs, to be sung by Mr. Ben Davies, who halts here for a day or two before taking up his march through Canada with Sir Alexander Mackenzie's British music expedition. He is to sing for one an air from "Don Giovanni," but has not yet announced whether it is to be Don Ottavio's usual "Il mio tesoro," or his less known first act aria, "Dalla sua pace la mia pende." His other selection is what has been called the gem of Goring Thomas' opera, "Esmeralda." This work, which follows Victor Hugo's story in all but in saving and marrying the heroine to Capt. Phoebus, instead of having her burned at the stake, was produced in England by Carl Rosa on March 26, 1883, and Mr. H. W. Savage tried to make some headway with it in New York in November, 1900. For the original production Mr. Davies, who will now deliver Phoebus' song, "O vision entrancing," was the Gringoire.

The opening number will give the first hearing of a rather celebrated "King Lear" overture, by Henry Litloff, whose compositions are generally marked by originality, vigor, color and a certain roughish splendor, such as are displayed in the sometime popular violin concerto, which may be recalled by many readers.

The last place will be given to the concerto in D minor, which Gullmant, the princeps master of organ and organ composition, developed for orchestra and solo from an organ sonata of his own. The grave first movement depends from two themes, one minor and one major, announced by the pedals and then transferred to the manuals and the band for elaboration. The second is a pastoral, in A, cast in 12-8 time and including a chorale. The finale is rapid and brilliant. Mr. Wallace Goodrich will be the organist, and he can be depended upon for a fine rendering of his part. Mr. Archer introduced the concerto at the Worcester festival of 1882.

The middle number will be an orchestral romance, his 10th numbered work, by the Boston composer, Mr. F. S. Converse, who entitles it "Endymion's Narrative." What Endymion has to narrate, the students of mythology and fable may guess. That youth, being condemned to endless sleep, was nightly visited by Selene, as the story goes. Whether Endymion is to talk in his sleep, or whether he is to be allowed a period of wakefulness and remembrance, it remains for Mr. Converse to explain. Yet there was another Endymion, an astronomer, who perched upon a mountain in Greece and traced out the course of the moon; perhaps he may be the man.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 21st Symphony rehearsal and concert was somewhat unusual in character, for it presented three novelties and two soloists. Mr. Ben Davies, tenor, sang arias from "Don Giovanni" and "Esmeralda," and Mr. Wallace Goodrich played the organ part in Gullmant's D minor symphony, arranged for orchestra and organ. This selection, Litloff's "King Lear" overture, and "Endymion's Narrative," a romance for orchestra by F. S. Converse, were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. F. S. Converse in his second romance based upon incidents in "Endymion" has again shown his ability to write descriptive music of a high order of merit, for he evidently understands the art of instrumentation in producing effects suggestive of the text and working up to a climax expressed in the so-called modern style of musical illustration. The different episodes of the Keats poem are handled in an able manner, the dramatic element is shown in well arranged fortissimo passages and the whole work is one which reflects credit upon the abilities of the young American composer. The work was received with great enthusiasm and Mr. Converse, who was in the audience, was warmly applauded as he rose to acknowledge the greetings.

The Gullmant symphony for organ and orchestra is a massive composition, with innumerable themes given alternately to the organ and associate instruments, the different voices of the organ frequently being echoed by corresponding parts of the band. The effect is peculiar, and the blending of the solo instrument with the orchestra was so skilfully accomplished by Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Gericke's forces that the result was harmonious and very pleasing to the ear. The contrasts were set forth admirably in the legato and more delicate parts of the work; but the heavier staccato passages on the organ were open to the usual criticism and sounded abrupt, as they generally do. Mr. Goodrich's performance was excellent in every way and the orchestra performed its part in a commendable manner.

The Litloff overture, "King Lear," based mainly upon two motifs typifying the characters of the old king and the gentle Cordelia, was adequately interpreted by the orchestra. Mr. Ben Davies sang his two solos with splendid verve and sympathetic execution, his clear, vibrant tenor voice being specially effective in the bravura passages of "O Vision Entrancing," the excerpt from the opera "Esmeralda" by Thomas.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 21st Symphony rehearsal and concert was somewhat unusual in character, for it presented three novelties and two soloists. Mr. Ben Davies, tenor, sang arias from "Don Giovanni" and "Esmeralda," and Mr. Wallace Goodrich played the organ part in Guilmant's D minor symphony, arranged for orchestra and organ. This selection, Litloff's "King Lear" overture, and "Endymion's Narrative," a romance for orchestra by F. S. Converse, were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. F. S. Converse in his second romance based upon incidents in "Endymion" has again shown his ability to write descriptive music of a high order of merit, for he evidently understands the art of instrumentation in producing effects suggestive of the text and working up to a climax expressed in the so-called modern style of musical illustration. The different episodes of the Keats poem are handled in an able manner, the dramatic element is shown in well arranged fortissimo passages and the whole work is one which reflects credit upon the abilities of the young American composer. The work was received with great enthusiasm and Mr. Converse, who was in the audience, was warmly applauded as he rose to acknowledge the greetings.

The Guilmant symphony for organ and orchestra is a massive composition, with innumerable themes given alternately to the organ and associate instruments, the different voices of the organ frequently being echoed by corresponding parts of the band. The effect is peculiar, and the blending of the solo instrument with the orchestra was so skilfully accomplished by Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Gericke's forces that the result was harmonious and very pleasing to the ear. The contrasts were set forth admirably in the legato and more delicate parts of the work; but the heavier staccato passages on the organ were open to the usual criticism and sounded abrupt, as they generally do. Mr. Goodrich's performance was excellent in every way and the orchestra performed its part in a commendable manner.

The Litloff overture, "King Lear," based mainly upon two motifs typifying the characters of the old king and the gentle Cordelia, was adequately interpreted by the orchestra. Mr. Ben Davies sang his two solos with splendid verve and sympathetic execution, his clear, vibrant tenor voice being specially effective in the bravura passages of "O Vision Entrancing," the excerpt from the opera "Esmeralda" by Thomas.

This week's program will have Mr. Heinrich Gebhard as soloist in the Richard Strauss "burleske" in D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. The orchestral numbers will include the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck; "A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia," Borodin, and Walter Rabi's D minor symphony.

This reminds us that Miss Ada Crossley, who will sing at the Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert a week from Sunday, comes from Australia, and not long ago she declared that everybody sings in Australia, "from the bushman, as he rides through the great forest, to the boy on the 'milk run.'"

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, "King Lear".....Litloff
(First time.)
Aria, "Don Juan".....Mozart
Mr. Ben Davies.
Romance for Full Orchestra, "Endymion's Narrative," Op. 10.....F. S. Converse
(First time.)
Aria, "O Vision Entrancing," from Esmeralda.....A. Goring Thomas
Mr. Ben Davies.
Symphony No. 1, in D minor, with Organ.....Guilmant
(First time at these concerts.)
Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

Revenos a nos moutons"; that is, let us get back from highly-flavored opera to our normal diet. The concert of Saturday was interesting in every number, was well-contrasted and exceedingly well performed. The Litloff overture to "King Lear" was, however, scarcely doing justice to the memory of that composer, for it is not as strong as the overture to "Robespierre," on which his latter-day reputation rests. Beside the Berlioz gusts of passion in his overture to "King Lear," the strutting of the pompous, military gentleman here portrayed became rather ludicrous. The loss of Cordelia was not made more intense than the loss of a collar-button. It was pleasant music, but it was not the Shakespearian hero. To set it so formally seemed like squirting rose-water from a silver syringe at a raging conflagration.

Mr. Ben Davies was in excellent voice, but he sang "Il Mio Tesoro" rather as a tenor robusto than as a tenor di grazia; he made the delicate song far too forcible; he made Don Ottavio into a sort of Othello. But in the second number of his solos he was on his native heath.

About Ben Davies, may his tribe increase, Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace!

The dream was rather too sweet if anything, and "Oh, Vision Entrancing" was scarcely symphonic in its style. It smelt of the footlights, and after the final high note one might have expected the Queen of the Fairies to enter, with the entire Corps de Ballet in short skirts. Mr. Davies was heartily applauded, however, and his vocal work deserved the tribute.

Mr. Converse's new work made a decided success. This composition is a great advance over the picture of Pan, which the composer gave us recently. There are moments of ineffable beauty in "Endymion's Narrative," and there is general coherency also—a thing to be devoutly grateful for in these spasmodic days. Mr. Converse does not disdain melody either, and the march theme near the end of the work was a union of popular and classical that we seldom find. Of course it is impossible to give such a subject in modern style without trenching on Wagner's "Waldesweben," but the reminiscences were rather in style than in subject matter. Mr. Converse's mastery of the great orchestra of the present was evident from first to last, and sylvan beauty and daintiness were also abundantly in evidence. The work is representative of the best direction of modern music, and the composer no more endeavored to set our teeth on edge than Keats himself would have done. At the close of the composition Mr. Converse was twice called to the stage with heartiest applause.

Guilmant's symphony is an organ concerto, and one of the most practical and effective in existence. It is a very difficult task to combine the two great forces here used, and the best way seems to be to treat them as one might treat a double chorus in some vast vocal work, to use the organ and orchestra antiphonally, to have responses from one to the other.

We recall the last performance of this work in Boston. Music Hall organ had been sold as a broken-down and impracticable instrument, but it was determined to give Boston one last opportunity to hear its voice. Frederic Archer was called from New York and played this work with orchestra, when it was seen that there were wonderful beauties in the instrument, that there were stops there that could probably never be replaced in any new organ. Soon after that Mr. Gericke came to Boston and was greatly disappointed to find the great organ gone and a puny box of pipes hung, like Mahomet's coffin, between heaven and earth, in the hall. He had intended many combinations of organ and orchestra, all of which were, of course, rendered hopeless. It is only now, after the lapse of many years, that the great combination can be adequately heard, and last night Boston seemed to revel in the unusual scoring.

The first two movements of the symphony are the most popular, the last has the highest artistic worth. It must be confessed that there are some moments of mere prettiness in the first movement, but one can everywhere admire the tact, the grace, with which this organist-composer has built his work. The second movement strikes a happy medium between the classical and popular. It has sufficiently contrapuntal treatment to give it dignity, yet its canonic work is so direct and its pastoral melody is so pleasing that the non-musician would scarcely suspect that the classical element was at all present.

The finale is brilliant after the toccata manner, full of dashing manual work and with a sufficiency of pedalling also. Here the virtuoso has his opportunity for display, and right well did Mr. Goodrich employ it. His playing is to be enthusiastically commended.

The figure tratement of the finale is carried on quite consistently and logically to the coda which forms a majestic culmination. The skill in working up climaxes is one of the points in which one must praise Guilmant cordially. Perhaps a trifle of the French confectionery could have been spared from the composition, but as a whole it was unstrained, skilfully interwoven and enjoyable in a high degree.

Spite of the fact that the symphony-concerto came at the end of the concert, the audience stayed to recall Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Gericke a couple of times, instead of immediately rushing for the corridors—sufficient evidence, surely, that the work, its conductor and its soloist were fully appreciated.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first symphony concert was given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Henry Litloff: Overture to "Le Roi Léar."
(First time in Boston.)
Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart: Aria, "Il mio tesoro," from "Don Giovanni."
Frederick S. Converse: "Endymion's Narrative," Romance for Orchestra, opus 10.
(First time.)
Arthur Goring Thomas: Air, "O vision entrancing," from "Esmeralda."
Alexandre Guilmant: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, for Organ and Orchestra, opus 42.
(First time at these concerts.)
Mr. Ben Davies was the singer, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich the organist.

The programme book says that Litloff's opera of "Le Roi Léar" was finished, "according to some," in 1890; as composers generally write the overture to an opera last, this would probably be about the date of the composition of the overture played at this concert. It is rather interesting to settle the date approximately, for the work is decidedly superior to the composer's "Robespierre," in style and contents. The "Robespierre" overture shows strongly the influence of Meyerbeer; it might be called a bastard younger brother of that master's "Struensee." "Le Roi Léar" shows more of the modern romantic, Berlioz-and-Wagner, influence, with now and then a reminiscence of Beethoven. Litloff was not a little influenced by Beethoven; in his "National-Hollandais" concerto-symphony the slow movement contains some striking developments on a modulation of which Beethoven was especially fond in his earlier rather characteristic of him. Upon the whole, it is not impossible that Liszt may have been one of the post-Beethovenian composers Mendelssohn had in mind, when he wrote to Moscheles: "They clear their throats as he did, and cough his cough; but that is as far as they get!" If the "Rol L  ar" overture had been written earlier, it would sufficiently explain Liszt's flattering estimate of Liszt's talent as a composer; such workmanlike handling of "Zukunft" ideas—the composer gives himself away when he makes a characteristic harmonic progression from "Lohengrin" a prominent feature of his conclusion-theme—could hardly fail to call forth praise from the Weimar master. But, if the work was not written until 1890, its style is to be recognized as retrospective, rather than progressive. It is, however, by far the finest thing of Liszt's I have yet heard.

At last Mr. Converse has been and gone and done it! Heretofore he has given great promise; but I mistake much if he has not now given something better. To be sure, his "Festival of Pan" was something brilliant in the way of actual achievement; only the instrumentation seemed a failure, and gave an inevitable impression that the composer had miscalculated the general balance of his orchestra; the several instrumental groups tended to cancel, rather than reinforce, one another. But here in "Endymion's Narrative" the instrumentation is not only masterly, but now and then quite new. I have not the presumption to assert that I understand everything in this last orchestral romance of Mr. Converse's after but a single hearing. If I did, it would be presumptive evidence against the work's being worth much. Only the original is really worth while in Music, and the original is the hardest of all to understand at a glance. Show me a work that shall take me captive at the first rush, and I will show you one destined to die in ten years. Clearness is a quality, both in musical and poetic composition, about which altogether too much fuss has been made. The greatest poets and the greatest composers are just those who are the least clear—at first. But, like fine wine, they throw down a sediment after a while, and become as many-hued jewels, if never as crystal. But what unclearness I still may find in Mr. Converse's "Endymion," it does not make the impression of mere muddiness; it betokens more complexity of thought than it does impotence of expression. I look back over my life's musical experience, and I find that nearly all the really great music I know sounded pretty much like that at first. It took me a good many years to see daylight in Beethoven's eighth symphony; at first it sounded half incomprehensible, half ugly. What I do catch in this last work of Mr. Converse's is great poetic imaginativeness, melodic invention, strong harmony, and a general at-homeness in the chosen atmosphere; Mr. Converse walks this musico-poetic domain with conquering-hero step. He will be wanting to annex Newton by this new work is strong and powerful almost in proportion to its lack of perfect definition. Neither does it seem to me particularly rash to own that I have no fear of greater familiarity with the composition breeding contempt; I cannot but feel it will grow stronger and more beautiful in my ears, the more sharply I am able to bring it to a focus. I take off my hat.

As for Gullmant's orchestro-organic symphony, it soon becomes evident to the attentive listener that the composer handles half-archaic forms and the semi-archaic style with immense skill, also with sympathy and no little sentiment. One feels that, like most organists who have passed the age of forty-five, Mr. Gullmant has drunk the rum of organ so long that he looks with reverence upon anything with a crank to it. And I, for one, feel that no one but an impenitent organist can look upon this combination of organ with orchestra as anything but unnatural and repulsive. Curious that organists do not so look upon it; for it shows forth all the inherent and unlovely shortcomings of their instrument in the most shameful light. But, after all, this is not the point I most wish to emphasize at present. No one, least of all a critic, need feel himself called upon to say anything whatever about this work of Gullmant's, for it was presented in surroundings that would have killed it outright, had it been twenty times by Gullmant. (By the way, this sentence is not aimed at Mr. Wallace Goodrich, for he played his part in the business admirably.) To put it at the end of such a programme was nothing short of symphonicide. Just consider the conditions, a minute.

We had had two new compositions already; an overture and a long and attention-taxing orchestral romance. After such a drain upon the listening faculty, only a musical Hercules could be fit for anything more serious than the overture to "Oberon;" to bring on at such a juncture a long contrapuntal composition, in the most ungratifying forms, a composition that shines more by its musicianship than by its charm, is like asking people to listen to a sermon, or a lecture on international law, immediately after a melodrama. When a certain self-centred revivalist, happening to find himself by mistake at an evening party just as the rush for the supper-table was beginning, suddenly cried out "Let us pray!" he was incontinently and quite properly hushed up by less insane guests. It would have served the Gullmant symphony right, last Saturday evening. If the audience had got up like one man and left the hall with the first measure. If you ask me exactly in what conditions this composition would be in place, I must answer that that is none of my business; I only know that it is vastly out of place at the end of a symphony concert. I have heard people who pretended to know say that some music sounds better in church than elsewhere; I personally have never heard any that did, but am willing to believe experts. Might it not be worth while to try this symphony in church? That is the place where organs most do congregate.

Mr. Ben Davies was not at his happiest in Mozart's "Il mio tesoro;" but he recouped himself well in Goring Thomas's air, singing with great effect. He was enthusiastically applauded.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| GLUCK,           | OVERTURE to "Iphigenia in Aulis."   |
| RICHARD STRAUSS, | BURLESKE in D minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.(First time.)   |
| BORODIN,         | ORCHESTRAL SKETCH, On the Steppes of Central Asia. op. 7.   |
| RAFF,            | SYMPHONY No. 5, in E major. "Lenore," op. 117.PART I. HAPPINESS IN LOVE. I. Allegro.II. Andante quasi; larghetto.PART II. PARTING. III. March-Tempo: Agitato.PART III. REUNITING IN DEATH. (Introduction and Ballad, after G. B  rger's "Lenore.")IV. Allegro: L'istesso tempo. |

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

and middle periods, and might be called rather characteristic of him. Upon the whole, it is not impossible that Liszt may have been one of the post-Beethovenian composers Mendelssohn had in mind, when he wrote to Moscheles: "They clear their throats as he did, and cough his cough; but that is as far as they get!" If the "Rol Léar" overture had been written earlier, it would sufficiently explain Liszt's flattering estimate of Liszt's talent as a composer; such workmanlike handling of "Zukunft" ideas—the composer gives himself away when he makes a characteristic harmonic progression from "Lohengrin" a prominent feature of his conclusion-theme—could hardly fail to call forth praise from the Weimar master. But, if the work was not written until 1890, its style is to be recognized as retrospective, rather than progressive. It is, however, by far the finest thing of Liszt's I have yet heard.

At last Mr. Converse has been and gone and done it! Heretofore he has given great promise; but I mistake much if he has not now given something better. To be sure, his "Festival of Pan" was something brilliant in the way of actual achievement; only the instrumentation seemed a failure, and gave an inevitable impression that the composer had miscalculated the general balance of his orchestra; the several instrumental groups tended to cancel, rather than reinforce, one another. But here in "Endymion's Narrative" the instrumentation is not only masterly, but now and then quite new. I have not the presumption to assert that I understand everything in this last orchestral romance of Mr. Converse's after but a single hearing. If I did, it would be presumptive evidence against the work's being worth much. Only the original is really worth while in music, and the original is the hardest of all to understand at a glance. Show me a work that shall take me captive at the first rush, and I will show you one destined to die in ten years. Clearness is a quality, both in musical and poetic composition, about which altogether too much fuss has been made. The greatest poets and the greatest composers are just those who are the least clear—at first. But, like fine wine, they throw down a sediment after a while, and become as many-hued jewels, if never as crystal. But what unclearness I still may find in Mr. Converse's "Endymion," it does not make the impression of mere muddiness; it betokens more complexity of thought than it does impotence of expression. I look back over my life's musical experience, and I find that nearly all the really great music I know sounded pretty much like that at first. It took me a good many years to see daylight in Beethoven's eighth symphony; at first it sounded half incomprehensible, half ugly. What I do catch in this last work of Mr. Converse's is great poetic imaginativeness, melodic invention, strong harmony, and a general at-homeness in the chosen atmosphere; Mr. Converse walks this musico-poetic domain with conquering-hero step. Boston will be wanting to annex Newton yet! Indeed, the impression made upon me by this new work is strong and powerful almost in proportion to its lack of perfect definition. Neither does it seem to me particularly rash to own that I have no fear of greater familiarity with the composition breeding contempt; I cannot but feel it will grow stronger and more beautiful in my ears, the more sharply I am able to bring it to a focus. I take off my hat.

As for Gullmant's orchestro-organle symphony, it soon becomes evident to the attentive listener that the composer handles half-archaic forms and the semi-archaic style with immense skill, also with sympathy and no little sentiment. One feels that, like most organists who have passed the age of forty-five, Mr. Gullmant has drunk the rum of organ so long that he looks with reverence upon anything with a crank to it. And I, for one, feel that no one but an impenitent organist can look upon this combination of organ with orchestra as anything but unnatural and repulsive. Curious that organists do not so look upon it; for it shows forth all the inherent and unlovely shortcomings of their instrument in the most shameful light. But, after all, this is not the point I most wish to emphasize at present. No one, least of all a critic, need feel himself called upon to say anything whatever about this work of Gullmant's, for it was presented in surroundings that would have killed it outright, had it been twenty times by Gullmant. (By the way, this sentence is not aimed at Mr. Wallace Goodrich, for he played his part in the business admirably.) To put it at the end of such a programme was nothing short of symphonicide. Just consider the conditions, a minute.

We had had two new compositions already; an overture and a long and attention-taxing orchestral romance. After such a drain upon the listening faculty, only a musical Hercules could be fit for anything more serious than the overture to "Oberon;" to bring on at such a juncture a long contrapuntal composition, in the most ungratulating forms, a composition that shines more by its musicianship than by its charm, is like asking people to listen to a sermon, or a lecture on international law, immediately after a melodrama. When a certain self-centred revivalist, happening to find himself by mistake at an evening party just as the rush for the supper-table was beginning, suddenly cried out "Let us pray!" he was incontinently and quite properly hushed up by less insane guests. It would have served the Gullmant symphony right, last Saturday evening, if the audience had got up like one man and left the hall with the first measure. If you ask me exactly in what conditions this composition would be in place, I must answer that that is none of my business; I only know that it is vastly out of place at the end of a symphony concert. I have heard people who pretended to know say that some music sounds better in church than elsewhere; I personally have never heard any that did, but am willing to believe experts. Might it not be worth while to try this symphony in church? That is the place where organs most do congregate.

Mr. Ben Davies was not at his happiest in Mozart's "Il mio tesoro;" but he recouped himself well in Goring Thomas's air, singing with great effect. He was enthusiastically applauded.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, AT 8. P.M.

Programme.

- |                  |  |
|------------------|--|
| GLUCK,           | OVERTURE to "Iphigenia in Aulis."  |
| RICHARD STRAUSS, | BURLESKE in D minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.(First time.)                  |
| BORODIN,         | ORCHESTRAL SKETCH, On the Steppes of Central Asia. op. 7.                            |
| RAFF,            | SYMPHONY No. 5, in E major. "Lenore," op. 117.                                       |
|                  | PART I. HAPPINESS IN LOVE. I. Allegro.   |
|                  | II. Andante quasi; larghetto.  |
|                  | PART II. PARTING. III. March-Tempo: Agitato.   |
|                  | PART III. REUNITING IN DEATH. (Introduction and Ballad, after G. Bürger's "Lenore.") |
|                  | IV. Allegro: L'istesso tempo.  |

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF YESTERDAY EVENING

Richard Strauss's "Burleske" as Played by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

MR. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH

A Piano Recital Characterized by Marked Poetic Sentiment as Well as Brilliance.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the twenty-second
Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....
Gluck-Wagner
Burleske for piano and orchestra (for
first time) .....

On the Russian Steppes.....R. Strauss
Symphony, "Lenore".....Raff

The noblest music last evening was that which came first. It was nearly 130 years ago that the overture of "Iphigenia" was first heard in Paris, and this overture is today Greek tragedy in music. There is the direct, poignant appeal; there is the suggestion of brooding fate; there is the exquisitely simple beauty; there is classic and tragic serenity instead of melodramatic throe or convulsion. This is music of which one never tires, and mark the genius that used so powerfully the simplest means.

Strauss's Burleske.

This piece for piano and orchestra was played here last night for the first time, but it is not therefore a composition of recent date. It was written about 1885 when the composer was strongly influenced by Brahms—and it was played by d'Albert, to whom it is dedicated, as far back as 1890. But why "Burleske?" I confess I find little significance in the title. It surely is not a burlesque of Brahms's style, although the music is at times essentially Brahmsian. I have seen English burlesques, played by British blondes, which were not unlike Strauss's piece in stretches of dulness. For this "Bur-leske" as a whole is long-winded and generally inclined toward dulness. Here and there are grotesque effects or bits of orchestral humor; here and there are pleasing examples of melodic thought; but the piece is purposeless, neither wildly extravagant, neither consistently serious. It is said to be of extreme difficulty, indeed Mr. Lessmann says he knows of no concerto to compare with it in this respect. But what is difficult to one pianist may not be so extremely hard to another; for one hand differeth from another hand in glory. Take for instance Balakireff's

"Islamey." There are excellent pianists who dare not attempt to play it in public; yet others of less technical proficiency have triumphed with it. Mr.
Gebhard gave a clear idea of the piano part of the "Burleske," but he did not by any surpassing brilliance or pronounced individuality raise the work high above monotony; yet he was applauded heartily by the audience and recalled more than once or twice.

Raff and Borodin.

Borodin's little orchestral sketch has been played here twice before, and it is still effective, though to Western ears the Oriental song and the Russian are both exotic and not so unlike in character as to be strongly contrasted.
It is a mood picture as well as a tone-poem, and it will please hearers of imagination for some years to come.
Portions of Raff's "Lenore" have grown old, very old. This is especially true of the Andante, which now may be classed with once popular piano music:
"Fallen Leaves," "Moonlight on the Hudson," etc. Yet there is in this symphony plenty of evidence in favor of Raff's great talent and his unlimited technical skill.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Heinrich Gebhard Soloist
at the Symphony.

Concerts by Creatore, Felix Fox,
Gabrilowitsch and Others.

Notes of Current and Coming Musical Attractions.

April fickleness outside was no damp-ener to musical ardor and enthusiasm within doors at last week's Symphony concerts, when one of Mr Gericke's most son was presented. Chief attraction was centered in the brilliant and decidedly unusual "Burleske" for orchestra and pianoforte, which Richard Strauss dedicated to Eugene d'Albert. Nothing similar to this pyrotechnically inclined composition has been recorded in recent musical annals here—and now and then music lovers would betray a mixture of amusement and amazement, though always tinged with pleasure, in their appreciation of this modern classic, whose composer must have been in a vivacious mood in stringing together these harmonic pearls.

The "Burleske" was given here for the first time. It is one of the least known of Strauss' compositions, and is one of the most difficult concertos written, so far as its piano part is concerned. The opening movement gives a prominent part to the kettledrums. A curious phrase by the bassoons in answer to the introduction of the main theme by the piano indicates the grotesque motive of the composer. Following this is an imitation of pizzicato by the piano, taken up by the violins and from them passed on to the other strings successively. The refrain of the horns in the midst bears a strong resemblance to the symphony of "Till Eulenspiegel." The extremely difficult passages of parallel octaves and fifths were taken by Mr Gebhard as if they were matters of no consequence.

The orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," by Borodin, was less appreciated than any number by the orchestra. It is one of those weird oriental compositions, which is most admired for the ingenious weaving together of different and repellant themes. In the opening measures there is heard a Russian song, which is interrupted by the somber tones of the English sounding and oriental song. These two songs form the main themes for the entire piece.

The last half of the program was made up of the four movements of Raff's symphony No. 5, in E major, based on the German poem of Leonore. The third movement, in march time, was the best part of the symphony, and called for a very fine dialogue between the violins and the cellos. The main theme is repeated in the beginning of the fourth movement in a minor key. The final theme is too ghostly to be enjoyable.

The opening number, Gluck's overture to the opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," was the best received number on the program, judging by the applause. The overture was written to join the opening measures of the opera without break and comes to an abrupt close when played by itself. As given by the symphony orchestra, the ending was that arranged by Wagner, when he was the conductor at Dresden.

At the close of Heinrich Gebhard's performance he was recalled four times to acknowledge the appreciation of an audience which included many personal friends.

This week's program will introduce Mr Adolf Bak, violinist, in the Wieniawski "Faust" fantasia. The other numbers will be the Beethoven symphony in C major; Smetana's symphonic "Richard III," first time here, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" over-

of European press
Harold Bauer, the
a third piano recital, that of the preceding eat, and the enthusiasm
ances of the Brahms-sonata and the F minor France, Paris.

most. That is the rea-ursday. I admired the rmed the Chopin numrformed in a remarkable te success.—Le Journal,

recital given by Harold popular pianist. The pro-ned pieces which allowed ist to be appreciated by his manipulation of the sages in Chopin's works

these works his mastery at composer, and a thorcontained in his works.
ade, Aria and Finale, and as listened to with intent
all bounds in their enthu-sist, was given as the last (European Edition).

nd admired by our public,
er the Tschaikowsky Consuccess was a veritable tri-ix.

st night.—Le Nouvelliste.

Tschaikowsky Concerto, and blic and orchestra.—Gazette

Bauer than we have already
"Etudes Symphoniques," and was followed by storms of extraordinary execution and ment.—Las Noticias.

terday with delight by amaosen program, the public had reat talent of this eminent most—his authority, his virtun of the great masers? Bach, were played by him last night
e object of numerous ovations is habitual success. It was his hestra continue its founding of our ever materializes,

the splendid ex-
people of Boston.
ve, the following ymphony Orches-

..Franz Kneisel
flute, oboe

ederic Lamond
Mr. van Rooy

mann-Heink

lame Lunn

me Lunn

n-Heink

owska roeder

ugno

- R. STRAUSS—
"Death and Apotheosis."
"Don Juan."
- TANIEFF—
"L'Orestie," overture
- TSCHAIKOWSKY—
Suite No. 3.
- WAGNER—
Introduction and "Love Death," from "Tristan."
"Wotan's Farewell".....Mr. van Rooy
A Siegfried idyll.

BC

TRA.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Interesting and Important Novelties—Mr. Gebhard, Solo Pianist, to Appear at This Week's Concerts.

Mr. Gericke has been keeping some of his novelties, both promised and un-announced, in reserve, and this week he will present two of them. The symphony, which comes last on the programme, of course, comes first in consideration as being the larger and more serious work. It is written in D minor, with the customary excursions into F major and other relative keys, and its author is Walther Rabl, who was born at Vienna, Nov. 30, 1873. His early musical education was directed by J. F. Hummel, at Salzburg; thence he passed to that of Nawzath, at Vienna, and finally went to Adler, at Prague, where, in 1897, he was made a Ph. D., taking up in 1898 the profession of music and further interest- ing himself in the preparation of the critically annotated Dresden programme books.

This symphony, which is his 10th num-bered work, looks attractive and fresh in the score, but seems to proceed with- in normal lines of development and in-strumentation, its only unusual request seeming to be one for two harps, which will probably be denied him, although he has laid out rather elaborate duties for both. According to his scheme, the first movement, which is set in the nom-inal key, is broad, heavy and quite sus- tained; the main theme being presented by the brass choir. The second passes into F major, and is marked "not quite so slow." The third is quick and light, as suits its 6-8 measure; is pointed with the triangle here and there, and includes an agreeable and favorable thread of violin solo. The fourth begins very slowly, but soon changes to a swift and emphatic march tempo, which ought to bring an animating conclusion, for it seems vigorously and inventively worked out.

In the other novelty, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will appear as soloist, the work being the "Burleske" for pianoforte and orchestra, which Richard Strauss dedi- cated to Eugen d'Albert. The London Daily News recently said in a critical article upon Strauss and Wagner, "A sar- donic humor is one of Strauss' weapons." A dry, sarcastic, sardonic, allusive humor is ever hard to understand, its seeming seriousness being too often taken liter- ally. For such a reason Strauss' musi- cal extravaganzas about the pranks of Till Owlglass was a puzzler, and many may not know just what to make of this lively affair, which is rather a sort of a skit than a systematic composition. Its general mood is vivacious, gay and sparkling, and its orchestration is mod- erate. But every now and then, with- out warning, it is found to drop into tranquillity or to be told to be expres- sive for a few bars; then it rattles on again, checking itself once to be pom- pous for a little while, then marking a couple of pages as "ferocious," tossing in a short cadenza, and ending oddly with a few dry chords and snappy phrases, to be separated by great pauses. In a way it suggests Mr. Gross- smith's trick of taking a little theme and showing what A, B, or C might have done with it.

The other things are standard. Gluck's overture expressive of the chief phases of Racine's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Borodin's picturesque "Steppe Sketch from Central Asia," in which there are heard sounding across the almost illimitable waste the hoof beats and the wild songs of the home-coming caravan.

Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, the sec-ond concert master of the Boston Sym-phony Orchestra, has resigned his posi- tion and will henceforth devote himself to composition and teaching. Fortu- nately for Boston he will continue to make this city his home. Mr. Loeffler ended last night his twenty-first year as a most valuable member of the fa- mous organization. As virtuoso violin- ist, as concert master and as composer he has played an important part in the history of the orchestra, and his de- parture is deeply regretted by the of- ficers, the members and the public at large. Yet it is easy to see why he took this step. A composer of singularly original imagination, fastidious taste, and rare orchestral technic, he will now have more time for thought and medi- tation; he will be able to bring a fresher mind to his work; and as a teacher his influence will still be widely felt; it will make for present musical righteousness, and, with his composi- tions, long preserve his name.

steinway

novel programs of the current season was presented. Chief attraction was centered in the brilliant and decidedly unusual "Burleske" for orchestra and pianoforte, which Richard Strauss dedicated to Eugene d'Albert. Nothing similar to this pyrotechnically inclined composition has been recorded in recent musical annals here—and now and then music lovers would betray a mixture of amusement and amazement, though always tinged with pleasure, in their appreciation of this modern classic, whose composer must have been in a vivacious mood in stringing together these harmonic pearls.

The "Burleske" was given here for the first time. It is one of the least known of Strauss' compositions, and is one of the most difficult concertos written, so far as its piano part is concerned. The opening movement gives a prominent part to the kettledrums. A curious phrase by the bassoons in answer to the introduction of the main theme by the piano indicates the grotesque motive of the composer. Following this is an imitation of pizzicato by the piano, taken up by the violins and from them passed on to the other strings successively. The refrain of the horns in the midst bears a strong resemblance to the symphony of "Till Eugenspiegel." The extremely difficult passages of parallel octaves and fifths were taken by Mr Gebhard as if they were matters of no consequence.

The orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," by Borodin, was less appreciated than any number by the orchestra. It is one of those weird oriental compositions, which is most admired for the ingenious weaving together of different and repellant themes. In the opening measures there is heard a Russian song, which is interrupted by the somber tones of the English sounding and oriental song. These two songs form the main themes for the entire piece.

The last half of the program was made up of the four movements of Raff's symphony No. 5, in E major, based on the German poem of Leonore. The third movement, in march time, was the best part of the symphony, and called for a very fine dialogue between the violins and the cellos. The main theme is repeated in the beginning of the fourth movement in a minor key. The final theme is too ghostly to be enjoyable.

The opening number, Gluck's overture to the opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," was the best received number on the program, judging by the applause. The overture was written to join the opening measures of the opera without break and comes to an abrupt close when played by itself. As given by the symphony orchestra, the ending was that arranged by Wagner, when he was the conductor at Dresden.

At the close of Heinrich Gebhard's performance he was recalled four times to acknowledge the appreciation of an audience which included many personal friends.

This week's program will introduce Mr Adolf Bak, violinist, in the Wienlawski "Faust" fantasia. The other numbers will be the Beethoven symphony in C major; Smetana's symphonic "Richard III," first time here, and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" over-of European press hestra continue the founding of our ever materializes, the splendid people of Boston ve, the following symphony Orchestra.

most. That is the re... Franz Kneisel flute, oboe recital given by Harold popular pianist. The proposed pieces which allowed Mr. van Rooy his manipulation of the sages in Chopin's works these works his mastery at composer, and a thor- contained in his works. ade, Aria and Finale, and as listened to with intent all bounds in their enthusiasm, was given as the last (European Edition).

nd admired by our public, er the Tschaiowsky Con- access was a veritable tri- ix.

at night.—Le Nouvelliste. Tschaiowsky Concerto, and blic and orchestra.—Gazette me L

Bauer than we have already "Etudes Symphoniques," and was followed by storms of n-Hen extraordinary execution and ment.—Las Noticias.

terday with delight by ama- osen program, the public had reat talent of this eminent nost—his authority, his virtu- roed n of the great masers? Bach, were played by him last night e object of numerous ovations is habitual success. It was his

R. STRAUSS—
"Death and Apotheosis."
"Don Juan."

TANIEFF—
"L'Orestie," overture

TSCHAIKOWSKY—
Suite No. 3.

WAGNER—
Introduction and "Love Death," from "Tristan."
"Wotan's Farewell".....Mr. van Rooy
A Siegfried idyll.

BC

TRA.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Interesting and Important Novelties—Mr. Gebhard, Solo Pianist, to Appear at This Week's Concerts.

Mr. Gericke has been keeping some of his novelties, both promised and un-announced, in reserve, and this week he will present two of them. The symphony, which comes last on the programme, of course, comes first in consideration as being the larger and more serious work. It is written in D minor, with the customary excursions into F major and other relative keys, and its author is Walther Rabl, who was born at Vienna, Nov. 30, 1873. His early musical education was directed by J. F. Hummel, at Salzburg; thence he passed to that of Nawzatil, at Vienna, and finally went to Adler, at Prague, where, in 1897, he was made a Ph. D., taking up in 1898 the profession of music and further interesting himself in the preparation of the critically annotated Dresden programme books.

This symphony, which is his 10th numbered work, looks attractive and fresh in the score, but seems to proceed with normal lines of development and instrumentation, its only unusual request seeming to be one for two harps, which will probably be denied him, although he has laid out rather elaborate duties for both. According to his scheme, the first movement, which is set in the nominal key, is broad, heavy and quite sustained, the main theme being presented by the brass choir. The second passes into F major, and is marked "not quite so slow." The third is quick and light, as suits its 6-8 measure; is pointed with the triangle here and there, and includes an agreeable and favorable thread of violin solo. The fourth begins very slowly, but soon changes to a swift and emphatic march tempo, which ought to bring an animating conclusion, for it seems vigorously and inventively worked out.

In the other novelty, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will appear as soloist, the work being the "Burleske" for pianoforte and orchestra, which Richard Strauss dedicated to Eugen d'Albert. The London Daily News recently said in a critical article upon Strauss and Wagner, "A sardonic humor is one of Strauss' weapons." A dry, sarcastic, sardonic, allusive humor is ever hard to understand, its seeming seriousness being too often taken literally. For such a reason Strauss' musical extravaganzas about the pranks of Till Owlglass was a puzzler, and many may not know just what to make of this lively affair, which is rather a sort of a skit than a systematic composition. Its general mood is vivacious, gay and sparkling, and its orchestration is moderate. But every now and then, without warning, it is found to drop into tranquillity or to be told to be expressive for a few bars; then it rattles on again, checking itself once to be pompous for a little while, then marking a couple of pages as "ferocious," tossing in a short cadenza, and ending oddly with a few dry chords and snappy phrases, to be separated by great pauses. In a way it suggests Mr. Grossmith's trick of taking a little theme and showing what A, B, or C might have done with it.

The other things are standard. Gluck's overture expressive of the chief phases of Racine's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Borodin's picturesque "Steppe Sketch from Central Asia," in which there are heard sounding across the almost illimitable waste the hoof beats and the wild songs of the home-coming caravan.

Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his position and will henceforth devote himself to composition and teaching. Fortunately for Boston he will continue to make this city his home. Mr. Loeffler ended last night his twenty-first year as a most valuable member of the famous organization. As virtuoso violinist, as concert master and as composer he has played an important part in the history of the orchestra, and his departure is deeply regretted by the officers, the members and the public at large. Yet it is easy to see why he took this step. A composer of singularly original imagination, fastidious taste, and rare orchestral technic, he will now have more time for thought and meditation; he will be able to bring a fresher mind to his work; and as a teacher his influence will still be widely felt; it will make for present musical righteousness, and, with his compositions, long preserve his name.

Stienway

The "Burleske" was given the first time. It is one of the known of Strauss' compositions, one of the most difficult concerning, so far as its piano part is concerned. The opening movement is a prominent part to the work. A curious phrase by the piano answer to the introduction theme by the piano in grotesque motive of the corollary, this is an imitation by the piano, taken up by and from them passed on to the strings successively. The horns in the midst bear resemblance to the symphony "Eugenspiegel." The extreme passages of parallel octave were taken by Mr Gebhard were matters of no consequence. The orchestral sketch, "On the Central Asia," by Borodine, appreciated than any number of the orchestra. It is one of those oriental compositions, which are admired for the ingenious variety of different and repellent. In the opening measures there is a Russian song, which is interspersed with the somber tones of the English and oriental song. These form the main themes for the piece.

The opening number, Gluck to the opera, "Iphigenia in the best received number gram, judging by the ap overture was written to jol ing measures of the opera w and comes to an abrupt played by itself. As given phony orchestra, the endir arranged by Wagner, when conductor at Dresden.

At the close of Heinrich's performance he was recalled to acknowledge the appreciation of the audience which included many friends.

This week's program will feature Mr. Adolf Bak, violinist, in a lawski "Faust" fantasia. The numbers will be the Beethoven in C major; Smetana's "Richard III," first Mendelssohn's "Ruy

Exclusive of the programs printed above, the following music was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter:

Concerto for violin.....Franz Kneisel Concerto No. 2, F major (for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet).

Symphony, "Eroica."

Symphony No. 5.

"Leonore" overture, No. 2.

Concerto for piano, E flat.....Frederic Lamond

"An die Hoffnung," song.....Mr. van Rooij

Symphony No. 1.

Symphony No. 3.

Roman Carneval, overture.

Air, "Achilleus".....Madame Schumann-Heink

"Water Carrier," overture.

Symphony No. 5.

Symphonic Variations.

"Sea Pictures," songs.....Madame Lunel

Excerpts, "Merlin."

Stanzas, "Sapho".....Madame Lund

Symphony No. 2

"Tasso," symphonic poem.

"The Three Gipsies," song...Mme. Schumann-Heink

Two Poems, for orchestra.

"The Betrothed of the Czar," overture.

Concerto for piano, No. 2.....Madame Szumowska

Concerto for 'cello, A minor.....A. Schroeder

"Omphale's Spinning Wheel," symphonic poem.

"Wanderer" Fantasia, for piano.....Mr. Pugno

Symphony No. 2.

"Genoveva," overture.

"Death and Apotheosis"

"Don Juan."

"L'Orestie," overture

Suite No. 3.

Introduction and "Love Death," from "Tristan."

"Wotan's Farewell".....Mr. van Rooy
A Siegfried idyll.

TRA

Two Interesting and Important Novelties—Mr. Gebhard, Solo Pianist, to Appear at This Week's Concerts.

Mr. Gericke has been keeping some of his novelties, both promised and unannounced, in reserve, and this week he will present two of them. The symphony, which comes last on the programme, of course, comes first in consideration as being the larger and more serious work. It is written in D minor, with the customary excursions into F major and other relative keys, and its author is Walthar Rabl, who was born at Vienna, Nov. 30, 1873. His early musical education was directed by J. F. Hummel, at Salzburg; thence he passed to that of Nawzail, at Vienna, and finally went to Adler, at Prague, where, in 1897, he was made a Ph. D., taking up in 1898 the profession of music and further interesting himself in the preparation of the critically annotated Dresden programme books.

This symphony, which is his 10th numbered work, looks attractive and fresh in the score, but seems to proceed within normal lines of development and instrumentation, its only unusual request seeming to be one for two harps, which will probably be denied him, although he has laid out rather elaborate duties for both. According to his scheme, the first movement, which is set in the nominal key, is broad, heavy and quite sustained, the main theme being presented by the brass choir. The second passes into F major, and is marked "not quite so slow." The third is quick and light, as suits its 6-8 measure; is pointed with the triangle here and there, and includes an agreeable and favorable thread of violin solo. The fourth begins very slowly, but soon changes to a swift and emphatic march tempo, which ought to bring an animating conclusion, for it seems vigorously and inventively worked out.

In the other novelty, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will appear as soloist, the work being the "Burleske" for piano-forte and orchestra, which Richard Strauss dedicated to Eugen d'Albert. The London Daily News recently said in a critical article upon Strauss and Wagner, "A sardonic humor is one of Strauss' weapons." A dry, sarcastic, sardonic, allusive humor is ever hard to understand, its seeming seriousness being too often taken literally. For such a reason Strauss' musical extravaganzas about the pranks of Till Owl-glass was a puzzler, and many may not know just what to make of this lively affair, which is rather a sort of a skit than a systematic composition. Its general mood is vivacious, gay and sparkling, and its orchestration is moderate. But every now and then, without warning, it is found to drop into tranquillity or to be told to be expressive for a few bars; then it rattles on again, checking itself once to be pompous for a little while, then marking a couple of pages as "ferocious," tossing in a short cadenza, and ending oddly with a few dry chords and snappy phrases, to be separated by great pauses. In a way it suggests Mr. Grossmith's trick of taking a little theme and showing what A, B, or C might have done with it.

The other things are standard. Gluck's overture expressive of the chief phases of Racine's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Borodin's picturesque "Steppe Sketch from Central Asia," in which there are heard sounding across the almost illimitable waste the hoof beats and the wild songs of the home-coming caravan.

Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his position and will henceforth devote himself to composition and teaching. Fortunately for Boston he will continue to make this city his home. Mr. Loeffler ended last night his twenty-first year as a most valuable member of the famous organization. As virtuoso violinist, as concert master and as composer he has played an important part in the history of the orchestra, and his departure is deeply regretted by the officers, the members and the public at large. Yet it is easy to see why he took this step. A composer of singularly original imagination, fastidious taste, and rare orchestral technic, he will now have more time for thought and meditation; he will be able to bring a fresher mind to his work; and as a teacher his influence will still be widely felt; it will make for present musical righteousness, and, with his compositions, long preserve his name.

STEINWAY

Miss Ada Crossley

Australian contralto, who will sing at the Symphony pension fund concert.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 26, 1903, at eight

SECOND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston
Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Assisted by Miss ADA CROSSLEY

PROGRAMME

- |                        |  |
|------------------------|--|
| ROSSINI . . . . .      | Overture, "William Tell"                 |
| BIZET . . . . .        | Suite, "Roma"                            |
| a. GIORVANI . . . . .  | Aria, "Caro mio ben"                     |
| b. E. GERMAN . . . . . | Song with Orchestra, "Love, the Pedlar"  |
| HANDEL . . . . .       | Largo for Violins, Four Harps, and Organ |

HARPISTS

Miss RAYMAH DOWSE	Mrs. HEINRICH SCHUECKER
Miss FANNY HAMILTON	Mr. HEINRICH SCHUECKER
Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH, Organist

- |                       |               |
|-----------------------|---------------|
| SAINT-SAENS . . . . . | Danse Macabre |
|-----------------------|---------------|

SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE

- |                              |                                |
|------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| a. MASSENET . . . . .        | "Les Larmes" (Werther)         |
| b. RICHARD STRAUSS . . . . . | "Allerseelen"                  |
| c. HAHN . . . . .            | "Baysage"                      |
| d. C. WILLEBY . . . . .      | "Four-leaf Clover"             |
| JOHANN STRAUSS . . . . .     | Waltz, "Wine, Woman, and Song" |

THE PIANOFORTE IS A STEINWAY.

Miss Ada Crossley

Australian contralto, who will sing at the Symphony pension fund concert.

231
SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 26, 1903, at eight

SECOND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Assisted by Miss ADA CROSSLEY

PROGRAMME

ROSSINI . . . . . Overture, "William Tell"

BIZET . . . . . Suite, "Roma"

a. GIORVANI . . . . . Aria, "Caro mio ben"

b. E. GERMAN . . . . . Song with Orchestra, "Love, the Pedlar"

HANDEL . . . . . Largo for Violins, Four Harps, and Organ

HARPISTS

Miss RAYMAH DOWSE

Mrs. HEINRICH SCHUECKER

Miss FANNY HAMILTON

Mr. HEINRICH SCHUECKER

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH, Organist

SAINT-SAENS . . . . . Danse Macabre

SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE

a. MASSENET . . . . . "Les Larmes" (Werther)

b. RICHARD STRAUSS . . . . . "Allerseelen"

c. HAHN . . . . . "Baysage"

d. C. WILLEBY . . . . . "Four-leaf Clover"

JOHANN STRAUSS . . . . . Waltz, "Wine, Woman, and Song"

THE PIANOFORTE IS A STEINWAY.

TONIGHT'S CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

An Appeal to Which Music-Loving Bostonians Should Respond.

To the Editor of the Boston Journal:
Please allow me to call the attention of your readers to the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place on Sunday night at Symphony Hall.

May I suggest to you that upon this pension fund resulting from these concerts depends much the future of the orchestra. Presently, and increasingly, the members of the orchestra will be unable to play as they are playing now and must therefore cease their work. The fingers of the violin players give out; the lips of the instrument players give out, and it is an impossibility to keep these men in first rate condition beyond a certain time in life. Of course I can't support them after they have stopped playing and meet the cost of the orchestra also, and, as you know, the orchestra can never be a profitable institution.

I beg leave to address these few words to your readers in order to stimulate the demand for tickets. It is late in the season and people have spent their money, yet a great many of them are fully aware how much is owed to the orchestra and its good work in past years, and quite as well aware of how much will be owed for future work. I wish very much to keep the orchestra at its present point of efficiency, and can only do it by renewals from time to time. A pension fund is a great necessity, which I have long contemplated and never attended to.

H. L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, April 22, 1903.

THE POPS.

On Monday evening, May 4, the eighteenth season of the "Pops" is at hand, with the usual eight weeks during May and June. It seems unnecessary to go into the details of these popular entertainments, every feature of which will be practically the same as last year, save the conductor. After five years of satisfactory and gratifying service by Messrs. Max Zach and Gustav Strube as joint conductors, the management has decided to make a change. Mr. T. Adamowski, who nine years ago in old Music Hall conducted during the most successful season ever known in the seventeen years of the Pops, has been selected to lead an orchestra of fifty players from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In connection with this change in the leadership, it may be of interest to recall the conductors from the beginning, seventeen years ago. They were as follows: 1885, Ad Neuendorff; 1886, John C. Mullaly; 1887, Wilhelm Rietzel and Ad Neuendorff; 1888, Franz Kneisel and Ad Neuendorff; 1889, Ad Neuendorff; 1890, no concerts; 1891, T. Adamowski and E. Gruenberg; 1892, T. Adamowski; 1893, T. Adamowski; 1894, T. Adamowski; 1895, A. de Novellis; 1896, Max Zach; 1897, Max Zach and Leo Schultz, and for the past five years, 1898-1902, Messrs. Max Zach and Gustav Strube. All the conductors, with the exception of Neuendorff and Novellis, were members of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Adamowski has been busy for the past month with the preparation of some unusually attractive programs, and his recognized artistic temperament is sure to make itself felt, both in their makeup and rendition. There will be the usual light refreshments and all the other essential features will again be maintained. Reserved seats, both at the tables on the floor and in the first balcony, will be for sale Monday morning, April 27, at Symphony Hall.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Symphony Superbly Plays a Popular Programme—Affair Given for Its Own Benefit.

Last night, in Symphony Hall, the Symphony orchestra gave the second concert for the benefit of its pension fund, arranging the promised programme thus:

Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite, "Roma".....Bizet
a. Aria, "Caro mio ben".....Giordani
b. Song with orchestra, "Love, the Pedlar".....E. German Largo for violins, four harps and organ.....Handel Harpists: Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mrs. Heinrich Schuecker, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.
Organist, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens
Songs with pianoforte:
a. "Les Larmes" (Werther).....Massenet
b. "Allerseelen".....Richard Strauss
c. "Paysage".....Hahn
d. "Four-leaf Clover".....C. Willeby
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Johann Strauss

This was a truly popular programme, affording the orchestra a perfect display of its virtuosity, from the picturesque elegance of the Rossini to the vertiginous velocity of the Saint-Saens, the concentrated tone volume of the Handel and the full color of the Bizet. It also gave cause and chance for an assemblage of wonders. Fancy a large Boston audience, mainly composed of pious and proper Symphony patrons, hearing approvingly and loudly applauding, upon a Sunday evening, too, a Strauss waltz, played by the Symphony orchestra and directed by Mr. Gerlicke! The whole performance was superb, and the qualities displayed were always apposite to the individual selections. The delicate "Tell" obligatos were delightfully played, and Mr. Kneisel made great effects with his lead in the Largo and with the weird solo in the "Danse Macabre," that clever ghost story which the fat boy in "Pickwick" would have been glad to have in prose form, it "makes your flesh creep" so pleasurably.

Of course the Largo is quite an "ad captandum" affair—almost, indeed, a bit of clap-trap as so rigged out. However, the audience would have it repeated; and, as a deduction from this, the band would do well, perhaps, to acquire a five-foot gong and produce the "Sun Hymn," from Mascagni's "Iris," at their next benefit.

As for the waltz (which came near being the "Blue Danube," as we hear,) it was not up to Adolph Neuendorff's standard. That portly, prosaic-looking conductor had a way of impressing on a measure which would take such a rubato, a hold—or, if one dared, he might honestly call it a hug—that gave a lingering, languorous sentimentality, such as no other leader, not even Strauss himself, has imparted. Mr. Gerlicke put brilliant verve, spring and swing into the music, however, and the men responded with a will.

Miss Ada Crossley, the Australian contralto, who made her debut, has a very beautiful and remarkable voice. It is of one true timbre throughout, without a single inconsistent, weak or mongrel tone in it. Her method is simple, generous and sincere, and the rich quality appeals, convinces, melts and thrills. But, as is so often the case with sumptuous and touching voices, it seems to be attached to an unemotional and inelastic constitution, and is therefore adapted neither for execution nor expressiveness. What it reaches and conquers in the listener is due rather to itself rather than to its possessor. The Giordani had not the throb of the "heart that languishes," nor was there pathos in "Allerseelen." Yet delicacy and reserve made the Massenet and Hahn tender and pensive and gave point in the Willeby. The German was a commonplace triviality, pretty enough, but not worth the vocal wealth bestowed upon it; it belongs in the English tea-and-muffin's category. Mr. Zach accompanied admirably well.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT.

One wonders what Walt Whitman, unlettered lover of music, would have written, had he heard the Boston Symphony in a "popular" programme before recording his impressions of "That Music Always Round Me,"

A transparent base shuddering lusciously under and through the universe,
The triumphant tutti, the funereal wallings with sweet flutes and violins.

The practised and perfect organ, the developed soul, they personify dim shapes to the initiate. And to those with only rudimentary knowledge of music their performance of works not far removed from the level of average appreciation is perfect joy. Such was the nature of the second concert in aid of the symphony pension fund, given in Symphony Hall last night, with the assistance of Miss Ada Crossley, contralto. The orchestra played the "William Tell" Overture, Bizet's Suite "Roma," the Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre," a Strauss Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," and Handel's Largo, for violins, four harps and organ. The harpists were Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Schuecker, Miss Raymah Dowse and Miss Fanny Hamilton. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. Miss Crossley sang with the orchestra an aria by Giorvani, "Caro mio ben," and German's "Love, the Pedler," and four songs with Max Zach's pianoforte accompaniment; Massenet's "Les Larmes," "Allerseelen," by Richard Strauss, "Baysage" and the "Four-leaf Clover," by Willeby.

A large and applaudive audience was most demonstrative in approval of the Largo, repeated in response to imperative call. Etherial, pensive and pervading, it was beautifully played, passing the organ's momentary engulfment of the harps in the beginning. The "William Tell" overture, marking symptoms of an aroused and angry people, received a stirring interpretation, culminating in an admirable climax. The strings shone pluperfect. With Bizet's suite, in its lively spirit, expansive sauvity and humorous suggestion, and the "Danse Macabre" Mr. Gerlicke was en rapport. They were the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The Strauss waltz, harbinger of Pops, induced tapping of the Sabbatical foot and a secular smile.

Miss Crossley came to Boston with excellent reputation, not undeserved. Her voice is strong, well-balanced and expressive, an organ of unusual quality used with artistic intent. Faults noticeable last night were a slight thickening of the middle register and some shortness of breath. Her voice was best displayed by the "Four-leaf Clover," given with delightful effect. "Love, the Pedler," lacked the degree of archness desirable. "Caro mio ben" was sung with broadness, well sustained. She was not entirely at ease in the Strauss number.

S. C. Williams.

PENSION FUND CONCERT AT THE SYMPHONY HALL

Travel

Uncommon Program Ranging From Richard to Johann Strauss.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund took place last evening at Symphony Hall. The program consisted of Rossini's "William Tell" overture, Bizet's "Roma" suite, Handel's Largo, arranged for violins, harps and organ, the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens, and Johann Strauss's "Wine, Women and Song" waltz, for orchestral numbers; and two groups of songs, including Giorvani's aria, "Caro Mio Ben," with orchestra, and Richard Strauss's "Allerseelen" with piano accompaniment. The singer was Miss Ada Crossley.

A greater contrast can scarcely be imagined than that between this program and the previous concert for the pension fund, which included Tschai-kowsky's "Pathetique" symphony; but the quality of performance was marked by no such difference, and the lighter music seemed to arouse fully as much enthusiasm. It is seldom indeed that one hears a program like last evening's so charmingly played; why not have such delicious frivolity a little oftener? The latter part of Rossini's overture is singularly suggestive of "ragtime"; people grinned at one another knowingly, but applauded with all their might. The feature of the program, however, as far as responsive enthusiasm was concerned, was Handel's Largo, with Misses Dowse and Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Schuecker at the harps, and Mr. Goodrich at the organ. The applause was irresistible; Mr. Gericke and the players bowed again and again, but there was nothing for it but to repeat the latter portion, beginning with the ensemble; people would have liked to hear Mr. Kneisel's solo a second time.

Miss Crossley has a strong contralto voice of good quality and considerable range. Her tones were generally full and resonant, the lower register even thrilling; but the middle tones were husky, and later she became a little hoarse, so that in the second group, with piano accompaniment, her voice was quite under a cloud. She sang well, however, with sufficient feeling and passing good intonation; there was much applause. Mr. Zach played impeccable accompaniments.

The audience was tolerably large, but considering the nature and purpose of the occasion it should have been larger. There is no reason why every seat should not have been filled. Surely it cannot be that the character of the program was less attractive to the general public; the enthusiasm seemed to indicate that people hailed a change. At all events, there is no excuse for neglecting such an opportunity to show Boston's appreciation of her orchestra and the good feeling that an appeal of this sort must arouse. We are offered a capital program and a masterly performance; the least we can do is to avail ourselves of it.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Dante Symphony.....Liszt
Four Choruses for Female Voices.....Brahms
Overture "1812".....Tschai-kowsky

Not a very great or novel ending of the season, but a spicy and interesting programme, nevertheless. The Weber overture gave some especial opportunities to horns and clarinette, for these were the favorite instruments of this composer. One could make an interesting chapter out of the likes and dislikes of composers in the matter of instruments. Beethoven used the bassoon when he was in good humor; Mendelssohn had a penchant for the flute; Mozart disliked the flute, and had a horror of the trumpet in his young days; Weber loved the horn and the clarinette. It was Weber who first bound the classical overture more closely to the opera, which it preceded by taking its themes from the work itself. The overture was brilliantly given and enthusiastically applauded.

Liszt's "Dante" symphony is an unequal work, great in its first part and dull in its second. In the matter of effective orchestration, Liszt is not left so very far behind by the modern impressionists. There is plenty of cacophony in the picture of the infernal regions. Even the opponents of Liszt will admit that this portrayal of Hell sounds like it! But there are contrasts of much beauty in the movement and there is coherency even in the most fearful moments.

Many composers have essayed this internal subject; Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Schumann, etc. But it is only the most modern who write over its portals—"Leave Richter behind, all ye who enter here!" and cause all the rules of harmonic progression to melt in the cauldron.

Entirely beautiful was the duet of Francesca di Rimini and Paolo, although the unfortunate lovers seemed condemned to eternal 5-4 and 7-4 rhythms. Mr. S. Becker had important harp work to do, not only in both parts of this symphony, but in the later chorus accompaniments, and deserves an especially honorable mention, for his work was always flawless.

The picture of Purgatory was dull. It seems that the chief punishment in that region is for some to write complicated fugues and for others to listen to them. In Hades there was plenty of excitement; in Purgatory and in Paradise there was absolute stagnation. Of course, this work must not be scanned by classical symphonic measurements; it is a symphony only by courtesy.

The female choruses were admirably sung by members of the Thursday Morning Club, Mr. Goodrich's Choral Art Society, etc. The "Minnelled" of Brahms received an encore, which Mr. Gericke graciously allowed. The clear enunciation of German was remarkable. It must have been an arduous task to train an entire chorus so thoroughly in a foreign tongue.

"1812" is the apotheosis of national festivity, an outdoor work if ever there was one, and thoroughly fitted to its original surroundings at the dedication of the Russian church in Moscow, in 1881. But it is a trifle unwieldy in a hall, and even its dish of hashed Marsellaise is not entirely to our liking. However, there is something of power in the final mix-up of Moujik and Monsieur, and there are thrilling climaxes. We believe that Tchaikowsky has not had his full recognition as yet. His has been the fate of the bat among the birds and the mice; the Russians have accused him of being too German in his style, and the Germans have held him to be too Russian.

A word of commendation ought to be spoken regarding the excellent solo sung by a member of the chorus in one of the numbers. The name of the singer was not given, but her work was excellent. Mr. Gericke received much applause at the end of the concert—a species of public "Auf Wiedersehen" that he deserved. And now—"The King is dead! Long live the King!" The Symphony concerts are over! The "Pops" begin!

Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, gave the twenty-fourth symphony concert in Symphony Hall, on Saturday evening; the last concert of the season. The programme was—

Karl Maria von Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Franz Liszt: Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia."
Johannes Brahms: Trios for Female Voices with Accompaniment of Harp and two Horns: "Es tont ein voller Harfenklang."—"Wein an den Felsen," opus 17, Nos. 1 and 2.
Johannes Brahms: Romances for Female Voices without Accompaniment: "Minnelled."—"Der Bräutigam," opus 44, Nos. 1 and 2.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky: Overture, "1812," opus 49.

Weber's ever-brilliant overture was brilliantly played—as far as conductor and orchestra were concerned. But the merciless acoustics of the hall let every single note of those dashing violin passages stand out so distinctly that it sounded like a class of boys spelling out poetry, letter by letter. One might as well play upon a pianoforte without a pedal as play such violin-phrases in Symphony Hall.

Liszt's "Dante" symphony has not been heard here, so the programme book tells us, since 1886. "Seventeen years!—it does not seem quite so long as that. Yet, considering the very different impressions the symphony made upon me then, and makes now, it appears in one sense much longer. When first I heard the symphony—in 1886—it seemed to me very horrible indeed; the Francesca episode in the "Inferno" sounded absolutely ear-scorching. But I have grown older since then, and become more modern in feeling: I now find the symphony very beautiful indeed; not up to the same composer's "Faust" by any means, but still very beautiful. One thing, however, should be premised: Liszt was one of the greatest interpreters of music, probably the very greatest, the world has ever known; and everything he wrote presupposed his own rendering. There is probably more left to be read between the lines in a composition by Liszt than in a composition by any other composer in the whole history of the art; a work of his is even more problematical than one by Chopin. Take the A major pianoforte concerto, for instance: it has been played here often enough, and by very different pianists; but I feel it in my bones that we have never yet heard it here as it sounded in Liszt's mind's ear when he wrote it. One can almost say that a composition by Liszt is nothing in itself; it depends upon the performer to make it or break it. Now, of all musicians I know, I think I should pick out Mr. Gericke as the least in psychological sympathy with Franz Liszt; I cannot but feel that, when he conducts a work by Liszt, he does so as a matter of artistic duty—not with his whole heart and soul. And last Saturday evening I could not help feeling at every turning that it was not the genuine, unadulterated "Dante" symphony I was hear-

Miss Ada Crossley, the contralto who is to make her first appearance in this city at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sunday evening, the 26th inst., is a "child of the bush," being a native of South Queensland, Australia, where she spent her girlhood amid surroundings where there were not even the notes of the forest birds to encourage her to sing. Her début at Queen's Hall, London, in 1895, made her an immediate favorite with London audiences, and ever since that time she has enjoyed great prominence in the concert and oratorio performances of England. Her voice is said to be strong and peculiarly agreeable in quality and her enunciation particularly good. Since her recent arrival in this country she has gained great favor with New York audiences, and her appearance here promises to add much to the interest of the pension fund concert.

The men of the Symphony Orchestra are to be congratulated upon the interest shown in the concerts in aid of their pension fund. The concert announced for Sunday evening, the 26th inst., has already been made an assured financial success by the advance sale of seats. Upon this occasion Mr. Gericke has arranged for a hearing of the orchestra in a class of compositions which he has seldom introduced in the regular programmes of the season, and his choice of selections will be sure to delight the patrons of the concert. The programme will be introduced by the "William Tell" overture, and the other instrumental numbers will include Bizet's "Roma" suite, Handel's "Largo" for violins, four harps and organ, with Mr. Wallace Goodrich as organist; the "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saëns; and the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss. Miss Ada Crossley, the English contralto, makes her Boston début at this concert, and in addition to an aria with an orchestral accompaniment she will sing with pianoforte accompaniment a group of songs including Massenet's "Les Larmes," Richard Strauss' "Allerseelen," Hahn's "Baysage" and C. Willeby's "Four-leaf Clover." The men of the orchestra can be relied upon to give their best efforts in the performance of this brilliant programme, and the occasion promises to be a notable social event from the patronage already assured. The sale of seats continues during the week at the Symphony Hall box office.

Yet Colonel Henry Higginson has the lot of his musicians, as they age, very much on his mind just now. When Adelina Patti, at sixty, feels the need of really beginning to lay up something, she has but to prepare, in her Welsh castle, for an American operatic tour, and Mr. Marcus Mayer will proceed to gather here a new fortune for her. The opera house and theatre in her castle grounds has been, no doubt, rather expensive to complete and equip with company and orchestra. Mr. Higginson still finds an orchestra alone all that he cares to be responsible for. He must keep the orchestra at the highest state of efficiency, and this can only be done by letting men go, one after another, as they reach a certain age. The fingers of the violinists lose their nimbleness, the lips of the wind-instrument players fail to respond to the peculiar demands upon them. When this happens the best of his virtuosos must give place to the now best men in Europe, and, of course, Colonel Higginson cannot support them after they have ceased playing and other men are to be paid in their stead. We have always had some sad ghosts of public favorites of the past haunting Boston musical circles, and if we don't want to see others and more of them we must make these symphony concerts for the benefit of the pension fund very remunerative ones. Colonel Higginson may be relied on to plan to have coöperation go as far as it is practicable.

+ + +

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Last evening there was a second concert given by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. Miss Ada Crossley, the well-known contralto of all the English festivals, was the soloist, and the programme, in sharp contrast to that of the first pension concert, was in character light and gay. First came Rossini's "William Tell" overture, which many an old person and all young people must have been glad to hear. This work became at one time so hackneyed that for years no conductor ventured to write it down on a programme, with the result that, like the "Stabat Mater" and the Mendelssohn concertos, it remained quite unknown to most young concert-goers. Last night its performance was superb, the middle portion of the overture, the duet for wood wind instruments, being most poetically played, the final stretto going with a wonderful brilliancy. Then came a suite by Bizet, ambiguously enough called "Roma," a suite with a pleasant first movement, followed by a charming, chattering scherzo, in the fugual style. The next orchestral number was a monstrosity that must have made Handel the magnificent turn in his grave. This brilliant operatic composer once wrote a lovely air for contralto, "Ombra mai piu," in which a lady sings of a pleasant, shady spot she knows, a nice place to sit in of a hot afternoon. This simple air, now spoken of with bated breath as "Handel's Largo," has taken on a sacred character. It is sung to churchly words at divine service; it is played on cornets; organists roll it forth. And last night it was performed by all the violinists and viola players of the orchestra, reverently standing, while Mr. Wallace Goodrich at the organ added a majestic accompaniment; and there were four harpers as well; Mr. and Mrs. Schuecker, Miss Raymah Dowse, and Miss Fanny Hamilton. The people would have it over again.

The orchestra played Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," that brilliant, splendid dance that does not compare, in horror and deathliness with Liszt's "Todtentanz," and, finally, Strauss's waltz, "Wine, Woman and composer's waltzes, last night there was no great effect made by "Wine and Woman." There was rhythm enough, but the cymbals clashed as unduly loudly as they do under the lead of "Der schoene Eduard" himself.

238

Miss Crossley displayed a grand contralto voice, with wonderful chest tones, a good medium, and excellent high notes. The voice and its good training showed to advantage in "Caro mio ben," which Miss Crossley sang with the orchestra, but her other songs were exceedingly ill chosen. A ditty by E. German, "Love, the Pedler," and one by C. Willeby, "The Four-Leaf Clover," are quite out of place on a Boston programme, and the others, Massenet's "Les Larmes," Richard Strauss's "Allerseelen," and Hahn's "Paysage" are not for big, orchestral concerts. It would have been a pleasure to hear a great voice like Miss Crossley's in an aria. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT.

One wonders what Walt Whitman, unlettered lover of music, would have written, had he heard the Boston Symphony in a "popular" programme before recording his impressions of "That Music Always Round Me,"

A transparent base shuddering lusciously under and through the universe. The triumphant tutti, the funereal wailings with sweet flutes and violins.

The practised and perfect organ, the developed soul, they personify dim shapes to the initiate. And to those with only rudimentary knowledge of music their performance of works not far removed from the level of average appreciation is perfect joy. Such was the nature of the second concert in aid of the symphony pension fund, given in Symphony Hall last night, with the assistance of Miss Ada Crossley, contralto. The orchestra played the "William Tell" Overture, Bizet's Suite "Roma," the Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre," a Strauss Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," and Handel's Largo, for violins, four harps and organ. The harpists were Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Schuecker, Miss Raymah Dowse and Miss Fanny Hamilton. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. Miss Crossley sang with the orchestra an aria by Giorvani, "Caro mio ben," and German's "Love, the Pedler," and four songs with Max Zach's pianoforte accompaniment; Massenet's "Les Larmes," "Allerseelen," by Richard Strauss, "Baysage" and the "Four-leaf Clover," by Willeby.

A large and applaudive audience was most demonstrative in approval of the Largo, repeated in response to imperative call. Etherial, pensive and pervading, it was beautifully played, passing the organ's momentary engulfment of the harp in the beginning. The "Wilhelm Tell" overture, marking symptoms of an aroused and angry people, received a stirring interpretation, culminating in an admirable climax. The strings shone pluperfect. With Bizet's suite, in its lively spirit, expansive savvity and humorous suggestion, and the "Danse Macabre" Mr. Gericke was en rapport. They were the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The Strauss waltz, harbinger of Pops, induced tapping of the Sabbatical foot and a secular smile.

Miss Crossley came to Boston with excellent reputation, not undeserved. Her voice is strong, well-balanced and expressive, an organ of unusual quality used with artistic intent. Faults noticeable last night were a slight thickness of the middle register and some shortness of breath. Her voice was best displayed by the "Four-leaf Clover," given with delightful effect. "Love, the Pedler," lacked the degree of archness desirable. "Caro mio ben" was sung with broadness, well sustained. She was not entirely at ease in the Strauss number. S. C. Williams.

THE PERMANENT ORCHESTRA.

(W. J. Henderson in New York Sun.)

There is only one way to make an orchestra permanent, and that is to make the endowment on which it rests permanent. If the annual income cannot die, the orchestra cannot. If the annual income can become tired, the orchestra must lie down and go to sleep. Does this mean that a first-class concert orchestra is not and cannot be a paying investment? Well, that is pretty near what is meant. It is said that the Boston Symphony orchestra is now self-supporting, and that the fund of $1,000,000 invested by Maj. Higginson for its support is no longer required. That is not strictly true. The concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia are profitable, but those given in some other places are losing ventures. They have to be given in order to fill out tours for the band when it goes away from Boston. It will readily be understood that the profits on the concerts of this orchestra are not large. Its conductor gets a substantial salary; many of its performers are high-priced men. When the Boston Symphony orchestra needs a new oboist, for example, some one is sent across the sea to find the best oboe soloist in France—the nursery of wood wind players—and brings him here. Perhaps he is playing in the Lamoureux orchestra in Paris. That does not signify. The long arm of the endowment fund just reaches over and takes him out and gently deposits him in his proper place in the Boston orchestra. That is the way a great orchestra is made.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.

I. Adagio molto: Allegro con brio.

II. Andante cantabile con moto.

III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace: Trio.

IV. Finale: Adagio; allegro molto e vivace.

WIENIAWSKI,

FANTASIA for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, on themes of Gounod's "Faust," op. 20.

SMETANA,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Richard III."

MENDELSSOHN,

OVERTURE to "Ruy Blas," op. 95.

Soloist:

Mr. ADOLF BAK.

Song." By no means one of the best of this composer's waltzes, last night there was no great effect made by "Wine and Woman." There was rhythm enough, but the cymbals clashed as unduly loudly as they do under the lead of "Der schoene Eduard" himself.

Miss Crossley displayed a grand contralto voice, with wonderful chest tones, a good medium, and excellent high notes. The voice and its good training showed to advantage in "Caro mio ben," which Miss Crossley sang with the orchestra, but her other songs were exceedingly ill chosen. A ditty by E. German, "Love, the Pedler," and one by C. Willeby, "The Four-Leaf Clover," are quite out of place on a Boston programme, and the others, Massenet's "Les Larmes," Richard Strauss's "Allerseelen," and Hahn's "Paysage" are not for big, orchestral concerts. It would have been a pleasure to hear a great voice like Miss Crossley's in an aria. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND CONCERT.

One wonders what Walt Whitman, unlettered lover of music, would have written, had he heard the Boston Symphony in a "popular" programme before recording his impressions of "That Music Always Round Me,"

A transparent base shuddering lusciously under and through the universe, The triumphant tutti, the funereal wallings with sweet flutes and violins.

The practised and perfect organ, the developed soul, they personify dim shapes to the initiate. And to those with only rudimentary knowledge of music their performance of works not far removed from the level of average appreciation is perfect joy. Such was the nature of the second concert in aid of the symphony pension fund, given in Symphony Hall last night, with the assistance of Miss Ada Crossley, contralto. The orchestra played the "William Tell" Overture, Bizet's Suite "Roma," the Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre," a Strauss Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," and Handel's Largo, for violins, four harps and organ. The harpists were Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Schuecker, Miss Raymah Dowse and Miss Fanny Hamilton. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. Miss Crossley sang with the orchestra an aria by Giorvani, "Caro mio ben," and German's "Love, the Pedler," and four songs with Max Zach's pianoforte accompaniment; Massenet's "Les Larmes," "Allerseelen," by Richard Strauss, "Baysage" and the "Four-leaf Clover," by Willeby.

A large and applauseful audience was most demonstrative in approval of the Largo, repeated in response to imperative call. Ethereal, pensive and pervading, it was beautifully played, passing the organ's momentary engulfment of the harps in the beginning. The "Wil-ham Tell" overture, marking symptoms of an aroused and angry people, received a stirring interpretation, culminating in an admirable climax. The strings shone pluperfect. With Bizet's suite, in its lively spirit, expansive savvity and humorous suggestion, and the "Danse Macabre" Mr. Gericke was en rapport. They were the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The Strauss waltz, harbinger of Pops, induced tapping of the Sabbatical foot and a secular smile.

Miss Crossley came to Boston with excellent reputation, not undeserved. Her voice is strong, well-balanced and expressive, an organ of unusual quality used with artistic intent. Faults noticeable last night were a slight thick-ness of the middle register and some shortness of breath. Her voice was best displayed by the "Four-leaf Clover," given with delightful effect. "Love, the Pedler," lacked the degree of archness desirable. "Caro mio ben" was sung with broadness, well sustained. She was not entirely at ease in the Strauss num-ber. S. C. Williams.

THE PERMANENT ORCHESTRA.

[W. J. Henderson in New York Sun.]

There is only one way to make an orchestra permanent, and that is to make the endowment on which it rests per-manent. If the annual income cannot die, the orchestra cannot. If the annual income can become tired, the orchestra must lie down and go to sleep. Does this mean that a first-class concert or-chestra is not and cannot be a paying investment? Well, that is pretty near what is meant. It is said that the Bos-ton Symphony orchestra is now self-sup-ported, and that the fund of $1,000,000 invested by Maj. Higginson for its sup-port is no longer required. That is not strictly true. The concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia are profit-able, but those given in some other places are losing ventures. They have to be given in order to fill out tours for the band when it goes away from Boston. It will readily be understood that the profits on the concerts of this orchestra are not large. Its conductor gets a substantial salary; many of its performers are high-priced men. When the Boston Symphony orchestra needs a new oboist, for example, some one is sent across the sea to find the best oboe soloist in France—the nursery of wood wind players—and brings him here. Per-haps he is playing in the Lamoureux orchestra in Paris. That does not sig-nify. The long arm of the endowment fund just reaches over and takes him out and gently deposits him in his prop-er place in the Boston orchestra. That is the way a great orchestra is made.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, AT 8. P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.

I. Adagio molto: Allegro con brio.

II. Andante cantabile con moto.

III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace: Trio.

IV. Finale: Adagio: allegro molto e vivace.

WIENIAWSKI,

FANTASIA for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, on themes of Gounod's "Faust," op. 20.

SMETANA,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Richard III."

MENDELSSOHN,

OVERTURE to "Ruy Blas," op. 95.

Soloist:

Mr. ADOLF BAK.

By Duochet
Boston Jan 14,
1905.

The Hoffmann Quartet did some admirable ensemble work at its second concert. The members are all high-class musicians and hard workers, and one of them is a soloist of exceptional temperament, and virtuosity, only I am sorry to say that few know it or appreciate it. I refer to Adolf Bak the genial second violin of the organization. Some two or three seasons ago, Mr. Gericke gave him a chance to appear as soloist at a Sanders Theatre concert over in Cambridge. I do not know just why Mr. Gericke was so kind unless it was to fill in a date that was "open" unexpectedly. However, Mr. Bak got the chance and played the catchy "Faust" fantasie by Wieniawski.

And he woke up the sleepy Harvard professors and the other literary element as if a keg of dynamite had been set off under the seats of the mighty who were present. And what an awakening it was. The little Hungarian fiddler got I do not know how many recalls and Mr. Gericke nearly collapsed from astonishment, it was so sudden. But he was, however, wise enough to engage Mr. Bak for one of the Boston concerts, and there was something doing that night also. The Symphony girls damaged their kid gloves in their frantic demonstrations of approval, and Adolf is no Society boy either. But it made T. Adamowski, Otto Roth and others of the orchestral prima donnas a bit shaky, and Mr. Gericke must have been tipped off, not to do so again, for Mr. Bak has been kept in the background ever since. I hope he will not hide his artistic light under the bushel too long, for he deserves more recognition than he receives.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
"Faust," Fantasie for Violin.....Wieniawski
Adolf Bak, soloist.
Symphonic Poem, "Richard III.".....Smetana
Overture to "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn

If Bach is the Old Testament of the musician, Beethoven may be considered the New, and it is a pretty coincidence that the new dispensation began the 19th century, for the first symphony was first performed in April, 1800. It is also interesting to note that the very first notes of this symphony threw down the gage to the critics—a cadence in the key of F begins this symphony in C—and it set them all denouncing the boldness of the new composer.

One may consider the first and the sixth symphonies as the weakest of the nine, yet at this concert there was great applause at the conclusion, and the audience evidently did not consider even the first symphony a back number. Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat, but gave the work with every Da Capo and every possible extension. Yet even in this Haydn vein Beethoven did not seem weak or faded. What a bold affair that prominence of the kettle-drums in the second movement must have been in its time! What an advance in minuet-writing is the third movement! This third movement is the nub of the symphony; it is a giant tugging at the chain that Haydn had fastened upon musical form. It is far more of a Scherzo than the Scherzo of the second symphony, although it is still ticketed "Minuet."

When one comes to sift the charm that is in Beethoven, to find the reason why his name always comes to mind first when one speaks of Music, the cause is found in his union of intellectuality and emotion. Bach was infinitely greater from the intellectual side; Chopin certainly went beyond him in the mastery of emotion; but no one ever held these two attributes in such equipoise as did Beethoven; and even the first symphony shows this. In his vocal music there were defects which neutralized this union of qualities, and the singer is constantly disappointed by Beethoven's attempt to make instruments out of human voices, by his vocal impracticalities; but the symphonies wear gloriously well.

The Faust Fantasie is scarcely upon the symphonic level, but the audience swallowed the sugar-plum with great avidity. And Mr. Bak, of the Symphony orchestra, played it with most remarkable finish. We can praise his delicacy of tone, its sympathetic quality, the surety of intonation, the purity of the double-stopping; but there was also a decided lack of breadth. The G string passages were too light; the "Calf of Gold" bleated like a very lambkin; the harmonics (exquisitely pure) were very tiny pipings compared with the effects that Wieniawski himself used to give in this work. There was unbounded applause at the end of the work and Mr. Bak was recalled again and again. He shook hands with Mr. Gericke, and this acknowledgement was only proper, for such admirable orchestral support is not heard once in a month of Sundays.

We reverence Smetana when his genius blazes forth for the glory of his beloved Bohemia; but we like him less in this musical commentary on Shakespeare. Richard III. has been rather shabbily treated by the composers. Volkmann caused him to die to Scottish music,—to the tune of "The Campbells Are Comin',"—which was composed long after Bosworth field and in another country; Smetana causes the tyrant to march around in fustian, accompanied by full brass band. There was much pomp and circumstance in the middle part of the work, and the finale "struck terror to the soul of Richard" (and incidentally to that of the auditor) with several cataclysms that spoke well for the practice of the orchestra.

"Ruy Blas" had a different setting. This was a clear form, a good sonata allegro. But what is far more to the purpose, spite of the fact that it was a most rapidly written composition, being created in less than three days (or possibly because of this) it has good contrasts and is more virile than much of Mendelssohn's overture music.

Mendelssohn comes like Banquo's ghost to the modern musical banquet and will not down. He was priggish, over-elegant, and formal, yet his music outlives the severe latterday criticisms upon it and is likely to be more frequently heard in the future than in the recent past. The pendulum will swing back, the Wagner opposition lose some of its force, and the musical Tennyson come to his own again.

Yet Mendelssohn, combined with the Beethoven first symphony, and the pretty Faust variations, made a programme that would not be classed even by the most conservative Fire Insurance Co. as "extra-hazardous"!

Louis C. Elson.

240
The Hoffmann Quartet did some admirable ensemble work at its second concert. The members are all high-class musicians and hard workers, and one of them is a soloist of exceptional temperament, and virtuosity, only I am sorry to say that few know it or appreciate it. I refer to Adolf Bak the genial second violin of the organization. Some two or three seasons ago, Mr. Gericke gave him a chance to appear as soloist at a Sanders Theatre concert over in Cambridge. I do not know just why Mr. Gericke was so kind unless it was to fill in a date that was "open" unexpectedly. However, Mr. Bak got the chance and played the catchy "Faust" fantasie by Wieniawski.

And he woke up the sleepy Harvard professors and the other literary element as if a keg of dynamite had been set off under the seats of the mighty who were present. And what an awakening it was. The little Hungarian fiddler got I do not know how many recalls and Mr. Gericke nearly collapsed from astonishment, it was so sudden. But he was, however, wise enough to engage Mr. Bak for one of the Boston concerts, and there was something doing that night also. The Symphony girls damaged their kid gloves in their frantic demonstrations of approval, and Adolf is no Society boy either. But it made T. Adamowski, Otto Roth and others of the orchestral prima donnas a bit shaky, and Mr. Gericke must have been tipped off, not to do so again, for Mr. Bak has been kept in the background ever since. I hope he will not hide his artistic light under the bushel too long, for he deserves more recognition than he receives.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
"Faust," Fantasie for Violin.....Wieniawski
Adolf Bak, soloist.
Symphonic Poem, "Richard III.".....Smetana
Overture to "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn

If Bach is the Old Testament of the musician, Beethoven may be considered the New, and it is a pretty coincidence that the new dispensation began the 19th century, for the first symphony was first performed in April, 1800. It is also interesting to note that the very first notes of this symphony threw down the gage to the critics—a cadence in the key of F begins this symphony in C—and it set them all denouncing the boldness of the new composer.

One may consider the first and the sixth symphonies as the weakest of the nine, yet at this concert there was great applause at the conclusion, and the audience evidently did not consider even the first symphony a back number. Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat, but gave the work with every Da Capo and every possible extension. Yet even in this Haydn vein Beethoven did not seem weak or faded. What a bold affair that prominence of the kettle-drums in the second movement must have been in its time! What an advance in minuet-writing is the third movement! This third movement is the nub of the symphony; it is a giant tugging at the chain that Haydn had fastened upon musical form. It is far more of a Scherzo than the Scherzo of the second symphony, although it is still ticketed "Minuet."

When one comes to sift the charm that is in Beethoven, to find the reason why his name always comes to mind first when one speaks of Music, the cause is found in his union of intellectuality and emotion. Bach was infinitely greater from the intellectual side; Chopin certainly went beyond him in the mastery of emotion; but no one ever held these two attributes in such equipoise as did Beethoven; and even the first symphony shows this. In his vocal music there were defects which neutralized this union of qualities, and the singer is constantly disappointed by Beethoven's attempt to make instruments out of human voices, by his vocal impracticalities; but the symphonies wear gloriously well.

The Faust Fantasie is scarcely upon the symphonic level, but the audience swallowed the sugar-plum with great avidity. And Mr. Bak, of the Symphony orchestra, played it with most remarkable finish. We can praise his delicacy of tone, its sympathetic quality, the surety of intonation, the purity of the double-stopping; but there was also a decided lack of breadth. The G string passages were too light; the "Calf of Gold" bleated like a very lambkin; the harmonics (exquisitely pure) were very tiny pipings compared with the effects that Wieniawski himself used to give in this work. There was unbounded applause at the end of the work and Mr. Bak was recalled again and again. He shook hands with Mr. Gericke, and this acknowledgement was only proper, for such admirable orchestral support is not heard once in a month of Sundays.

241

We reverence Smetana when his genius blazes forth for the glory of his beloved Bohemia; but we like him less in this musical commentary on Shakespeare. Richard III. has been rather shabbily treated by the composers. Volkmann caused him to die to Scottish music,—to the tune of "The Campbells Are Comin',"—which was composed long after Bosworth field and in another country; Smetana causes the tyrant to march around in fustian, accompanied by full brass band. There was much pomp and circumstance in the middle part of the work, and the finale "struck terror to the soul of Richard" (and incidentally to that of the auditor) with several cataclysms that spoke well for the practice of the orchestra.

"Ruy Blas" had a different setting. This was a clear form, a good sonata allegro. But what is far more to the purpose, spite of the fact that it was a most rapidly written composition, being created in less than three days (or possibly because of this) it has good contrasts and is more virile than much of Mendelssohn's overture music.

Mendelssohn comes like Banquo's ghost to the modern musical banquet and will not down. He was priggish, over-elegant, and formal, yet his music outlives the severe latterday criticisms upon it and is likely to be more frequently heard in the future than in the recent past. The pendulum will swing back, the Wagner opposition lose some of its force, and the musical Tennyson come to his own again.

Yet Mendelssohn, combined with the Beethoven first symphony, and the pretty Faust variations, made a programme that would not be classed even by the most conservative Fire Insurance Co. as "extra-hazardous"!

Louis C. Elson.

SMETANA'S IDEA OF THE TYRANT RICHARD THIRD

As Portrayed in His Symphonic Poem Played Last Night.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the twenty-third symphony concert was as follows:
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
"Faust" Fantasia.....Wieniawski
"Richard III.".....Smetana
Overture to "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn

Mr. Adolf Bak, a violinist and a member of the Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist at these concerts. He played Wieniawski's fantasia on themes from Gounod's "Faust." His tone was small, but pure and of a sweetness that was invariable, whether the music was from the Garden Scene or the air of Mephistopheles, "The Calf of Gold." The virtuoso passages were performed with marked accuracy and with applause-compelling ease. Mr. Bak also displayed a fine, almost microscopic taste rather than broad or deep emotional qualities. In its way the performance was admirable.

Smetana's "Richard."

Smetana's symphonic poem "Richard III." was composed at Gothenburg in 1858, sixteen years before he wrote the first of his cycle of tone-poems, "My Fatherland," and before he determined to write music charged with a national spirit. When he wrote Liszt in 1858 with reference to "Richard III.": "At present I cannot do more than is therein," he undoubtedly told the truth. The work is not without imaginative quality, but the hearer feels that Smetana was not then master in the expression of his thoughts. The chief theme that typifies the hero is worked to death by direct, not by complex methods. The contrasting, expressive theme is of genuine beauty, but little is done with it. The pictorial or descriptive sections are at the best only theatre music and of a commonplace type. On the whole a youthful composition; yet every now and then are traces of the future greatness of this Czech musician, whose life was a noble one crowned by perhaps the most dismal tragedy recorded in the history of the art. It would be interesting to know whether the orchestra in the Swedish town played the symphonic poem during Smetana's stay. The score was not published till after the composer's death.

The Other Pieces.

The scherzo of Beethoven's first symphony is still fresh and graceful; but the preceding movements might well be allowed to sleep peacefully on the shelf, and the Finale is interesting chiefly as a collection of thoughts by Mozart and Haydn. Mendelssohn could see nothing in Victor Hugo's play "Ruy Blas;" he wrote, "It is really of no value, it is absolutely below contempt." He would not put the title of the play on the score of his overture. Did Victor Hugo ever hear Mendelssohn's overture? And if he did, what did he say about it? We know that Mendelssohn once remarked petulantly in London that he himself would like to burn it, he disliked it so much. For once a composer's opinion of his own work was sounder than his judgment on the work of another. Fechter made Ruy Blas a hero never to be forgotten. No conductor can so vitalize this overture.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The principal feature of last week's Symphony program was the admirable interpretation of the Wieniawski "Faust" fantasia by Mr Adolf Bak, one of the first violins of the orchestra. The artist, who was comparatively unknown to many patrons, won immediate favor by the exquisite quality of his tone, which though not broad like a Kreisler or Ysaye, was of good carrying power and the acme of refinement and purity. His fingering was true and facile, his chords were harmonious and his runs, arpeggios and harmonics were clearly defined and as smooth as one could expect to hear, even from a violinist of more extended reputation. Possibly there was a lack of brilliancy and dash in the waltz movement; but the arias and figurations were beautifully expressed and all the familiar melodies were sung with a splendid tonality and finished execution. His greetings, "after he had made himself known," were very flattering, for he proved to be an artist whose work in the future should be a valuable contribution in the field of violin music.

Smetana's symphonic poem, "Richard III," was played for the first time here. It is a sombre, martial composition which illustrates quite vividly the character of the tyrant, the orchestration is bold, harsh at times, and very elaborate, and the performance was up to the usual standard of the orchestra. The brass contingent was notably efficient in its fortissimo playing.

The opening symphony, Beethoven's first, was given with grand effect, the andante, or second movement, being a gem in perfect colorings and musical lights and shades. The familiar piece was the most enjoyable of the orchestral numbers, although the Mendelssohn "Ruy Blas" overture, a pleasing contrast to its predecessor, "Richard III," was performed with befitting pomp and ardor.

The program for the closing concerts will include Weber's "Oberon" overture, "Dante" symphony, Liszt; part songs for female voices, Brahms, and Tschaiowsky's overture, "1812."

From

April 7, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-third Symphony Concert was given in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21.
Henri Wieniawski: "Faust" Fantaisie for Violin and Orchestra.
Bedrich Smetana: "Richard III." Symphonic Poem.

(First time in Boston.)

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy: Overture to "Ruy Blas," opus 95.

Mr. Adolf Bak was the solo violinist.

The Beethoven symphony was delightfully played, as usual. This is one of the things in which one has grown to expect perfection from our orchestra, as a matter of course.

Smetana's new "Richard III." proved rather a questionable work. It does it no good to compare it with Volkmann's overture on the same subject. Still, it has its merits; it is clearly written, effectively scored and full of life. Its clearness may, after all, be but a transitory virtue, as clearness often is in music; the things you understand at a dash are not, as a rule, those which long retain their hold upon you. But, if the work is musically clear, its relation to Shakespeare's tragedy is not always so by any means. One needed no programme-book to point out the "Richard" theme; that stood out plainly of itself. But what is the poetic significance of that melodious second theme? Does it stand for Lady Anne, or for the young princes? Or is it merely a musical summing up of the "non-Richard," of all that is not Richard? One would like to know. It might be objected that the whole symphonic poem does not rise above the level of melodrama; it certainly does not, but it seems to me that this was necessarily conditioned by the subject. Richard himself is no more than melodramatic; he cannot suggest such music as is suggested by Hamlet or King Lear; he does not even rise to the tragic level of Macbeth. Richard has no soul, not even a soul to lose; in him there is nothing for the Devil to take hold of. Of course, a Beethoven or a Wagner might write truly tragic music with "Richard III." for its title; but he who did this would be singing a Richard of his own, and neither Shakespeare's nor the real one. Still, merely melodramatic as the music is, it is pleasant to listen to; I should much like to hear it again.

Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture set one a-thinking. It is one of the least Mendelssohnian things he ever wrote; which may be explained by his total lack of sympathy with the subject. Of all men alive in his time, he was perhaps the very last to see the good in Victor Hugo, and the first to see the evil. Only in the can-tile of the second theme (for 'celli and bassoons) does one recognize the habitual Mendelssohn; and part of this theme is taken from his "St. Paul." Again, it is the only theatrical overture he ever wrote; as it ends, you expect to see the curtain rise. But all this is not what set one a-thinking, but something else. Whether distinctively Mendelssohnian or not in the character of its themes, the overture is unmistakably Mendelssohnian in its technique. Of all the great composers that ever wrote, Mendelssohn is probably the one with whom the present generation has the least sympathy; we nowadays set Giuseppe Verdi above him, a thing which he, were he now alive, would doubtless consider the greatest conceivable insult. His whole musical creed was the farthest from ours, the traits which are most characteristic of him are those we most dislike. Yet we cannot but admit that he was a great master. And hearing this rather despised "Ruy Blas" of his once more gave one a sudden realizing sense of what an enormous power true mastery is! No matter how poor at heart the overture may be, anything that is so tremendously well done, any so supremely fine a piece of workmanship as it is, cannot fail of being admirable. Just think of the power that is implied in making those trivial themes so effective in so strict a form! The overture was exceedingly brilliantly played.

There were probably many persons who felt inclined to shrug their shoulders on seeing Wieniawski's "Faust" fantasy down on a Symphony programme. But it paid well. The fantasia on operatic airs has not been reckoned one of the most dignified musical forms; it is seldom spoken of with respect. Indeed very little really good work has been done in it. But there are some striking exceptions to this rule. Even so tetchy a purist as Felix Mendelssohn once wrote in terms of high admiration of Thalberg's pianoforte fantasia on Rosini's "Gazza ladra;" and I am much mistaken if this violin fantasy of Wieniawski's on themes from Gounod's "Faust" is not worthy to be placed beside it. In the first place, it is truly a fantasy, a product of the imagination, not a mere piece of working by rule. Hardly a melody is given in its entirety; it is as if the composer knew his whole "Faust" by heart, and let one phrase follow another just as it happened to come into his head. One feels as if the whole opera had been cut up into inch-lengths, and these thrown pell-mell into a kaleidoscope; every turn brings with it a new combination. Sometimes the concatenations are exceedingly poetic in their suggestiveness: for instance, when, just at the end of one of the love-themes in the garden scene, there suddenly crops up the phrase, "Permettereste a me," from Faust's first meeting with Margherita (I have not the French text with me). The whole thing is very aristocratically articulated; the orchestral part, too, is admirable. Mr. Bak, whose first appearance as a solo-player this was, played it exceedingly well; with small tone, to be sure, but with exquisite grace of phrasing, and just the right feeling. This is a case where elegance tells better than sentiment. It is good to find such playing come from the back row of our first violins; it reminded me of my first Conservatoire concert in Paris, years ago, when it took me some time to find out who was playing the violin solo in the introduction to Saint-Saëns's "Le Déluge;" after much looking I saw at last that it was a young man (he did not look over nineteen) in the sixth row of first violins. Indeed Mr. Bak may surely be said to have scored a palpable success; he was applauded and recalled to his heart's content.

244

The next programme, and last of the season, is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Liszt, "Dante" symphony; Brahms, two-part songs for female voices with harp and horn accompaniment, opus 17; two part-songs for female voices a capella, opus 44; Tchaikovsky, overture, "1812."

W. F. A.

245

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 2, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Oberon."

LISZT,

SYMPHONY after Dante's "Divina Commedia."

I. INFERNO. Lento, Allegro frenetico, Quasi Andante.

Andante amoroso (Francesca). Tempo primo.

II. a) PURGATORIO. Andante con moto. Lamentoso. Poco a poco piu di moto.

b) Magnificat.

BRAHMS,

TWO PART SONGS for FEMALE VOICES, with accompaniment of HARP and two HORNS, op. 17. Nos. 1, 4: "Es tönt ein voller Harfenklang"; "Wein' an den Felsen."

TWO SONGS from 12 Songs and Romances for FEMALE VOICES, without accompaniment, op. 44, Nos. 1, 2. "Minnelied," "Der Bräutigam."

(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

OVERTURE "1812." op. 49.

with small tone, to be sure, but with exquisite grace of phrasing, and just the right feeling. This is a case where elegance tells better than sentiment. It is good to find such playing come from the back row of our first violins; it reminded me of my first Conservatoire concert in Paris, years ago, when it took me some time to find out who was playing the violin solo in the introduction to Saint-Saëns's "Le Déluge;" after much looking I saw at last that it was a young man (he did not look over nineteen) in the sixth row of first violins. Indeed Mr. Bak may surely be said to have scored a palpable success; he was applauded and recalled to his heart's content.

The next programme, and last of the season, is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Liszt, "Dante" symphony; Brahms, two-part songs for female voices with harp and horn accompaniment, opus 17; two part-songs for female voices a capella, opus 44; Tchaikovsky, overture, "1812."

W. F. A.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1902-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 2, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Oberon."

LISZT,

SYMPHONY after Dante's "Divina Commedia."

I. INFERNO. Lento, Allegro frenetico, Quasi Andante.

Andante amoroso (Francesca). Tempo primo.

II. a) PURGATORIO. Andante con moto. Lamentoso. Poco a poco piu di moto.

b) Magnificat.

BRAHMS,

TWO PART SONGS for FEMALE VOICES, with accompaniment of HARP and two HORNS, op. 17. Nos. 1, 4: "Es tönt ein voller Harfenklang"; "Wein' an den Felsen."

TWO SONGS from 12 Songs and Romances for FEMALE VOICES, without accompaniment, op. 44. Nos. 1, 2. "Minnelied," "Der Bräutigam." (First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

OVERTURE "1812." op. 49.

246

Symphony Hall.

---

Twenty-Third Season, 1903-1904.

---

The Boston
Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

Opening Concert,
SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 17, 1903.

247

ing, but a rather faint shadow thereof. It was an admirable performance, in one way: finished, clean-cut, and full of a certain sort of life; "aber das Schenle, ich meine der Geist" was lacking, or, at best, counterfeited. Good Lord! a man is as he is born; he cannot make himself over again. A man may be the greatest Mozartian alive, without being in the least in sympathy with Liszt; he may even find Liszt to have many qualities in common with Dr. Fell.

To pick out a few separate things in this symphony, let me mention the 7-4 passage in the Francesca episode in the "Inferno." Surely Liszt never wrote anything more divinely beautiful; it has all the beauty and grace of the "Gretchen" movement in his "Faust" symphony, and is, moreover, far more truly expressive of its subject. With all her beauty of line and color, Liszt's Gretchen is as far removed from Goethe's as possible; she reminds one much more of Madame de Genlis! But Liszt's Francesca has at least something of artless girliness; nowhere, except perhaps in "Les Préludes," have I found Liszt's sentiment so free from affectation; and the sentiment in "Les Préludes" is skin-deep compared to that of this 7-4 episode. The introduction to the "Purgatorio" is too long-drawn-out, and rather dull at that; but from the point marked "Un poco meno mosso" the interest grows steadily up to the entrance of the "Magnificat." The little fugato in the middle shows real originality; it is neither Bach's fugue nor Beethoven's, but Liszt's very own. There is much grandiose mysticism, too, in the choral finale. The flutes and clarinets in the "Magnificat," though, are a clean steal from the flutes, clarinets and violins in the chorus "Remonte au ciel, ame naive" in Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust;" and not the sort of plagiarism that can be condoned as an improvement. The dates bear me out in this: Berlioz and Liszt were as intimate as possible; the former's "Faust" was brought out in Paris in 1846; the latter did not even begin sketches for his "Dante" symphony until 1847.

One thing is especially to be noted in this "Dante" symphony: the completely modern spirit in which it is conceived and carried out. Just think of it: Wagner did not begin the music of his "Nibelungen" before 1853; "Tristan and Isolde" was not begun until 1857; and here is Liszt writing music to the full as modern as "Tristan!" Yes, Liszt was in the fullest sense the brains of the "Future" movement; he may not have had the genius of either Berlioz or Wagner, but he had a more foreseeing spirit than either; his works were prophecies incarnate.

The Brahms part-songs are very beautiful, but entirely out of place at a symphony concert. How royal it would have been to have that chorus of women simply for the "Magnificat" in Liszt's symphony; and what sheer bourgeois economy it seemed, to have them add these part-songs, just so as to get enough work out of them!

Tchailkovsky's "1812" was brilliantly played up to the entrance of the church tune at the end; but the famous coda sounded peculiarly and discouragingly tame; it made hardly any noise! Was this because the bells were played out of time, giving syncopated strokes between the beats!—or what was the matter? Probably the never-enough-to-be-anathematized hall!

Very interesting statistics of the past season are given at the end of the programme book. It seems, amongst other things, that we have had eighteen compositions given for the first time in Boston; a goodly number, though it might be objected that they were not all interesting, whereas a good many very curiosity-piquing works have been waiting some time for a performance here. I am not sure, but have a shrewd notion that the Chicago list of novelties might make us Bostonians blush. But, while I am on the subject of the programme books, let me say how admirably Mr. Philip Hale has edited them for the last two seasons. It is perhaps a little awkward to say this, for it may sound like a mere conventional compliment from a back-number editor to his successor; but I beg Mr. Hale to believe that this is not so; it is a perfectly frank expression of opinion. The programme books have never before been worth so much as now.

The end of the season brings with it one misfortune to the public; the resignation of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler from the Symphony Orchestra. There is a fine bow, and, what is far more valuable, a still finer influence gone! Mr. Loeffler is henceforth to devote himself to composition, teaching and solo playing. If there is any consolation for the whole business, it is that he will compose more than formerly, having more time and less-divided strength; and this is a consolation worth having. At any rate we keep him in Boston. W. F. A.

TO LEAVE THE SYMPHONY

Kneisel Quartette Makes This Announcement

Wider Field Sought by the Famous Musicians

Higher Goal for Their Artistic Careers

They Will Appear in Continental Musical Centres

One of the most important announcements in Boston musical circles in many years, and one that will cause general regret throughout all this section of the country, was made this morning. It is that the Kneisel Quartette have decided to sever their connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to seek a wider field and the higher goal which they have set for their artistic careers. The announcement comes as a great surprise, not only to the general public, but to Mr. Henry L. Higginson, to whom the members, after long deliberation, announced their decision only yesterday. In announcing the retirement of the quartet, Mr. Higginson says that their letter sets forth that they prefer to play only as a quartet or as soloists and to travel at their own will and more freely than now; and to this end they give up their orchestral duties as being incompatible with their chosen work. The substance of the letter to Mr. Higginson is as follows: "Henry L. Higginson, Esq.:

"Dear Sir—We have, for a considerable time, cherished a wish for a personal interview in order to tell you that of late the question of our artistic future has occupied our minds more earnestly and importantly than ever before. Yet, though we were clear as to what we wished to say to you, we decided to wait till the end of the season and then to communicate with you by letter instead of by word of mouth. . . . And so we come to you thus tardily and beg, first of all, to recall to your mind the fact that we long ago expressed the wish to make trial of our skill as quartet players in the larger musical capitals of Europe. The success of our concerts in London was so encouraging that we have never been able to stifle the desire to play in other countries than England. . . . Recent years have brought the conviction, however, that such activity as ours can be continued only for a measurable period. That which in our younger days could be accomplished only by effort now exacts excess of effort, and this must, sooner or later, revenge itself on one or the other of us. . . . The conclusion was obvious that we must free ourselves from some of the duties pressing upon us."

"And now we have reached the point which is the business of this communication; we ask you kindly to relieve us of our tasks in connection with the orchestra. We are well aware that we are surrendering positions the occupancy of which must redound to the honor of any artists in the world. Our feeling of affectionate attachment to the orchestra and our respect and admiration for Mr. Gericke combine to make our parting peculiarly painful; yet it is only by leaving the orchestra that we can reach the goal which we have set for our artistic careers. We beg of you, dear Mr. Higginson, to remember that Mr. Kneisel has done orchestra service for twenty years and Mr. Schroeder for more than thirty. . . . Touching the further development of our quartet, we desire to direct your attention to the fact that organizations of this kind that have achieved fame (such as the Florentino, the Heckmann, the Joachim, and among the younger class the Bohemian and other quartets) do not belong to orchestras or have given up their positions in orchestras in the early part of their career. We believe that we can measure ourselves with the best in our field and therefore wish to devote ourselves wholly and singly to the work.

"We have already mentioned the things which make our parting with the orchestra difficult and painful; but have reserved for the conclusion what ought to have been set forth at the beginning, namely, our feeling of attachment and gratitude towards you personally. Please accept the assurance from us that we shall always and unalterably strive for recognition and approbation; we beg of you not to withdraw from us that kind interest which we have been privileged to enjoy for eighteen years. We shall never forget that it is you who have given us all imaginable help and encouragement even since the origin of our quartet, and we feel privileged to hope that you will maintain the same attitude towards us in our new endeavors, which, we assure you, are prompted wholly and purely by artistic motives.

"With renewed assurance of our profound gratitude and fidelity, we beg to subscribe ourselves your obedient servants, (Signed) Franz Kneisel,
Julius Theodorowitz,
Louis Svecenski,
Alwin Schroeder."

Mr. Higginson adds the following:

"Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were brought from Europe both to take the first place among their respective instruments and also to play in the quartet, which from the outstart I had intended to establish here as an adjunct of the orchestra. This purpose I carried out, and bore the quartet on my shoulders for some years.

"The members of the Kneisel Quartet have served me in every capacity long, faithfully and intelligently, and deserve very well of the public. Their reasons for leaving us are good and convincing, and, while these gentlemen are a great loss to the orchestra and to me, I see that they can labor more freely and to their own greater profit and renown by taking this step, and they take it with my entire consent and good will. But few losses in this world cannot be made good, and the places thus vacant will be filled by artists of the highest class. I wish the members of the Kneisel Quartet all success in their new efforts."

THE WORK WAS TOO HARD

Moreover, the Kneisels Desire to Appear Only as a Quartet, and Wish Ample Time to Prepare for Next Season's Tour

Franz Kneisel is at present out of town and will not return to Boston until May 18, but at his home in Jamaica Plain it was said this afternoon that the reasons for the resignation of the quartette are that the members do not wish to work so much as they are obliged to with the Symphony Orchestra, and also that they desire to play only in quartette. It is not their intention to leave Boston. This city will still be their permanent home, although tours will be made which will often be extensive. It is their intention to go abroad next spring, starting in February, and visiting all of the principal European cities, and in order to perfect themselves for this tour it was considered best to sever the connection with the larger orchestra and devote attention exclusively to preparation for the quartette work.

The only other member of the orchestra who has resigned is Charles Loeffler, who will have no connection with the enterprise of the Kneisels.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Liszt's Famous "Dante" Symphony to Be Performed Entire—The "Oberon" and "1812" Overtures.

Liszt seems to be coming to the front in these days. His two greatest symphonic poems, the "Faust" and the "Dante," have recently had almost simultaneous performances in Berlin, and the "Dante," in its second complete Boston performance, will be the chief matter in the last Symphony programme for the present season, having been first played on Feb. 27, 1886, under Mr. Gericke's direction. This symphony—to give it its name, although it is not one—was composed in 1856, after much study and sketching, and brought out at Dresden in 1857, appearing in London a dozen years later, and represented originally in Boston at an Old Bay State lecture course concert, when the first part was played by the Philharmonic orchestra. It aroused wherever presented immense excitement and determined opposition. Laudation and rhapsody were lavished upon it, but strong and competent critics pronounced it chaotic, absurd and cacophonous. In the course of a short but severe article the late Mr. Woolf called it "sombre farce" and "vulgar sensationalism run mad." But in a score of years Boston has heard compositions much wilder and more "fierce," and is prepared to listen to it dispassionately and clear-headedly. It is in two parts only, and no one needs to be told that it was inspired by Dante's "Divine Comedy." No attempt is made to depict paradise, Liszt having agreed with Wagner when he suggested that if the poet could not put heaven into words, the musicians had best not try to do it with notes.

The first part opens with a grave, gloomy recitative based upon the text,

"Per me si va nella città dolente,
Per me si va nell' eterno dolore.
Per me si va tra la perduta gente."

Then the brasses cry out "Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch' entrate," in a phrase which often recurs. The immediately following allegro frenetico intimates the hurrying ghosts and their pursuing penalties, the crowds, the cries, the incessant succession of the tortured and the torturers, the whirl of swift and mighty winds, until there comes in a sudden andante the lamentable episode of Paolo and Francesca, sad but amorous, wrought upon the pitiful text of "Nessun maggior dolore che ricordarsi del tempo felice nella miseria." As this passes, the frenetic allegro returns to finish out the part.

The second part, suggesting purgatory, begins gently, peacefully and hopefully, in a tranquil andante, but soon turns to suffering, depression and gloom. To end it well and to complete the sequence of the poems, there now enters the "Magnificat," sung by female voices, who maintain it to the last, and so leave upon the mind thoughts at least of heaven.

Having such a choir at hand, Mr. Gericke has thought to give it further employment, and there will consequently be sung four two-part songs by Brahms, half of them "a capella" and the others with harp and horn accompaniment. The programme will open and close respectively with the "Oberon" and "1812" overtures. Both are too well known to need description here, and the latter will be remembered as so vehement and clangorous that several Pops will be required to expel its last echoes from the hall.

CLOSE OF SYMPHONY SEASON.

With the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the concert last evening the 22d season of the Boston symphony orchestra was brought to a close. Aside from the, perhaps, more than commonly cordial expressions of good will towards conductor Gericke, there were no unusual demonstrations.

The program was as follows:

Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Symphony after Dante's Divine Comedy.....Liszt When'er the Sounding Harp is Heard" and
The Death of Tenebris, from four trios for female voices with accompaniment of harp and two horns.....Brahms Mainnelled and Der Brautgarn, from 12 songs and romances for female voices without accompaniment.....Brahms
Overture, 1812.....Tschalkowsky

The so-called Liszt symphony is an odd, almost freakish composition, and there is no especial reason for regret that it so seldom finds a place on the concert program. It has only once before been given here complete, in 1886, and then, as yesterday, under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The first part, "The Inferno," has been played a few times. All the elements of popularity that the work contains are to be found in the first part, and it is not to be denied that there are some fine examples of impressive descriptive writing and some remarkable effects in tonal color that are artistic even though showily sensational. This part can be listened to with interest, even with pleasure, but the second part, "Purgatorio and Magnificat," is dreary and monotonous. Even the admirable performance of the work could not move the audience to respond with more than a patter of perfunctory applause. The chorus was composed of members of the Thursday Morning club and the Choral Art society, and was a well balanced and readily responsive body of singers.

The chorus also gave excellent interpretation of the Brahms' part songs, severely classical compositions that delight the musical student, but dreadfully bore the average "uncultivated" lover of music that is melodious.

The other numbers of the program, the "Oberon" and "1812" overtures, were greatly enjoyed, for, as it is needless to state, they were both superbly interpreted. The exquisite tenderness and sentiment of Weber's music was revealed with rare expression, and Tschalkowsky's tremendously effective work was given with superb spirit.

From an interesting and exhaustive summary compiled by Mr F. R. Comee, business manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, it is learned that during the season of 24 concerts just ended, 18 works were performed for the first time in Boston. Fifty-five composers were represented by 104 selections. Beethoven leading with nine, followed by Brahms with eight, Robert Schumann, Tschalkowsky and Wagner with five each; Berlioz, Liszt and Schubert with four each. The classification of the works performed was as follows: Symphonies 24, suites and serenades 8, symphonic poems 9, overtures 19, orchestral variations 2, operatic excerpts and transcriptions 5, miscellaneous compositions 6, concertos and instrumental solos with orchestra 15, accompaniments to vocal solos, duets, etc. 16. There were 20 soloists, of whom seven were pianists, five violinists and four vocalists. Four members of the orchestra were among the soloists, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, Adolf Bak and Alwin Schroeder.

The next season of the Boston symphony orchestra will begin Oct. 16, 1903. Mr Wilhelm Gericke will again be the conductor and it is not probable that there will be any noteworthy changes in the personnel of the organization.

THE "POP" CONCERTS.

The "Pop" concerts at Symphony hall will begin tomorrow evening, and for the next two months will be given nightly, except on Sunday. Good music, refreshments and all the attractive features of past seasons will be provided and the immense patronage which these popular entertainments have enjoyed for many years will undoubtedly be again extended. The orchestra will number upward of 50 men, drawn from Symphony players, and light music of the best class will predominate in the programs.

Mr T. Adamowski, will be the conductor and he has given much time to the selection of new music to be played here at these concerts for the first time. The following are the selections for tomorrow evening:

Overture, The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.....Wagner
Intermezzo, Contes d'Hoffmann.....Offenbach
(First time.)
Suite from ballet, La Belle au Bois Dormant.....Tschalkowsky
(First time.)
Concert overture, In Bohemia.....H K Hadley
(First time.)
Fantasia on La Boheme.....Puccini
(First time.)
Suite, Henry VIII.....Saint-Saens
Hymn to St. Cecilia.....Gounod
Violin solo, Mr Karl Ondricek.
Organ, Mr Snow.
Festival march.....R Strauss
(First time.)
Salut d'Amour.....Ed Elgar
(First time.)
España.....Chabrier
Overture, Fledermaus.....Joh Strauss
Coronation march.....Ed German

Symphony Hall: Pop Concert

As in earlier days, under the leadership of Mr. Timothée Adamowski, there opened last night in Symphony Hall the eighteenth season of "Pop" concerts, opened with pomp and circumstance, with a crash of martial music, with tinkling harps, with many violins in unison, with Gypsy dances, German waltzes, with Spanish rhapsodies. All the glories of the past were at this opening of a season, and a certain something not always to be found. There was last night an unwonted brilliancy. More women appeared in gorgeous frocks, women, too, of fashion; glasses clinked more wickedly than they often do in Symphony Hall; more people, sitting about the little tables, contrived to look as though they did not mind the smoke, but were genuinely enjoying themselves. In short, it was a pleasant occasion to be at.

As for the music, it would be difficult to imagine better. In the matter of programmes for the first week, Mr. Adamowski has arranged a list of which he may well feel proud. Last night, for instance, out of twelve numbers, six were new in Boston, and of the remaining six, no one was in the least hackneyed. The Meistersinger prelude made an imposing inauguration to the season, and it was followed by a succession of charming compositions, not one of which was too heavy for a popular concert, too trivial to displease any listener, or too delicate to be heard above the din. This was, indeed, a triumph of programme making, and the arrangements for the rest of the week are no less good. Last night's programme, by the way, is well worth recording:

Overture, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Intermezzo, "Contes d'Hoffmann".....Offenbach
(First time.)
Suite from Ballet, "La Belle au Bois Dormant".....Tschalkowsky
(First time.)
Concert Overture, "In Bohemia".....H. K. Hadley
(First time.)
Fantasia on "La Bohème".....Puccini
(First time.)
Suite, "Henry VIII.".....Saint-Saens
Hymn to St. Cecilia.....Gounod
Violin Solo, Mr. Karl Ondricek.
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Festival March.....R. Strauss
(First time.)
Salut d'Amour.....Ed. Elgar
(First time.)
España.....Chabrier
Overture, "Fledermaus".....Joh. Strauss
Coronation March.....Ed. German

The playing was a complete satisfaction to listen to. In conducting his excellent forces, Mr. Adamowski brought to bear all the charm, warmth and delicacy that characterize his solo work. The result was delightful orchestral playing, exquisite in finish, inspiringly rhythmical, abounding in temperament. A feature of the evening was Mr. Ondricek's broad, sonorous and fervid playing of the Gounod piece. The whole concert, indeed, was a pronounced success. The very large audience was manifestly in the vein, and Mr. Adamowski is to be heartily congratulated on his admirable performance of a truly remarkable programme.

May 5, 1903 R. R. G.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Impressive Effect of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony.

Mr. Gericke Introduces a Female Chorus—Two Great Overtures Performed—Over 100 Numbers Presented in the Season—Next Series Begins on Oct. 16 and 17.

At the first blush, it seems strange that Liszt's "Dante" symphony—which was the chief element in Mr. Gericke's last programme for the present season—should have perplexed, perturbed and even pained its hearers 20, or even 40, years ago. But a moment's reflection corrects that notion. Many a reader of these lines can recall his sensations on hearing the old Germanians, under Bergmann, play the "Tannhauser" overture, and remember his concordance with one stricture of the time, that it must have meant the banging of doors in a gale of wind.

Even a quarter of a century ago, music, however sentimental, romantic or emotional, was still primarily—if one may so express it—rhetorical in form, whereas it has since grown to be oratorical and dramatic. Then it seemed to aim first at producing thoughts, but now it wants to create moods and stir sensations. The course of orderly thought and the recognition of symmetrical form are not lost; but the rise, swell, establishment, domination and cessation of emotion have first consideration and main importance. But as emotion, even if in its essence tender, noble, solemn or affectionate, may become tumultuous, confused and rebellious, so its music may exceed due bounds, defy good governance and seem chaotic and irrational.

Such a distinction as this seems to account for and explain the different reception accorded last night to the "Dante" symphony and that which it met when it was first heard as a whole or in part.

It is such a composition as now appears to be the necessary outcome of a great musical mind, which had been long saturated with the essence of "The Divine Comedy," was original and bold, and had complete control of the vehicles of expression. There can be no question that the first part, representing hell, is not sweet, pleasant, ingratiating or calm. But is it not true, according to any principle of correspondence? Is Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," or are the mortuary frescoes in the Pisa Campo Santo pleasant to look upon? Is there not something deeper than the grotesque in even the "Snap Shots from Hades" that appear in Life? The opening pages, based upon the lines which The Herald quoted on Friday, are stern, imperious, and implacable; but they give the real key to the evolution of the poet's observations and reflections. Under their impression Dante and Virgil began their dreadful, pitying circuit and their every new spectacle only deepened the effect.

The music evokes the sense of pang, horror, woe, bitter, whirling winds, storm and desolation. It presents what Mr. T. B. Aldrich once called felicitously, when describing in a private letter something repugnant and hateful, "a most uncongenial hell." But is not that what an inferno, demoniacally pervaded, should be? So long as the composer does not violate the laws, principles and privileges of his art, it is his duty to make his hell as awesome and menacing as the poet's. Surely Liszt has done so, and the world is now prepared to understand and appreciate. Yet one must not forget the tender beauty, melancholy grace and tempered gloom of the Paolo and Francesca episode, which for a few moments brings fond languor, close, harmonious union and palliated woe into the midst of the fierce fury of rushing wind and cruel elemental persecution.

It has been objected that Liszt's purgatory, if less awful and horrible, is more sad than his hell. Is not that again consistent with the poem? Does not Dante suggest that perhaps the greatest punishment of all for those who may hope and believe in ultimate release and rehabilitation lies in the thought of how much better they might have done in earthly life? The reader of Swedenborg knows how he teaches that a man's last judgment and destination are to be derived from his own memory, as the Egyptian weighed the soul and the Hindoo provided for an open reading of each dead man's book of life. That Liszt should have made his purgatory so woful is, therefore, logical, as his wisdom is to be commended for his not trying to depict a heaven, but only letting its hopeful, happy, pious ascriptions irradiate the end of the probationary state which is just being reached.

The performance was at all points clear, emphatic, perfectly balanced, lively and romantic. The many obligatos, particularly those for the wooden wind, violin and cello, were feelingly played, and Mrs. Kilduff's short Madonna solo stood out sweetly from amid the excellent singing of the female choir, which was drawn chiefly from the Thursday Morning Club and the Choral Art Society.

The same choir sang charmingly and finely two of Brahms' trios for female voices with harp and horn accompaniment and without accompaniment his "Ave Maria" and "Brautlied." All were new in these concerts, and all are interesting, the clever use of the original text helping the effect in a way. But the death song over Trenar, derived from Ossian, has an utterly inappropriate character. It is melancholy, but it has nothing of the weird remote gloom of the haunted wastes and the strange, barbaric passion of the poem.

The two overtures—"Oberon," the ever dreamy and lovely, and "1812," Tschalkowsky's Gilmanesque noisy special celebrant—were played admirably, each after its kind, and Mr. Gericke received his usual tributes of praise for work well done and of anticipated pleasure for next season.

A very hasty digest of the programmes shows that they named 104 numbers, which is a little less than the average.

and that the novelties were 17, which is about one in six, and is liberal. Composers to the number of 55 were quoted, of whom 23 were German or so associated, 14 French, four American, counting in Mr. Loeffler; three each English and Russian and one Swiss. Mr. Converse's "Endymion" had its first public reading. More minute details will be found in the last of Mr. Hale's programme books.

The next season is to begin on Oct. 16 and 17.

LISZT'S IDEA OF DANTE A SYMPHONIC INFERNO

Final Concert of the Twenty-Second Season of the Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the twenty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last evening in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony—"Dante".....Liszt
Two part songs Nos. 1 and 4 from
op. 17.....Brahms
Two part songs Nos. 1 and 2 from
op. 44.....Brahms
Overture—"1812".....Tschalkowsky

The brilliant performance of Weber's familiar overture was followed by a careful and thoughtful reading of Liszt's symphony, "After Dante's 'Divine Comedy.'"

The work is seldom given. Mr. Listemann brought out the "Inferno" here in 1880 and Mr. Gericke performed the whole symphony in 1886.

Liszt's Work.

Liszt's first intention was to write a movement for each section of the "Divine Comedy," but Wagner reminded him that the "Paradise" was the weakest part of Dante's poem and he strongly hinted that Liszt might equally fall with the poet; so Liszt contented himself with a musical picture of the "Inferno" with the Francesca episode, and with the "Purgatorio" at the end of which he introduced the "Magnificat" as a reminder of the "Paradiso." It would be easy to jest about the comparative suffering of him that is obliged to hear the "Inferno" and then the "Purgatorio."

The symphony as a whole is pretentious and dry when it should be terribly frank and of poignant interest; yet there are charming episodes in much of the Francesca chapter and the opening of the "Purgatorio," nor is the treatment of the "Magnificat" without a touch of mysticism and grandeur. But the horrors of hell as put into music by Liszt move us no more than a grotesque old picture of the tortures of the damned, and the fugue in the "Purgatorio" is perhaps the most boring passage in any symphony signed by a great name. The sinner hearing it might well shriek out in agony: "Now for the first time I really know what suffering is."

The Other Pieces.

The female chorus, admirably led by Mr. Gericke, sang with beautiful quality of tone two depressing trios by Brahms, and two songs from Brahms's op. 44, which so shone in contrast that the first was repeated, although these two pieces are not in themselves of much distinction.

The season ended with a performance of Tschalkowsky's "1812," which was composed for a special and out-door occasion, the dedication of the Church of the Redeemer in Moscow. Tschalkowsky himself did not class it with his best works and said that it had no significance outside of Russia; yet there are two exotic themes of haunting beauty, and there are full orchestral moments that stir the blood. Mr. Gericke was warmly received, and there was much applause in the course of the concert.

"POP" CONCERT SERIES OPENS TOMORROW NIGHT

Final Rehearsal of Boston Symphony Crowded With Smart Set.

Mr. Fred Comee is being congratulated upon all sides in securing so popular a leader for the "Pop Concerts" as Mr. "Tim" Adamowski, and the two months' series of these always well attended course of concerts which open tomorrow evening will fill Symphony Hall with one of the largest and most brilliant audiences of the season.

Already there are a large number of tables engaged, and among the fashionables who will be "in evidence" tomorrow night are Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Major and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. George Monks, Mr. Clayton Johns, Miss Ethel Gibson and friends, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Mr. and Mrs. James B. Forsythe, Miss Estelle Kimball and party, Miss Susan Day Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Fred O. North, Mr. Fred S. Converse, Mr. Arthur Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Fairchild, Miss Madelaine Boardman, Miss Tudor and others.

The last of the twenty-four public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the popular leadership of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke called out society en masse at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, when every seat was occupied.

Among the many well known people present were Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, who had Mrs. John C. Fairchild with her; Miss Grace Dabney, who was with Miss Sargent; and Miss Rosamond Saltonstall; Mrs. W. Forbes Conant, Mrs. Charles H. Palne, Miss Brown, Miss Madelaine Boardman, Mrs. Leonard Fowle, Mrs. Sydney Harwood, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. William P. Shrieve, Mrs. George Putnam and her young daughter, Miss May Moseley; Mr. and Mrs. Elliot W. Pratt, Mrs. Horatio Curtis, the Misses Annie and Susie Mills, Mrs. Arthur T. Bradlee, Mrs. Daniel Snow, Miss Mabel Jones, Hon. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, and her daughter, Miss Olivia Thorndike; Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. Arthur A. Haserick, Mrs. Frank Gair Macomber, Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Fred O. North, Mr. William A. Norris, Miss Lizzie Eustis, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Brown, Miss Mary Wetherbee and others.

From The Pops 4/25/1903

One can hardly realize that the twenty-second symphony season ends during the coming week, and on the following Monday evening, May 4, the eighteenth season of the "Pops" is at hand, with the usual eight weeks during May and June. It seems quite unnecessary to go into the details of these popular entertainments, every feature of which will be practically the same as last year, save one very essential factor, the conductor. After five years of most satisfactory and gratifying service by Messrs. Max Zach and Gustav Strube as joint conductors, the management has decided to make a change. Mr. T. Adamowski, who, nine years ago in old Music Hall, conducted during the most successful season ever known in the seventeen years of the Pops, has been selected to again wield the baton over an orchestra of fifty players from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, surely a sufficient guarantee of the musical standing of the concerts.

In connection with this change in the leadership, it may be of interest to recall the conductors from the beginning, seventeen years ago. They were as follows: 1885 Ad Neuendorff, 1886 John C. Mullaly, 1887 Wilhelm Rietzel and Ad Neuendorff, 1888 Franz Kneisel and Ad Neuendorff, 1889 Ad Neuendorff, 1890 No concerts, 1891 T. Adamowski and E. Gruenberg, 1892 T. Adamowski, 1893 T. Adamowski, 1894 T. Adamowski, 1895 A. de Novellis, 1896 Max Zach, 1897 Max Zach and Leo Schultz; and for the past five years, 1898-1902, Messrs. Max Zach and Gustav Strube. All the conductors, with the exception of Neuendorff and Novellis, were members of the Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Adamowski has been busy for the past month with the preparation of some unusually attractive programmes, and his recognized artistic temperament is sure to make itself felt, both in their makeup and rendition.

There will be the usual light refreshments and all the other essential features will again be maintained. Reserved seats, both at the tables on the floor and in the first balcony, will be for sale Monday morning, April 27, at Symphony Hall.

A LOSS TO BOSTON

[From the Springfield Republican]

Music lovers the country over will read with mingled feelings the news that the Kneisel quartet is to leave the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the purpose of making longer tours and developing an even higher degree of artistic excellence in the field of chamber music. The members, Franz Kneisel, Julius Theorowicz, Louis Svecenski, and Alwin Schroeder, address a regretful letter to Mr. Higginson, in which they speak of their desire to visit Europe and make trial of their skill in the larger capitals, and add that as they grow older the labors of quartet and orchestral work become more wearing. Quartets which have achieved high fame, like the Florentine quartet or the Joachim quartet, have not essayed this double work. Mr. Higginson regrets the loss of these talented players, but says that their reasons are good. First-rate musicians will be found to take their places. Mr. Kneisel and his associates will continue to make Boston their headquarters, and while they will be missed from the orchestra, it may be hoped that they will be heard more frequently here in chamber concerts.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS
DURING THE SEASON OF 1902-1903.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
D'ALBERT: Prelude to the Opera, "The Ruby." Nov. 29, 1902,	297
ANON.: "Jeunes Fillettes."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.*) April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1096
ARENSKY: Introduction to "Nala and Damayanti." Jan. 24, 1903 . . . . .	641
BACH: Overture (Suite) No. 2, in B minor, for strings, flute, and pianoforte accompaniment. Oct. 18, 1902 . . . . .	10
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violin.* (FRANZ KNEISEL.†) Dec. 6, 1902 . . . . .	370
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21. April 25, 1903 . . . . .	1249
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55. Dec. 6, 1902 . . . . .	389
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60. Nov. 15, 1902 . . . . .	212
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67. Feb. 14, 1903 . . . . .	836
Overture to "Leonore" No. 2, in C major, Op. 72. Oct. 18, 1902 . . . . .	5
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73. (FREDERIC LAMOND.) Nov. 1, 1902 . . . . .	134
Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 61. (HUGO HEER- MANN.) Feb. 28, 1903 . . . . .	867
Andante cantabile from pianoforte trio in B-flat major, Op. 97 (arranged by LISZT). Jan. 31, 1903 . . . . .	712
Recitative and Song, "To Hope," Op. 94.* (ANTON VAN ROOY.*) Nov. 22, 1902 . . . . .	255
BERLIOZ: Love Scene and "Queen Mab" Scherzo from "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Dec. 27, 1902, and Feb. 7, 1903 . . . . .	478, 758
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9. Oct. 25, 1902 . . . . .	61
Overture, "The Fehmic Judges," Op. 3.* Dec. 6, 1902 . . . . .	357
BIZET: Suite, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1. Nov. 15, 1902 . . . . .	194
BORODIN: "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, Op. 7. April 18, 1903 . . . . .	1216
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. Dec. 27, 1902 . . . . .	502
Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90. Nov. 1, 1902 . . . . .	121
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 (orchestrated by ALBERT PARLOW). Jan. 24, 1903 . . . . .	656
Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 77. (MAUD MAC- CARTHY.) Nov. 15, 1902 . . . . .	192
Two Part-songs for female voices (with harp and horns), Op. 17: "Es tönt ein voller Harfenklang,"* "Wein' an den Felsen."* May 2, 1903 . . . . .	1315

258

Two Part-songs for female voices a capella , Op. 44: "Minnelied,"* "Der Bräutigam."* May 2, 1903 . . . . .	1318
CHARPENTIER: "Impressions of Italy," orchestral suite. March 14, 1903 . . . . .	1004
CHERUBINI: Overture to the Opera, "The Water-carrier." Feb. 7, 1903 . . . . .	753
CONVERSE, F. S.: "Endymion's Narrative," romance for orchestra, Op. 10.† April 11, 1903 . . . . .	1162
DVOŘÁK: Symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World," Op. 95. Jan. 10, 1903 . . . . .	614
Symphonic Variations on an original theme, Op. 78. Nov. 22, 1902 . . . . .	262
ELGAR: "Sea Pictures":* "Sea Slumber Song" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," Op. 37. (MME. KIRKBY LUNN.) Jan. 3, 1903 . . . . .	556
EXAUDET: Minuet.* (CHARLES GILIBERT.*) April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1095
FIBICH: Overture to Vrchlicky's Comedy, "A Night at Karlstein," Op. 26. Jan. 31, 1903 . . . . .	697
FOOTE: Suite in D minor, I. II., Op. 36. March 28, 1903 . . . . .	1062
FRANCK: "The Æolidæ," symphonic poem. Dec. 20, 1902 . . . . .	443
GLUCK: Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis." April 18, 1903 . . . . .	1197
GOLDMARK: Chorus of Spirits and Spirits' Dance from "Merlin" Jan. 10, 1903 . . . . .	598
GOUNOD: "Stanzas of Sappho." (MME. KIRKBY LUNN.) Jan. 3, 1903 . . . . .	536
GUILMANT: Symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1, Op. 42.* (WALLACE GOODRICH.) April 11, 1903 . . . . .	1172
HAYDN: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 10). Dec. 20, 1902 . . . . .	417
Symphony in D major, "The Chase." Feb. 28, 1903 . . . . .	896
HUBER: Symphony No. 2, E minor, "Böcklin," Op. 115. Oct. 25, 1902 . . . . .	86
LISZT: Dante Symphony. May 2, 1903 . . . . .	1307
Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Dec. 6, 1902 . . . . .	381
March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus." Dec. 20, 1902 . . . . .	447
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte. (MARK HAMBOURG.) Jan. 24, 1903 . . . . .	648
See SCHUBERT: "Wanderer" Fantasia . . . . .	28
See BEETHOVEN: Andante from pianoforte trio in B-flat.
LITOLFF: Overture, "King Lear." April 11, 1903 . . . . .	1141
LOEFFLER: Two Poems for orchestra: "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine), "Villanelle du Diable" (after Rollinat). 540
MACKENZIE: "Pibroch" Suite for violin and orchestra, Op. 42.* (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.†) Jan. 31, 1903 . . . . .	702
MARTINI, ÉGIDE: "Plaisir d'Amour."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.*) April 4, 1903.
MASSÉ: "L'Oiseau s'envole là-bas."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.*) April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1115
MASSENET: "Pensée d'Automne."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.*) April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1115

259

MENDELSSOHN: Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90. Nov. 22, 1902 . . . . .	237
Overture in C minor to "Ruy Blas," Op. 95. April 25, 1903, 1282
MOTTL: See SCHUBERT.
MOZART: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter." Jan. 24, 1903 . . . . .	668
Symphony in D major, "without minuet" (K. 504). March 28, 1903 . . . . .	1033
"Il mio Tesoro," from "Don Giovanni."* (BEN DAVIES.) April 11, 1903 . . . . .	1156
PARKER, HORATIO: Concerto in E-flat for organ and orchestra, Op. 55.† (H. PARKER.*) Dec. 27, 1902 . . . . .	473
PARLOW: See LISZT.
RAFF: "Lenore," Symphony No. 5, in E major, Op. 177. April 18, 1903 . . . . .	1224
REINHOLD: Prelude, Minuet, and Fugue, Op. 10. April 4, 1903, 1114
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar." Nov. 15, 1902 . . . . .	181
RUBINSTEIN: Symphony in C major, No. 2, "Ocean," Op. 42 (second version), I., III., IV., VII. Jan. 3, 1903 . . . . .	529
Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for 'cello and orchestra, Op. 96 (ELSA RUEGGER.) Oct. 25, 1902 . . . . .	71
SAINT-SAËNS: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," Op. 31. Oct. 25, 1902 . . . . .	85
Concerto in A minor for 'cello, Op. 33. (ALWIN SCHROEDER.†) Jan. 10, 1903 . . . . .	595
Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for pianoforte, Op. 22. (ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.) March 28, 1903. . . . .	1042
SCHUBERT: Symphony in C major, No. 9. March 7, 1903 . . . . .	951
Overture in E minor. Feb. 28, 1903 . . . . .	865
Fantasia in F minor, Op. 103 (orchestrated by FELIX MOTTL). Nov. 29, 1902 . . . . .	304
Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), Op. 15, rearranged by LISZT. (RAOUL PUGNO.*) Oct. 18, 1902 . . . . .	28
SCHUMANN, GEORG: Overture, "The Dawn of Love," Op. 28. March 14, 1903 . . . . .	977
SCHUMANN, ROBERT: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61. Nov. 29, 1902 . . . . .	327
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," Op. 97. Feb. 7, 1903 . . . . .	784
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52. April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1117
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81. Jan. 10, 1903 . . . . .	585
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 54. (FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.) Feb. 14, 1903 . . . . .	818
SMETANA: Symphonic Poem, "Richard III." April 25, 1903 . . . . .	1274
STRAUSS, RICHARD: "Don Juan," tone-poem (after Lenau), Op. 20. Nov. 1, 1902 . . . . .	144
"Death and Transfiguration," tone-poem, Op. 24. Feb. 7, 1903 . . . . .	762
Burleske in D minor for pianoforte and orchestra. (HEINRICH GEBHARD.) April 18, 1903 . . . . .	1210
SUK: Suite, "A Fairy Tale," Op. 16. Nov. 29, 1902 . . . . .	320
SVENDSEN: "The Carnival at Paris," episode, Op. 9. March 28, 1903 . . . . .	1064

260

TANEÏEFF: Overture to "The Oresteia" of Æschylus, Op. 6. Feb. 14, 1903 . . . . .	809
THOMAS, A. GORING: "O Vision Entrancing," from the opera, "Esmeralda."* (BEN DAVIES.) April 11, 1903 . . . . .	1168
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64. Oct. 18, 1902 . . . . .	30
"Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. March 14, 1903 . . . . .	980
Suite No. 3, in G major, Op. 55. Jan. 31, 1903 . . . . .	727
Overture in E-flat major, "1812," Op. 49. May 2, 1903, . . . . .	1323
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23. (HAROLD RANDOLPH.*) Dec. 20, 1902 . . . . .	430
WAGNER: A "Faust" Overture. March 7, 1903 . . . . .	921
Introduction and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" (orchestral). Jan. 3, 1903 . . . . .	561
Kaisermarsch. Nov. 1, 1902 . . . . .	152
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Wal- küre." (ANTON VAN ROOY.*) Nov. 22, 1902 . . . . .	266
A Siegfried Idyl. Feb. 14, 1903 . . . . .	824
WEBER: Overture to "Oberon." May 2, 1903 . . . . .	1305
WEINGARTNER: "The Elysian Fields," symphonic poem, Op. 21. March 7, 1903 . . . . .	936
WIDOR: Choral and Variations for harp and orchestra, Op. 74. (H. SCHUËCKER,† harpist.) Feb. 28, 1903 . . . . .	876
WIENIAWSKI: Fantasy on themes from Gounod's "Faust," Op. 20.* (ADOLF BAK.†) April 25, 1903 . . . . .	1256
WITKOWSKI: Symphony in D minor. April 4, 1903 . . . . .	1085

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES.

HUBER: Symphony No. 2, E minor, Op. 115. Oct. 25, 1902.
WITKOWSKI: Symphony in D minor. April 4, 1903 . . . . .	2

SYMPHONIC POEMS.

SMETANA. "Richard III." April 25, 1903.
WEINGARTNER: "The Elysian Fields", Op. 21. March 7, 1903. . . . .	2

OVERTURES.

ARENSKY: "Nala and Damayanti." Jan. 24, 1903.
FIBICH: "A Night at Karlstein," Op. 26. Jan. 31, 1903.
LITOLFF: "King Lear." April 11, 1903.
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "The Betrothed of the Tsar." Nov. 15, 1902.
SCHUMANN, GEORG: "The Dawn of Love," Op. 28. March 14, 1903 . . . . .	5

SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.

CONVERSE: "Endymion's Narrative,"† romance for orchestra, Op. 10. April 11, 1903.
LISZT: March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus." Dec. 20, 1902.

261

SUK: Suite, "A Fairy Tale," Op. 16. Nov. 29, 1902 . . . . .	3
---	---

CONCERTOS, ETC.

MACKENZIE: "Pibroch" Suite for violin, Op. 42. First time with orchestra. (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.†) Jan. 31, 1903.
PARKER, H.: Concerto in E-flat for organ and orchestra, Op. 55. (HORATIO PARKER.*) Dec. 27, 1903.
RUBINSTEIN: Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for violoncello and or- chestra, Op. 96. (ELSA RUEGGER.) Oct. 25, 1902.
STRAUSS, R.: Burleske for pianoforte and orchestra. (HEIN- RICH GEBHARD) April 18, 1903.
WIDOR: Choral and Variations for harp and orchestra, Op. 74. (HEINRICH SCHUËCKER.†) Feb. 28, 1903. . . . .	5

OPERATIC TRANSCRIPTIONS.

GOLDMARK: Chorus of Spirits and Spirits' Dance from "Merlin." Jan. 10, 1903 . . . . .	1
Total number of works produced this season for the first time . . . . .	18

SUMMARY.

D'ALBERT . . . . .	1	MARTINI . . . . .	1
ANON. . . . .	1	MASSÉ . . . . .	1
ARENSKY . . . . .	1	MASSENET . . . . .	1
BACH . . . . .	2	MENDELSSOHN . . . . .	2
BEETHOVEN . . . . .	9	MOZART . . . . .	3
BERLIOZ . . . . .	4	PARKER, H. . . . .	1
BIZET . . . . .	1	RAFF . . . . .	1
BORODIN . . . . .	1	REINHOLD . . . . .	1
BRAHMS . . . . .	8	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF . . . . .	1
CHARPENTIER . . . . .	1	RUBINSTEIN . . . . .	2
CHERUBINI . . . . .	1	SAINT-SAËNS . . . . .	3
CONVERSE . . . . .	1	SCHUBERT . . . . .	4
DVOŘÁK . . . . .	2	SCHUMANN, G. . . . .	1
ELGAR . . . . .	2	SCHUMANN, R. . . . .	5
EXAUDET . . . . .	1	SMETANA . . . . .	1
FIBICH . . . . .	1	STRAUSS, R. . . . .	3
FOOTE . . . . .	1	SUK . . . . .	1
FRANCK . . . . .	1	SVENDSEN . . . . .	1
GLUCK . . . . .	1	TANÉÏEFF . . . . .	1
GOLDMARK . . . . .	1	THOMAS, A. G. . . . .	1
GOUNOD . . . . .	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . . .	5
GUILMANT . . . . .	1	WAGNER . . . . .	5
HAYDN . . . . .	2	WEBER . . . . .	1
HUBER . . . . .	1	WEINGARTNER . . . . .	1
LISZT . . . . .	4	WIDOR . . . . .	1
LITOLFF . . . . .	1	WIENIAWSKI . . . . .	1
LOEFFLER . . . . .	2	WITKOWSKI . . . . .	1
MACKENZIE . . . . .	1

SUMMARY BY WORKS.

I. SYMPHONIES.

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21.
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica," Op. 55.

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60.	4
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67 . . . . .	2
BERLIOZ: Love Scene and "Queen Mab" Scherzo from "Romeo and Juliet," dramatic symphony, Op. 17 . . . . .	2
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.	2
Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90 . . . . .	1
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95 . . . . .	1
GUILMANT: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, for organ and orchestra, Op. 42.* (WALLACE GOODRICH, organist) . . . . .	1
HAYDN: Symphony in D major, "The Chase."	2
Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 10) . . . . .	1
HUBER: Symphony No. 2, in E minor, "Böcklin," Op. 115 . . . . .	1
LISZT: Symphony after Dante's "Divine Comedy" . . . . .	1
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 . . . . .	2
MOZART: Symphony in D major, "without minuet" (K. 504). Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (K. 551) . . . . .	1
RAFF: Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," Op. 177 . . . . .	1
RUBINSTEIN: Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," Op. 42, second version, I., III., IV., VII. . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 9, in C major . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61. Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "Rhenish," Op. 97 . . . . .	2
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64 . . . . .	1
WITKOWSKI: Symphony in D minor . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	24

II. SUITES AND SERENADES.

BACH: Overture (suite) No. 2, in B minor, for strings, flute, and pianoforte accompaniment . . . . .	1
BIZET: Suite, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1 . . . . .	1
CHARPENTIER: Suite, "Impressions of Italy" . . . . .	1
FOOTE: Suite in D minor, Op. 36. I. Allegro energico. II. Espressivo . . . . .	1
REINHOLD: Prelude, Minute, and Fugue for strings, Op. 10 . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN: Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52 . . . . .	1
SUK: Suite, "A Fairy Tale," Op. 16 . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Suite No. 3, in G major, Op. 55 . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	8

III. SYMPHONIC POEMS.

FRANCK, CÉSAR: Symphonic Poem, "The Æolidæ" . . . . .	1
LISZT: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph" . . . . .	1
LOEFFLER: Two Poems: "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine), "Villanelle du Diable" (after Rollinat) . . . . .	2
SAINT-SAËNS: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," Op. 31 . . . . .	1
SMETANA: Symphonic Poem, "Richard III." . . . . .	1
STRAUSS, RICHARD: Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20. Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 . . . . .	2
WEINGARTNER: Symphonic Poem, "The Elysian Fields," Op. 21 . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	9

IV. OVERTURES.

D'ALBERT: Prelude to the Opera, "The Ruby" . . . . .	1
ARENSKY: Introduction to the Opera, "Nala and Damayanti," . . . . .	1
BEETHOVEN: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major, Op. 72, . . . . .	1
BERLIOZ: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9. Overture to "The Fehmic Judges," Op. 3* . . . . .	2
CHERUBINI: Overture to the Opera, "The Water-carrier" . . . . .	1
FIBICH: Overture to Vrchlický's Comedy, "A Night at Karlstein," Op. 26 . . . . .	1
GLUCK: Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" (WAGNER's ending) . . . . .	1
LITOLFF: Overture to the Opera, "King Lear" . . . . .	1
MENDELSSOHN: Overture in C minor to Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas," Op. 95. . . . .	1
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Overture to the Opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar" . . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Overture in E minor . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN, GEORG: Overture, "The Dawn of Love," Op. 28 . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN, ROBERT: Overture to the Opera, "Genoveva," Op. 81 . . . . .	1
TANÉIEFF: Overture, "L'Oresteia" . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. Overture in E-flat major, "1812," Op. 49 . . . . .	2
WAGNER: A "Faust" Overture . . . . .	1
WEBER: Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	19

V. ORCHESTRAL VARIATIONS.

DVOŘÁK: Symphonic Variations on an original theme, Op. 78 . . . . .	1
WIDOR: Choral and Variations for harp and orchestra, Op. 74 . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	2

VI. OPERATIC EXCERPTS AND TRANSCRIPTIONS.

BEETHOVEN: Andante cantabile from the pianoforte trio, in B-flat major, Op. 97 (orchestrated by LISZT) . . . . .	1
BRAHMS: Hungarian Dances, Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 (orchestrated by ALBERT PARLOW) . . . . .	1
GOLDMARK: Chorus of Spirits and Spirit's Dance from "Merlin," . . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Fantasia in F minor, Op. 103 (orchestrated by FELIX MOTTI) . . . . .	1
WAGNER: Introduction and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . .	1
Total . . . . .	5

VII. MISCELLANEOUS.

BORODIN: "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, Op. 7 . . . . .	1
CONVERSE: "Endymion's Narrative," romance for orchestra, Op. 10† . . . . .	1

364

LISZT: March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus" 	I
SVENDSEN: "Carnival at Paris," episode for orchestra, Op. 9	I
WAGNER: Kaisermarsch	I
A Siegfried Idyl	I
Total	6

VIII. CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS WITH ORCHESTRA.

BACH: Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violin.* (FRANZ KNEISEL.†)	I
BEETHOVEN: Concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, for pianoforte, Op. 73. (FREDERIC LAMOND.)
Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 61. (HUGO HEERMANN)	2
BRAHMS: Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 77. (MAUD MACCARTHY)	I
LISZT: Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte. (MARK HAMBOURG)	I
MACKENZIE: "Pibroch" Suite for violin and orchestra, Op. 42.* (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI†)	I
PARKER, H. Concerto in E-flat for organ and orchestra, Op. 55. (HORATIO PARKER*)	I
RUBINSTEIN: Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 96.* (ELSA RUEGGER)	I
SAINT-SAËNS: Concerto in A minor for violoncello, Op. 33. (ALWIN SCHROEDER.†)
Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for pianoforte, Op. 22. (ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.)	2
SCHUBERT: Grand Fantasia in C major, "Wanderer," Op. 15, arranged and orchestrated by LISZT. (RAOUL PUGNO.*)	I
SCHUMANN: Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 54. (FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER)	I
STRAUSS, R.: Burleske in D minor for pianoforte and orchestra. (HEINRICH GEBHARD)	I
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, for pianoforte, Op. 23. (HAROLD RANDOLPH*)	I
WIENIAWSKI: Fantasia on themes from Gounod's "Faust."* (ADOLF BAK†)	I
Total	15

IX. VOCAL MUSIC: SCENES, ARIAS, DUETS, QUARTETS, ETC.

ANON.: "Jeunes Fillettes."* (CHARLES GILIBERT*)	I
BEETHOVEN: Recitative and Song, "To Hope," Op. 94.* (ANTON VAN ROOY*)	I
BRAHMS: Two Part-songs for female voices, with harp and horns, Op. 17: "Es tönt ein voller Harfenklang," "Wein an den Felsen."*
Two Part-songs for female voices, a capella , Op. 44: "Minnelied," "Der Bräutigam"*	4
ELGAR: Two Songs of the cycle, "Sea Pictures," Op. 37.* (KIRKBY LUNN)	2
EXAUDET: Minuet.* (CHARLES GILIBERT*)	I
GOUNOD: Stanzas of Sappho. (KIRKBY LUNN)	I

265

MARTINI, ÉGIDE: "Plaisir d'Amour."* (CHARLES GILIBERT*)	I
MASSÉ: "L'Oiseau s'envole là-bas."* (CHARLES GILIBERT*)	I
MASSENET: "Pensée d'Automne."* (CHARLES GILIBERT*)	I
MOZART: "Il mio Tesoro,"* from "Don Giovanni." (BEN DAVIES)	I
THOMAS, GORING: "O Vision Entrancing," from "Esmeralda."* (BEN DAVIES)	I
WAGNER: "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walküre." (ANTON VAN ROOY*)	I
Total	16

NOTE.—The Romance from "Euryanthe" and Beethoven's "Adelaide" (pages 979 and 1003) were not sung, on account of the sickness of Mr. Ellison Van Hoose.

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

MR. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI,† violinist. Jan. 31, 1903. Mackenzie's "Pibroch" suite, Op. 42*	710
MR. ADOLF BAK,† violinist. April 25, 1903. Wieniawski's Fantasia on themes from Gounod's "Faust"*	1256
MME. FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, pianist. Feb. 14, 1903. Schumann's Concerto in A minor. (Sketch)	822
MR. BEN DAVIES, tenor. April 11, 1903. "Il mio Tesoro,"* from "Don Giovanni," and "O Vision Entrancing,"* from Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda."* (Sketch)	1152
MR. HEINRICH GEBHARD, pianist. April 18, 1903. R. Strauss's Burleske	1210
MR. CHARLES GILIBERT,* baritone. April 4, 1903. Songs by Martini,* Exaudet,* Massenet,* Massé,* Anon.* (Sketch)	1094
MR. WALLACE GOODRICH, organist. April 11, 1903. Guilmant's Symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra, No. 1*	1172
MR. MARK HAMBOURG, pianist. Jan. 24, 1903. Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1. (Sketch)	654
MR. HUGO HEERMANN, violinist. Feb. 28, 1903. Beethoven's Concerto in D major, Op. 61. (Sketch)	875
MME. KIRKBY LUNN, mezzo-soprano. Jan. 3, 1903. Stanzas of Sappho, Gounod; Two of Elgar's "Sea Pictures."* (Sketch)	536
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,† violinist. Dec. 6, 1902. Bach's Concerto in A minor*	370
MR. FREDERIC LAMOND, pianist. Nov. 1, 1902. Beethoven's Concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73. (Sketch)	134
MISS MAUD MACCARTHY, violinist. Nov. 15, 1902. Brahms's Concerto in D major, Op. 77. (Sketch)	191
MR. HORATIO PARKER,* organist. Dec. 27, 1902. His Concerto in E-flat, Op. 55.† (Sketch)	475
MR. RAOUL PUGNO,* pianist. Oct. 18, 1902. Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer" Fantasia. (Sketch)	24

MR. HAROLD RANDOLPH,* pianist. Dec. 20, 1902. Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23. (Sketch)	428
MISS ELSA RUEGGER, 'cellist. Oct. 25, 1902. Rubinstein's Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 96.* (Sketch)	71
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER,† 'cellist. Jan. 10, 1903. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor, Op. 33	595
MME. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, pianist. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor. March 28, 1903	1042
MR. ANTON VAN ROOY,* baritone. Nov. 22, 1902. Beethoven's "To Hope," Op. 94,* Wotan's Farewell	255, 266

**

Mezzo-soprano: Mme. Kirkby Lunn	I
Tenor: Mr. Ben Davies	I
Baritones: Messrs. Gilibert* and Van Rooy*	2
Pianists: Mme. Bloomfield-Zeissler, Messrs. Gebhard, Hambourg, Lamond, Pugno,* Randolph,* Mme. Szumowska	7
Organists: Messrs. Goodrich and Parker*	2
Violinists: Messrs. Adamowski,† Bak,† Heermann, Kneisel,† Miss MacCarthy	5
Violoncellists: Miss Ruegger, Mr. Schroeder†	2
Total	20

ENTR'ACTES.

BLACKBURN, VERNON: "The Tribe of Salieri"	316
"Berlioz: The 'Grand Traité'"	608
"Contemporaneous Criticism"	833
"Music and Speech"	892
"A Note on Mozart's 'Don Giovanni'"	1048
"Faust in Music"	1054
"A Note on Planquette"	1258
"Mechanism in Music"	1260
HALE, PHILIP: "Queen Omphale in Legend and Art"	74
"Beethoven as a Pianist"	130
"The Neo-Russian School and Opera"	660
"Tschaikowsky's First Love and Amazing Marriage"	716
"The Esterházy Orchestra"	886
"Concerning an Alleged Decay in the Art of Song"	1098
"The Ending of Smetana"	1267
Pall Mall Gazette: "Noise as a Factor in Plot"	776
Pall Mall Gazette: "Music in Lent"	1110
RUNCIMAN, JOHN F.: "The Hero Wotan"	262
SYMONS, ARTHUR: "On Musical Criticisms"	310
VILLIERS DE L'ISLE ADAM: "The Slayer of Swans" (Englished by Philip Hale)	1058
ZOLA, EMILE: "Daudet's 'L'Arlésienne'" (Englished by William F. Apthorp)	210
LIST OF CASTS IN SYMPHONY HALL	1233

MERRIMENT ON WINGS OF ADAMOWSKI'S MUSIC

First "Pop" Concert Proves a Joyous Resurrection.

FASHION WAS OUT IN FORCE

Return of Popular Series Welcomed by Big Attendance and Excellent Playing.

Conductor Adamowski,

Who opened the "Pop" concert season in Symphony Hall.

It was with dress and drink, music and merriment, laughter and light that the "pop" concert season opened at Symphony Hall last evening. Fashion was there and it was representative. The compositions of the masters were artistically played by the Symphony Orchestra. Timothy Adamowski was there and he was given an ovation, from the opening Wagner selection to the last strains of the "Coronation March" by Gernan.

In every way the first night was a success. Corks were lifted by ubiquitous waiters from the imprisoning glass that held them as tightly as winter seems to hold spring, but with the warmth within and the spirit of freedom that was everywhere it seemed as if the austerity of dull, drear days had gone and there had come to replace it the breath of summer and the unconventionality of life in the fields.

Representative of Fashion.

The audience was representative of fashion and youth. It was young, and being young, it enjoyed. Every table was filled, and if the applause that greeted each number was not more than enthusiastic it was because the word "popular" was badly used as the talisman of the summer concert season.

The program was not "popular" in the ordinary acceptance of the term. It was rather classical, and there was no number that could enthuse him who did not know music as the critics think he ought to know it.

Some went to hear the music. More went to see who was there to hear the music. They went to chat, and Maestro "Tim" often had to use his baton rather freely on his music rack to restore the degree of order that he deemed necessary to a full appreciation of his work and that of the musicians who were accompanying him.

Conductor Insisted on Order.

Some of them perhaps thought that the renowned conductor was interfering with their privileges when he spoke so loudly with his little stick, but he usually conquered in this regard, as he did with his music, and when it was all over even those who talked forgot all but that the evening had been a pleasant one.

Four Numbers New Here.

The program was as follows:

"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" Wagner
Intermezzo—"Contes d'Hoffmann" Offenbach
Suite from Ballet, "La Belle au Dormant" Tschalkowski (First time.)
Concert overture—"In Bohemia" H. K. Hadley (First time.)
Suite—"Henry VIII." Saint-Saëns
Hymn to St. Cecilia Gounod
Violin solo, Mr. Karl Ondricek.
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Festival march R. Strauss (First time.)
Salut D'Amour Ed. Elgar (First time.)

Espana Chabrier
Overture—"Fiedermaus" Joh. Strauss
Coronation March Ed. German

The four compositions offered here for the first time proved immensely popular, especially the Puccini number in La Boheme.

Every table was occupied and the audience was fashionable, as the unseasonable weather had detained a number of the fashionables in town later than usual. Those who entertained parties of friends were Major and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Miss Madelaine Boardman, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Miss Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. John Fairchild, Dr. George Monks, Arthur Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Clayton Johns the composer, Mr. and Mrs. Fred S. Converse, Miss Tudor, Otis Kimball and friends, Mr. and Mrs. Fred O. North, Miss Susan Day Kimball.

Some of the Gowns.

Mrs. Sears was in pale gray veiling with a long light blue wrap, and Mrs. Fairchild in black robe and petted lace. She wore a large picture hat of black and white feathers. Mrs. Higginson was in black and white silk. Mrs. Gericke was in panne velvet and wore a large black hat. Mrs. Josef Adamowski was in pale gray crepe de chine and wore a black hat. Miss Estelle Kimball, with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Kimball, was in pale gray crepe with a large flower picture hat. Mrs. Kimball was in black lace.

Others present were Colonel Charles Sampson, Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Pitman, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Taggard, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Souther, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howard, John J. Turner, John Stone Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Stanwood, Josef Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Jones, Dr. and Mrs. J. Foster Bush and their daughter, Miss Bush, Otto Roth, Miss Boardman.

VOLUME 23

1903-1904

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.

THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★ M 125.5 vol. 23

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1903-1904 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. J. Spence, Del.

Copy 125 5. vol. 23
 Allen A. Brown
 Oct. 1, 1904

Jan. 2 Dec. 26 Dec. 19 Dec. 5 Nov. 28 Nov. 14 Oct. 31 Oct. 24 Oct. 17
 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Jan. 9 Jan. 23 Jan. 30 Jan. 6
 11 12 13 14

SYMPHONY HALL
 BOSTON
 HUNTINGTON &
 MASSACHUSETTS AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE
 CONDUCTOR

CONCERTS:
 SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
 TWENTY-THIRD SEASON, 1903-1904

15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24
 Feb. 13 Feb. 27 Mar. 5 Mar. 12 Mar. 26 Apr. 2 Apr. 9 Apr. 16 Apr. 23 Apr. 30

Second Balcony
 RIGHT
A 10

Jan. 2	Dec. 26	Dec. 19	Dec. 5	Nov. 28	Nov. 14	Oct. 31	Oct. 24	Oct. 17
10	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1

Jan. 9
11

Jan. 23
12

Jan. 30
13

Feb. 6
14

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON
HUNTINGTON &
MASSACHUSETTS AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERIGKE
CONDUCTOR

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-THIRD SEASON, 1903-1904

RIGHT

A 10

Second Balcony

15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
Feb. 13	Feb. 27	Mar. 5	Mar. 12	Mar. 26	Apr. 2	Apr. 9	Apr. 16	Apr. 23	Apr. 30

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

ADDRESS
214 Boylston St. Boston

NAME
Marian Davenport

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Date of Performance
Aklimentko, Th:	"Lyric Poem" op 20	XVI	Feb 27.04
Albani, Eug'd	Ouv: "The Improvisatore"	X	Jan 2.04
Arbos, E. F.	"Tango" Violin & Orch. op 6 no. 2. E. F. Arbos	II	Oct 24.03
Bach J. S.	"If thou thy heart bestowest" with Piano Miss Marguerite Hale	XXIII	Apr 23.04
Bergel	Ouv. to "Medea" op 22	IX	Dec 26.03
Beethoven	Symphony No 2. op 36	IV	Nov 14.03
	" " 7. " 92	XV	Feb 13.04
	" " 8. " 93	IX	Dec 26.03
	" " 9 " 125	Pension Concert	Apr 13.04
	Ouv. C maj. op 115	II	Oct 24.03
	" " Coriolanus" op 62	XVIII	Mar 12.04
	" " Egmont	Pension Concert	Apr 13.04
	" " Fidelio" op 72	VI	Nov 28.03
	" " Leonora" op 72. 2	XX	Apr 2.04
	Concerto Violin & Orch. op 61	XIV	Feb 6.04
	Miss Olive Mead
	Soloists for the 9th Symphony
	Mrs Kilesti - Bradbury
	Miss Pauline Woltman
	Mr Th. von Yonx
	Mr Sullivan Sargent
	- Handel & Haydn Chorus -
Berlioz, H.	"Harold in Italy" - Symphony -	VII	Dec 5.03
Bizet, Geo:	"Quand la flamme d'amour" Chas. Gillebert	X	Jan 2.04

Index

Composers	Name of Work	Date of Performance
Aklmentko, Th:	'Lyrical Poem' op 20	XVI Feb 27.04
Albani, Eug: d'	Ow: 'The Improvisatore'	X Jan 2.04
Arbos, E. F.	'Tango' Violin & Orch. op 6 no. 2. E. F. Arbos	II Oct 24.03
Bach J. S.	"If thou thy heart bestowest" with Piano Miss Marguerite Hale	XXIII Apr 23.04
Bergiel	Ow. to 'Medea' op 22	IX Dec 26.03
Beethoven	Symphony No 2. op 36	IV Nov 14.03
	" " 7. " 92	XV Feb 13.04
	" " 8. " 93	IX Dec 26.03
	" " 9 " 125	Pension Concert Apr 13.04
	Ow. C. maj: op 115	II Oct 24.03
	" " Coriolanus' op 62	XVII Nov 12.04
	" " Egmont	Pension Concert Apr 13.04
	" " Fidelio' op 72	VI Nov 28.03
	" " Leonora' op 72. 2	XX Apr 2.04
	Concerto Violin & Orch. op. 61	XIV Feb 6.04
	Miss Olive Mead
	Soloist for the 9th Symphony
	Mrs Kilecki - Bradbury
	Miss Pauline Holtman
	Mr Th. von Giese
	Mr William Sargent
	- Handel & Haydn Chorus -
Berlioz, H.	'Harold in Italy' - Symphony -	VII Dec 5.03
Bizet, Geo:	'Quand la flamme d'amour'	X Jan 2.04
	Chas. Gilebert

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME

Mrs. Davenport

ADDRESS

214 Boylston St. Boston

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

Brahms, J.	Symphony No. 2. op 73	I	Oct. 17. 03
"	" " 4. " 98	XIV	Feb 6. 04
Academic Ovr.	op 80	VII	Dec 5. 03
Fragile Ovr.	" 81	XIX	Mar 29. 04
Concerto Violin & Orch.	op 77	VIII	Dec 19. 03
Miss Maud MacCarthy
Longing at Rest	} Songs with Viola & Piano	XVI	Feb 27. 04
Cradle Song of the Virgin
Frau Schumann - Heink
Bruch, M.	Fantaisie on Scotch Airs op 46. V <sup>o</sup> 1 orch	VI	Nov 28. 03
Alex. L. Birnbaum
'Andromache's Lament' from 'Achilles'	op 50	XVI	Feb 27. 04
Schumann - Heink
Aria from 'Odysseus'		XXIII	Apr 23. 04
Miss Marquiste Hall
Bruckner A.	Symphony No. 9 in D min:	XX	Apr 2. 04
Bruneau	Ent'acte 'Messidor'	I	Oct 17. 03
Campo	'Charmant Papillon' with Piano	XI	Jan 9. 04
Mad. William Blauvelt
Chabrier, Em:	Ovr: 'Gwendoline'	XVI	Feb 27. 04
Chadwick G.W.	Concert ovr: 'Euterpe'	XXIII	Apr 23. 04
Cherubini	Ovr: 'Anacreon'	XV	Feb 13. 04
Delibes	'Pourquoi' with Piano	XI	Jan 9. 04
Mad. William Blauvelt
Dohnanyi	Symphony in D min:	VI	Nov 28. 03
Dubois Th:	Ovr: 'Fritthof'	XIV	Feb 6. 04
Dvorak	Symphony No 2. op 76	V	Nov 21. 03
'Song - Gute Nacht'		XX	Apr 2. 04
Miss Muriel Foster

Elgar Ed.	Var. on an Orig. Theme, op 36	IX	Dec 26. 03
"	" " " "	XXIII	Apr 13. 04
Prelude to the 'Dream of Gerontius'		XXIX	Mar 26. 04
Gluck	'Che Faro' from 'Orpheus'	XXI	Apr 2. 04
Miss Muriel Foster
Glazounoff	Symphony No. 4 - op 48 in E flat	II	Oct 24. 03
" " "		X	Jan 2. 04
Ovr. 'Carnival' op 45		XXI	Apr 9. 04
Goldmark C.	Ovr: 'Sakuntala' op 13	II
Gounod Ch.	Waltz from 'Romeo & Juliette'	Pension Grant	Dec 27. 03
Madame Melba
Grieg, Ed:	'Peer Gynt' Suite No. 1.	Pension Grant	Dec 27. 03
Handel	'Largo' for Violin, 5 Harps & Organ	Pension Grant	Dec 27. 03
Scene: 'Sweet Bird'		IX	Dec 26. 03
Mad. Melba
Haydn	Symphony No 1. c maj. Br. H.	XXI	Apr 9. 04
" " 9 Cmi: "		VIII	Dec 19. 03
Kopchinski, H.	Concert Piece for Piano & Orch. in D min	XXII	Apr 18. 04
Helen Kopchinski
Kuro H. H.	Concerto for Piano & Orch. op 11	IV	Nov 14. 03
Adela Aus der Ohe
Indy, Vin: d'	'La Forêt Enchantée' op 8	III	Oct 31. 03
Ent'acte 'L'Etranger'		XXII	Mar 5. 04
Kaun, Hugo	Symph. Poem "Minnchahn" op 41-1	XXIX	Jan 30. 04
Lalo E.	Spanish Rhapsodie V <sup>o</sup> orch. op 21	XXVIII	Mar 12. 04
T. Adamowski

Liszt F.	Symphonic Poem "The Ideale" Natr	V	Nov 21.03
	" " "The Preludes"	XXI	Apr 9.04
	Piano Concerto No 1. Geo. Proctor (13)	XXII	Jan 30.04
	" " "2 12. J. J. J. J.	XXIII	Apr 9.04
	Dance of Death. Piano & Orch.	XXIV	Mar 5.04
	F. Busoni
Loeffler Ch.	"Death of Pindagiles" for Orch.	X	Jan 2.04
Marsenet J.	"Twilight" Song with Piano	IX	Jan 2.04
	Chas. Gilibert
Mendelssohn	Symphony No 3 in A min op. 56	XI	Jan 9.04
	Over "Midsummer Night's Dream"	V	Nov 21.03
	" " "Fair Melusine" op. 32	XX	Apr 2.04
	Nocturno & Scherzo from Midsummer Night's Dream	Pennine Concert	Dec 27.03
	Concerto Violin & Orch. 1 min. op. 64	II	Oct 24.03
	E. F. Lubos
	"Spring Song" with Piano.	XXIII	Apr 23.04
	Miss Marguerite Hall
Mozart	Symphony E flat maj: K 543	XVI	Feb 27.04
	Over from "Kallenberg's Pato" - "Pato, Pato"	VI	Dec 5.03
	Madame Melba
Paine J. K.	Ballet Music from "Azara"	VII	Dec 19.03
Perilhou	Song "The Virgin at the Manger"	X	Jan 2.04
	Chas. Gilibert
Poise F.	Song of "Gilles"	X	Jan 2.04
	Chas. Gilibert
Reft J.	Over "Eine feste Burg" op. 127	IV	Nov 14.03
Rachmaninoff	Song "Von Jenseit" with Piano	XX	Apr 2.04
	Miss Muriel Foster
Rimsky-Korsakoff	Over "The Betrothed of the Tsar"	XXII	Apr 16.04

Rosini	"Una Voce" with orch	XI	Jan 9.04
	Mad. Lillian Blauvelt
Rubinstein	Symphony No. 11	XXIII	Jan 30.04
Saint-Saens C.	Over "The Barbarians"	XXI	Jan 9.04
	Concerto Piano & Orch. No. 5 op. 103	XXII	Mar 5.04
	F. Busoni
	Concerto Violin & Orch. No. 3. op. 61	XXI	Apr 9.04
	Emile Jauret
	Concerto Cello & Orch. op. 33	V	Nov. 21.03
	Rudolf Krasnelt
	Scherzo from Concerto for Piano & Orch. No. 2. } <sup>op. 22</sup>	XXII	Apr 16.04
	Helen Kapetkintz
Schubert F.	Unfinished Symp. in B min.	XXII	Apr 16.04
	Tango - "Gretchen am Spinnrade"	III	Oct 31.03
	"Erl König"
	Mad. Joh. Gadoski
Schumann, Geo.	"In Carnival Time" op. 32. For orch.	XXI	Jan 23.04
Schumann R.	Symphony No. 1. op. 38	XXVI	Mar 5.04
	" " "4 " 120	III	Oct 31.04
Sibelius	Symphony No. 2 D maj.	XXIII	Mar 12.04
Smetana	Symph. Poem "Vysehrad"	IV	Nov 14.03
	Over "The Gold Bride"	XXII	Jan 30.04
Strauss R.	"Don Quixote" op. 35 for orch.	XXV	Feb 13.04
	"Don Juan"	Pennine Concert	Apr 19.04
	"Don Quixote"	" " " "	" " " "
	Love scene from "Fienstein"	" " " "	" " " "
	The last three were conducted by
	Richard Strauss
	Song "Mutterständerlein" Miss Muriel Foster	XX	Apr 2.04
Strube	"Fantastic Overture" for orch: op. 20	XXIII	Mar 12.04

10
Svensen

Symph. No 2. op 15

XII Jan 23.04

Thomas, Amb:

Qu. to 'Mignon'

Pension
concert Dec 27.03

Arioso from 'Hamlet' - Chas. Gilibert

X Jan 2.04

Mad Scene from 'Hamlet' - Mad. Melba

VII Dec 5.03

" " " citta

Deib. " 26.03

Tschaikowsky

Symphony No 4. op 36

XIX Mch 26.04

" 'Manfred' Symphony of 56.

XXXIV Apr 30.04

Var. from Suite No. 3.

Pension
concert Dec 27.03

Orch. Ballade 'Le Royvode' op 78

VII Dec 7.03

Concerto Piano 10th No 1. op 23

I Oct 17.03

Harold Bauer

Verdi G.

Aria from 'Traviata' Mad. Melba

Pension
concert Dec 27.03

Boleso from 'Il Siciliano'

XI Jan 9.04

Mad. Lillian Blauvelt

Tollmann R.

Symphony No 1. op 44

XXXIII Apr 23.04

Serenade No 3. op 69

XII Jan 23.04

Wagner, R.

Qu. zu 'Tannhauser'

VIII Dec 19.03

" 'Rienzi'

XXXIX Apr 16.04

Prelude 'Tristan & Isolde'

Pension
concert " 19.04

" 'Waldweben'

II Oct 24.03

" 'Kaisermarsch'

XXXIV Apr 30.04

Selections from 'Siegfried' & 'Gotterdammerung'

" " " "

Weber C. von

Qu. 'Der Freischütz'

XII Jan 23.04

" 'Surreythe'

I Oct 17.03

Aria from 'Der Freischütz' with orch

III " 31.03

Mad. Joh. Gadschi

Widor, Ch:

'Chorale Variations' for Hump & Orch.

Pension
concert Dec 27.03

'Liquorina' Garsoli

Soloists

Vocalists

Blauvelt, Mad Lillian

Jan 9.04

Foster, Miss Murid

Apr 2. "

Gadski, Mad. Johanna

Oct. 31.03

Gilibert, Charles

Jan 2.04

Hall, Miss Marguerite

Apr 23. "

Melba, Madame

Dec. 5.26.27.03

Schumann, Heintz Frau

July 27.04

And for the 9th Symphony.

Mr. Etta Riley-Bradbury

Miss Pauline Wolman

Mr. Th. van Gorp

Mr. Sullivan Targent

Apr 13.04

A Chorus from the Handel & Haydn

Pianists

Aus der Ohe, Adele

Nov 14.03

Bauer, Harold

Oct 17. "

Busoni, F.

Mch 5.04

Kopetski, Mad. Helen

Apr 16.18.04

Joseffy, Rafael

Mar 26.04

Proctor, George

Jan 30.04

Violinists

Adamowski, J.

Mch 12.04

Arbes, E. F.

Oct 24.03

Birnbaum, Alex. W.

Nov 28. "

MacCarthy, Miss Maud

Dec 19. "

Mead, Miss Olive

Feb 6.04

Sauzet, Emile

Apr 9. "

Cellist

Krasselt, Rudolf

Nov 21.03

12
Harp

Tassoli, Signorina

Dec 27. 03

Conductor

Wilhelm Gericke

Richard Strauss Conducted some of his own Compositions at a Pension Concert Apr 19. 04

SYMPHONY HALL

Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues

*****
* TWENTY-THIRD SEASON 1903-1904 *

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA 94 PERFORMERS

*****
* Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor
* TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from
October 17, 1903, to April 30, 1904, omitting
November 7, December 12, 1903, January 16, February 20, and March 19,
1904, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from
October 16, 1903, to April 29, 1904, omitting
November 6, December 11, 1903, January 15, February 19, and March 18,
1904.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadske, Mme. Schumann-
Heink, Mr. Glibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme.
Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M.
Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, and others.

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall MONDAY, September 28, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall TUESDAY,
September 29, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY,
October 1, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY,
October 2, at 10 A. M.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHANGES.

Two New Players Engaged—Timothée
Adamowski to Marry.

William Gericke was compelled to go abroad suddenly last spring to engage a first violin and a first 'cello for the Boston
Symphony Orchestra in place of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder who retired from the organization to devote their time to the work of the Kneisel Quartet. The two players finally secured are Mr. Arbos of London and Rudolph Krasselt of Berlin.

13

Mr. Arbos is a Spaniard, a popular parlor violinist in London and a teacher in the Royal Academy of Music. One of his pupils was Maud McCarthy, who came last year to this country. He has never been conspicuous in London musical affairs of a serious nature.

Herr Krasselt is a young German who studied under Klingel at Leipzig and has recently been playing with success in Berlin.

Another interesting bit of news about the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that Timothée Adamowski, one of the first violins, is engaged to marry. He has long been a popular figure in Boston society and was taken up there first by Mrs. Jack Gardiner, who made a lion of him and launched him so favorably on the rather placid waters of Boston society that he has floated ever since. He is to marry Miss Gertrude Lewis Pancoast of Philadelphia.

She is an orphan and is a daughter of the late Dr. and Mrs. William L. Pancoast.
Her mother was a sister of J. Hampden Robb, who died a year ago in Paris, and since that time Miss Pancoast has lived in Philadelphia with her sister, Mrs. John L. Conaway. The engagement of the two was announced in Carlsbad, whither the violinist had followed the young woman.
He is a Pole and a brother of Joseph Adamowski who married Paderewski's pupil, Antoinette Schumouska, and plays the 'cello
in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---BOSTON--- SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1903-1904

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Each order for Season Tickets placed with us will be given personal attention, and we guarantee to execute all such orders in a satisfactory manner and for a small commission.

Correspondence solicited. All information, with diagram of Symphony Hall, will be sent to any address on request, gratis.

CONNELLY'S

TICKET OFFICE, ADAMS HOUSE

'Phone, Oxford 942

There is a sturdy rumor in the air that Carl Ondricek may be found in the Symphony Concert master's seat when the new season begins, and many good and wise folk would like it to be true.

14
Miss. Conner Aug 19. 1903
THE positions have been filled that were made vacant last spring by the withdrawal from the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Franz Kneisel, concertmaster, and Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist. The new leader of the violins will be Fernandez

Arbos, and the 'cello department
THE CHANGES will have Rudolph Krasselt as its
IN BOSTON. chief. It is understood that these engagements were made by Mr. Higginson himself.

Musicians here had been rather looking forward to the reinstatement of Anton Hekking as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There existed a general belief that the position could have no worthier representative. Hekking was until not long ago the 'cello king of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, but it was understood that he had no binding engagements for next season or thereafter. The passing by of Hekking is the more to be wondered at because the new Boston Symphony 'cellist, Krasselt, is only twenty-five years old. Hekking was a prominent member of the famous Bilse Orchestra in Berlin at about the time that Krasselt came into the world; while the latter has had a couple of years' experience (under Hekking) in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and has taught 'cello at Stern's Conservatory, also in Berlin. While youth is never a crime, it is on the other hand no recommendation for the position of first 'cellist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Neither in experience as an ensemble player, nor in skill and authority as a soloist, does Krasselt rank with his predecessor, Schroeder. There seems no reason to doubt that the younger man might some day rank with the best in his profession, but at the same time one must wonder that the Boston Symphony management is willing to experiment in so important a matter. It will be well if the experience is not repeated that befell Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, when he engaged a concertmaster fresh from the classroom of Joachim. The Boston Symphony men are keen critics, and it would not take them long to pick the flaws in the new 'cellist, if there are any to be found. After that his troubles would be many and picturesque.

3
15
While we have no desire to display unwarranted hostility against young Krasselt, we voice the opinion of the entire local 'cello community when we ask why there was not engaged in his place some one of the several great European players who are available for just such a position? It is not our province to name these men now, but we are in a position to do so if the necessity should arise.

Fernandez Arbos, a Spaniard, friend of Sarasate, pupil of Joachim, and professor at the London Royal College of Music, is a musician of quite another stamp. He will doubtless prove to be a worthy successor of Kneisel. Arbos has for some years been a most successful teacher in London. As a soloist he is always in demand. His style is eclectic, his repertory not less so. He is a composer of marked gifts. His trios for piano, violin and 'cello have become famous wherever people are progressive enough to play chamber music by any composer born after 1840. This man Arbos should make his mark in Boston, and make it quickly. He is a man of warm temperament, a true Spaniard in his physical makeup. This poses a pretty problem for Mr. Gericke, the director. It will be a great change from the placid Kneisel to the fiery Arbos. Altogether, Mr. Higginson has made some radical departures, and from New York their result will be watched with interest. In Boston there is interest, too, but perhaps also a wee bit of apprehension.

London June 9. 1903
C. M. Loeffler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is here, and Fred Comee is expected. They are supposed to be looking for the successors of the Kneisel Quartet players, recently resigned, and Mr. Gericke has been here on the same mission. The post of first 'cellist was offered or suggested to Jean Gerardy, but not viewed favorably by him. It is now understood that the Kneisel resignation was not due to engagements, but to a positive rupture between Kneisel and Gericke, not of a personal nature, however. This was intimated in this paper originally.

Well-known Musician Weds.

Timothee Adamowski, assistant conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, was married yesterday at Narragansett Pier to Miss Gertrude Lewis Pancoast.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI

WEDS MISS PANCOAST

Musician's Bride a Belle of Three Cities.

HOME TO BE IN BOSTON

Groom Is Assistant Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra and of a Polander.

Special to The Boston Journal.

Narragansett Pier, R. I., Sept. 1.—With the dawn of a fair September came the first society wedding of the season when Miss Gertrude Lewis Pancoast, daughter of Dr. William H. Pancoast of Philadelphia, was married to Timothee Adamowski of Boston.

The ceremony was performed by the Rev. W. H. B. Allen, rector of St. Peter's, at high noon today, and the organist was Wallace Goodrich, organist of Trinity Church, Boston. The march from Lohengrin was played upon the entrance of the bridal party, and the overture from the Meistersinger was the music at the end of the service.

The bride, who was attired in white crepe de chene elaborately trimmed with Irish lace, wore a large picture hat of Irish lace and white ostrich feathers and carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley. She was attended by her little niece, Miss Gertrude Pancoast, who acted as flower girl.

Brother Gives Away Bride.

The bride was given away by her brother, Howard Pancoast. Mrs. John L. Conaway, sister of the bride, wore a hand-embroidered white muslin and valenciennes lace dress with hat to match, and carried a bouquet of orchids.

Mrs. Howard Pancoast wore a gown of white embroidered batiste and large lace picture hat.

The church was decorated with golden rod and white hydrangeas. The best man was Mr. William P. Blake of Boston, a friend for twenty years of the groom. Following the ceremony was a wedding breakfast at the cottage of Mrs. John L. Conaway. The cottage decorations were a mass of white hydrangeas and ferns.

The bride is well known socially in New York, Boston and Philadelphia and at Narragansett Pier. She is a brunette and tall and stately.

Mr. Adamowski Musical Conductor.

Mr. Adamowski, the groom, is assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and second concert master of this noted band of musicians. He is a violin player of national repute, and his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Adamowski, are of Warsaw, Poland, the senior Mr. Adamowski being a prominent official in the Russian government.

Among the friends of the groom at the reception were Mr. and Mrs. Josef Adamowski, the former a brother of the groom; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond of Boston and Mrs. Martha Dana. Friends and relatives of the bride at the ceremony and reception were Mrs. Thomas B. Wanamaker, Mrs. Barclay Warburton, Mrs. A. E. Norris, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Pancoast, Mrs. Howard Roberts, Clarence Lewis and Dr. and Mrs. Benjamin Reath.

Mr. and Mrs. Adamowski will reside on Chestnut street, Boston, after their honeymoon.

Mr. Adamowski's Marriage.

Journal Sept. 6, 1903.
Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose marriage to Miss Gertrude Pancoast took place at Narragansett last Tuesday, has for years been one of the most conspicuous members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a sense, he has been the leader of the fashionable members of that famous band, though his taste for fashionable life has never once sidetracked his devotion to his art. Time and time again he has been reported as engaged to some society girl, but he survived so many of these reports that people began to wonder whether he would ever forsake bachelor's hall. He is a compatriot and intimate friend of Jean Ignace Paderewski, the most celebrated of living pianists, and his brother, Joseph Adamowski, a few years ago married Miss Szumowska, a pupil of Paderewski.

Journal Sept. 20, 1903.

With the preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its twenty-third year, the musical season may be considered as opened. A second and even third generation, if one recalls the patrons of the early days, are now enjoying these concerts, remarkable for their even excellence and high standard. And the good opinion of the musical public obtains not alone at home, but in all the cities visited by the orchestra on its monthly tournees.

Among a score of flattering comments last season we quote from the New York Tribune that "the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has left a feeling of admiration and gratitude keener, more tender, and more fragrant than ever before," while the New York Herald stated that "this virtuoso organization spread a noble feast." The Times, speaking of the orchestra, said: "It affords a pleasure distinct in degree and kind," and the Sun honestly says: "To speak frankly New York has found the Boston concerts a safe vehicle for admiration." The Philadelphia Press says of the performances of the orchestra in its two series of concerts in that city: "There is something more than mere virtuosity in its noble interpretation," while the Baltimore Sun pays a marked compliment by affirming that "this company of great artists gives a distinction to whatever it undertakes."

Gericke Again Conducts.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of ten years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Glibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Madame Melba returns, after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mms. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country.

Mr. Glibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearance and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with symphony patrons to need extended exploiting. Of the new comers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the first violin and concert master, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

Journal Sept. 6, 1903. The Kneisels and Mr. Loeffler.

Speaking of the Symphony Orchestra, Bostonians are curious to know the true facts of the resignation of the members of the Kneisel Quartet. Probably this curiosity will be satisfied before long. At the bottom of all is a tale of defeated ambition. Mr. Loeffler's resignation will give him a better opportunity to develop his rare abilities as a composer. Mr. Gericke, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to return to Boston with his new players before the month is out.

SYMPHONY SUCCESSORS OF KNEISEL AND SCHROEDER.

Herald Aug 11, 03

They Are to Be Arbos, a Violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, 'Cello, the Former from London and the Latter, a Leipsic Conservatory Graduate.

The places in the Boston Symphony orchestra made vacant by the resignation last season of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder are to be filled by Mr. Arbos, violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, violoncello. Mr. Gericke, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, engaged the musicians after a long and laborious search, which took them among the musical capitals of Europe. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of 25, and has studied under Kriegl at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin.

It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a 'cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Twenty-two years with always one high ideal is a flattering record for any organization, and another record of every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts at a premium at the annual auction sales ever since the occupancy of the new Symphony Hall three years ago, is the most satisfactory evidence of the public appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A generous founder and patron with the courage of his convictions, a conductor with ten years of service in two terms of five years each, ninety-four performers selected from the best in this country and Europe, a long list of the most distinguished assisting artists available and an unsurpassed audience room unselfishly given by some five hundred public spirited enthusiasts, are the chief factors which are combined in the most unique musical ensemble in the world.

The twenty-third season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on Oct. 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible, surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the eleventh season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr. Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr. Gericke for the next five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr. Gericke's second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Glibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Madame Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Glibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez, the first violin and concert master, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. Admission first come first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only at twenty-five cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

The New Symphony Players

It is a remarkable illustration of the stability of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Señor Fernandez Arbos, who succeeds Mr. Kniesel as first violin, is only the third concert-master in its twenty-two years' existence. Señor Arbos, though a Spaniard by birth, is, as he is termed by E. A. Baughan, a cosmopolitan, and far removed from the popular conception of the Spanish national temperament. A figure to fit that idea—of fire and glowing passion—would be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carrefio, and not Señor Sarasate or Señor Arbos. She has iridescent moods. They have the restrained and nervous subtlety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection, or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

Señor Arbos was born nearly forty years ago at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster. He early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster. At the Madrid Conservatoire his professor of the violin was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot, and was solo violinist of the royal band, and the royal chamber of musicians. Monasterio introduced his promising pupil (who when only twelve years of age had gained first prizes for violin, theory, etc.) to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Señor Arbos has never forgotten.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the twenty-third consecutive season the announcement of the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, sets the musical pace for the year. Ninety-four as good players as can be found the world over, directed by a conductor whose term of ten years' service is the greatest possible proof and evidence of his ability, will render good music in the best way, thus fulfilling both the initial motive and the always cherished purpose of the founder of this unsurpassed organization. Every assurance is given that the season beginning on Oct. 16 will equal if not surpass its predecessors, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented.

The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M. on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2 will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, and became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the director of the Conservatoire. At fifteen Arbos gained the Prix d'Honneur and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist. While living at Brussels he heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame both as virtuoso and teacher, and for some ten years had been director of the Berlin high school for music.

This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German classical school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but Señor Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly-learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Señor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. The study at Berlin also had its effect on Señor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra, and played as soloist in all the principal towns of the continent.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Harburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain, he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful début at a series of concerts given by Señor Albeniz at St. James's Hall, Señor Arbos practically settled in London.

His work there was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors; an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. Señor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

Rudolph Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmaster of the orchestra at Baden Baden and one of his brothers is concertmaster at Weimer. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization.

BUSONI, PIANO VIRTUOSO, TO PLAY HERE ON JAN. 8.

Famous Pianist, Who Formerly Lived in Boston, Will Tour America Under the Direction of Mr. Ellis, and Appear with the Symphony.

Feruccio Busoni, the famous piano virtuoso, will make his appearance in America in January under the direction of Charles A. Ellis. This will mark the first visit of the great pianist to this country in 10 years. Under the auspices of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Busoni will give his first performance in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Jan. 8. In addition to his engagements with the Boston Symphony orchestra and other large musical organizations in America, the virtuoso will enter upon a recital tour, touching the principal centres of the East, as well as the larger western cities. In the artistic world Busoni has won for himself an exceptionally high place and his services during the last 10 years have been particularly sought after in European music centres, where he is looked upon as one of the greatest piano virtuosos. Critics have accorded his compositions the highest commendation. His appearance in this city, where he is well known on account of his former residence in Boston, is looked forward to with a great deal of interest by the older musicians. The present residence of Busoni is Berlin.

FERUCCIO BUSONI, PIANIST.

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER,
Who leaves the Symphony Orchestra after a service of 21 years.
(From a photograph by Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears.)

BLUE HILL SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unique Performance of Haydn's "Toy" Symphony Down by the Sad Sea Waves on the Maine Coast.

Standing—Robert Kneisel, W. B. King, Franz Kneisel, Julian Theodorowicz, John Sauerquell, Miss Helen Krehbiel, Mrs. H. E. Krehbiel, C. Ensworth, Miss Victoria Kneisel, Miss Olga Thoma.
Seated—Mrs. Franz Kneisel, Abraham Moses, W. C. McKinley, Alexandre Thoma, E. Krehbiel, Mrs. Thomas Tapper, Mrs. W. C. McKinley.

The musical atmosphere of Boston, which has spread out and enveloped the smaller cities of New York, Chicago, Pittsburg, Cincinnati and Philadelphia to such an extent as to provide life-giving qualities to symphonic organizations in these municipalities, has, during the summer season, extended to Blue Hill, Me., and the first (last and only) concert of the Blue Hill symphony orchestra will go down in musical history as one of the notable events of the present year. It was to fitly commemorate the 14th birthday of the young maestro, Master Robert Kneisel, that the new organization was called into being, and with the approval of Mrs. Franz Kneisel, concertmeister, conductor John Sauerquell selected Haydn's "Toy" symphony, C major, as the most appropriate medium of displaying the abilities of the distinguished artists assembled for the occasion.

The roster of the orchestra read as follows: Mrs. Franz Kneisel, concertmeister; H. E. Krehbiel, musical critic of the New York Tribune, leader of the second violin section; Abraham Moses, second violin; W. C. McKinley, viola; Alexander Thoma, flute; Miss Helen Krehbiel, quail; Julius Theodorowicz, nightingale; Franz Kneisel, cuckoo; Mrs. H. E. Krehbiel, trumpet; Miss Victoria Kneisel, triangle; C. Ensworth, cymbals; Mrs. Thomas Tapper, drum; Mrs. W. C. McKinley, rattle; Miss Olga Thoma, bells, with Master Robert Kneisel at the pianoforte. All the tickets sold were put at $3 and $5, but it is reported that, rather than lower the price, following the custom in all the large cities, a device known as a "D. H." ticket punch was made us of, and a very respectable audience of nearly 90 rows secured and so seated that Kneisel hall had the appearance of being filled to overflowing.

The event was the occasion of an ovation to conductor John Sauerquell, whose masterly skill was shown in the faultless interpretation given the stupendous composition chosen to display the technique of the orchestra and the virtuosity of its members. A fitting poetical tribute to this conductor's genius was prepared for the occasion, and permission has been given by the owner of the copyright for the publication of the following stanzas:

He can lead a Haydn symphony,
A canon waits as well,
And does it with such airy grace,
This talented Sauerquell.

And when he steps upon the stand
There comes a mighty yell,
Storms of applause and stamps and cheers,
All for the great Sauerquell.

All the applications for performances for appearances of the Blue Hill symphony orchestra in London, Paris and Berlin have been necessarily refused by conductor Sauerquell, who sacrifices these flattering opportunities to gratify his personal ambition because of his desire not to discourage the struggling organizations in these cities devoted to symphonic production by putting forward a standard of excellence which other orchestras could not hope to attain.

Franz Kneisel, with his family, spends the summer at his place on Blue Hill bay. He has recently added 30 acres of woodland to his grounds, making plans for one of the most attractive homes on the Maine coast. Mr. Kneisel, who is devotedly fond of trees and flowers, will not allow a tree to be felled unless it interferes with absolute comfort. The Mascot, Mr. Kneisel's home, he loves, because the builder, instead of felling a large Norway spruce, had built the veranda around it. Blue Hill has long been a favorite spot for musicians. Prof. Hill, head of the musical department at Wellesley, was the pioneer; Wilhelm Gericke of the Boston Symphony has a home on the hill above Mr. Kneisel, and Louis Svecenski of the quartet is always there with his pretty wife. Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Krehbiel of New York spend part of each summer with Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $77

Seat Auction for Symphony Rehearsals

None of the Prices Offered Was Unusual

Average Is Lower Than Last Year

Bidding Throughout the Sale Steady and Even

Transcript Sept. 26, 1903
This morning's auction sale in Symphony Hall of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was marked by entire lack of excitement. Though the attendance was large and the bidding at times spirited, the offers seldom soared above a steady average, and there was not even one of those unexpected and unreasonable flights into the hundreds which are usual on these occasions. The highest premium paid during the morning, in fact, was $77, for seat 19, in row M. When this is contrasted with the record price of $305 last year, paid on each of three seats not far from the front of the hall, and $200 paid during the same sale for the three seats directly in front of them, it will be seen how quiet and featureless today's auction was.

The general average of prices, moreover, seemed to be a little below last year's, though this may be evened up before the four days of the auction are needed. But whether the average was below or not, it was remarkably steady and even. Prices seemed to be governed more by the actual relative value of locations than by the whimsical preferences which have in the past resulted in a few unreasonable premiums. Prices started low, generally under $20 for the first row or two, and increased farther back in the hall—the middle aisle seats drawing the highest, and those at the sides the lowest. It was possible to reckon with exactness the probable prices for nearly every seat before it was offered. The auction was accomplishing very definitely what it was meant to accomplish, putting an exact—not arbitrary—value on every place in the hall.

The sale was opened shortly after ten o'clock, under the usual conditions. The tickets offered were for twenty-four public afternoon rehearsals, the nominal price being $12 each, the actual price having the premium added. Nobody could buy more than four places on a single bid. The seats were sold in their order, beginning with A1, the righthand seat in the front row, and working back into the hall. The first place brought just the same price as last year, $11, and as was the case then it was the lowest paid during the morning. Three years ago this seat was sold for $280, to somebody who craved the honor of buying the first ticket in the new hall. The next year it brought $20. Undesirable as the first row is except for the deaf, the prices went up from $11.50 for the next three seats, to $20 for one near the left. No less than nine of them brought $19 each. Last year one of these seats was sold as high as $26.50. Row B, curiously enough, struck a somewhat lower average, the premiums with two exceptions hovering about $13 and $14. A very excited lady paid $35 each for three of the seats, one on the centre aisle. Another bought just across the way for $23, and would have paid $24 had not the auctioneer gently cautioned her that she was bidding against herself.

In Row C, after the first eight or nine had been taken at a little more than $12 premium each, the prices jumped above $20 for good, and ticket brokers, who had hitherto kept more or less in the background, now began to take a hand. General W. W. Blackmar, who bought in the same row last year, took four seats near his old ones at a somewhat smaller premium. Several seats in the next row were sold above $30. Mr. Connelly bought two aisle seats for $41, and Mr. Herrick four at $46—the first to approach $50. Prices in row F, which was taken largely by brokers, ranged from $15 to $42, and $50 was not reached until row G, when Mr. Herrick purchased the favorite seats, on each side of the middle aisle, at $58 and $48 premiums. Last year these same places sold for $73 and $68—a comparison which shows something of a difference between the two sales. Mr. Connelly took at $42 four seats on the left hand aisle which last year sold at $1.

In Row K the first lively bidding of the morning was started. After a few sales at $16, $35 and $39, the centre aisle was reached at seat 17—exactly the same situation as last year, when Mr. Pratt bid $200 for 17, 18 and 19. Here, again, a somewhat slow sale was first enlivened, for Mr. Pratt evidently wanted the same seats, and a man in the centre of the hall was decisively against him. The bidding was rushed up to $70, and then began to crawl, until it stopped at $76, and Mr. Pratt had his tickets for nearly $400 less than before. Prices then dropped from $40 to $18. In the next row, where Mr. Pratt last year bought the corresponding three seats at the $305 premiums, bidding started out stiff at $30. But when the auctioneer reached the more desirable seats towards the centre of the hall, on one occasion he actually could not start a bid, and had to wait for an offer of $15. Two excellent seats, which last year sold for $50 each, thus went for $25. The next four seats were bought at $31, and these four included the famous seat 17, on which Mr. Pratt made his highest bidding last year. The next seat, on the aisle, sold for $57.50, and its mate across the way was bought at $55. Thus the three seats which in 1902 went to a single purchaser at premiums aggregating $915, were bought in 1903 by three purchasers at $143.50.

In Row J Mr. Pratt again took the centre aisle seats, paying a premium of $70, as against $95 last year. Seats adjoining them sold for $35 and $45. The succeeding rows were taken almost entirely by the brokers—Wadsworth, Connelly, Heard, Pratt and Herrick. Of these Mr. Herrick took by far the greater number, like last year buying many of the less costly side seats. In Row M Mr. Heard paid the highest premium—$77—having bought an aisle seat for $51, and evidently expecting to pick up the next one at a lower rate. He was obliged, however, to make good at a higher. Mr. Herrick was caught several times in a similar way, having taken four seats up to the aisle seat, and paying sometimes double for the fifth. In Row O he bought four seats, just up to the middle aisle seat, for $30, and was obliged to pay $70 for the next three. These were among the liveliest contests of the morning, several people being in the bidding.

Tomorrow morning the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction in the hall at ten o'clock.

PREMIUMS UNUSUALLY LOW

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Rehearsals of Boston Symphony Orchestra Held This Morning—Some Sold as Low as $2.50 Transcript Sept. 27, 1903

Yesterday's comparatively low premiums at the first auction sale of seats for concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were followed today by still lower ones. At the first-named sale the $12 tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were sold, including the bulk of the floor and first gallery, and leaving only nine floor and five gallery rows to be disposed of this morning. The nominal price of these seats is only $7.50, so the premiums, as a rule, range somewhat higher than would be expected from their location; but this year the demand for them seemed to be very light. Bids, in fact, were less than half as high as those of last year, and it is doubtful if good seats in the first balcony ever went so low before. Some excellent places, in fact, were knocked down at $2.50 premium, making the total cost of the tickets $10. Since each ticket admits to twenty-four concerts, this makes about forty-two cents a performance—or only a little more than the so-called rush seats in the second balcony, to which admission is granted for a quarter.

A larger number were buying for themselves at this sale than at yesterday's, for those who sit in the $7.50 seats are generally willing to do their own bidding, and dispense with the services of an agent. At ten o'clock the front part of Symphony Hall, where the sale was held, was filled with women, and the early bidding was conducted by means of distinctly feminine voices, or by the waving of gloved hands. The ticket brokers were for the most part quiet, and the auctioneer's wand was kept pointing all over the hall, instead of chiefly at their little corner in the left. Seats were purchased, moreover, largely by ones and twos, and not in blocks of four. Until prices became temptingly low, in fact, the brokers confined themselves to taking up the end seats, of which they bought nearly everyone. As the sale progressed the little groups of women moved to the rear of the hall, where purchasers sat in their seats, compared notes as to prices with their companions, and made acquaintance with their fortnightly neighbors of the coming winter. Back there, where the remote rattle of the auctioneer's figures was drowned in chatter, it was more like an afternoon tea than an auction.

Prices started in row KK, immediately behind the last $12 seats, at a fairly high level. The first two went for $19, but this was the highest premium paid during the morning. Seats on both aisles were bought by Herrick at $17 and at $18.50, but the run of places went for $15.50, with an occasional $14.50 or $16.50, and at the end there was one lone premium of $12. Last year the average rate was $18, and three premiums higher than $20 were paid. In the next row (LL) a decided drop was noticeable. Several of the best places were bought at $16.50 and $15.50, but the average was nearer $11 or $12, as against an average of about $17 last year. A few sold for $9 and $10. In the next row (MM) prices fell to $8, and at the end to $7.50, where last year they held at $15 and $16; $10.50 was the highest premium in the row, and $9 was by far the most common figure. NN, which last year sold at about the same as MM, went by single seats and pairs at a succession of $7.50 and $8 premiums; and in OO the rate dropped as low as $5 and $6.

For the next three rows there was a steady drop, until the lowest price of all was reached in SS, half of whose twelve seats sold at $2 and the other half at $2.50. Last year all went at $5.50, and that rate was the lowest paid.

In the balcony, of which the last five rows were offered, and all of them desirable seats for music-lovers, prices did not take the jump expected. Instead of going up to $19, as they did last season, they only touched $14, and even in the first row fluctuated from that high-water mark to as low as $5. Most went for about $2. In the row behind (F) the average was about $7.50, against $17 last year; in row G it was $5.50, against $16 last year, and in H and the succeeding rows, where seats sold last year at $15 and $10, prices went to pieces at $4 and $2.50.

Symphonies are quoted higher. Evidently confidence is returning, and there is renewed hope of a gay and festive winter.

LITTLE FAST BIDDING AT SYMPHONY HALL

Prices for Seats Lower Than Last Year's Average.

HIGHEST BID MADE WAS $77

Woman Bids Against Herself and Small Boys Raise a Few
High Figures.

Journal
Sept. 29, 1903.
The rush for tickets to the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was less strenuous yesterday than it has been in previous years. From the time the auction sale opened at 10 in the morning till the last ticket on sale yesterday was disposed of there was hardly a spirited contest for the desirable seats.

The prices paid averaged much lower than last year. Seat 19 in row M brought the record price of the day, $77, while several which went last year for good sums were not snapped up with even a show of eagerness.

The usual crowd of curious spectators was on hand, but their expectations of witnessing a repetition of the fast and furious bidding which has taken place in earlier days were disappointed. A large number of seats went to agents, the identity of the real purchasers being effectually concealed.

Mrs. Gardner's Seat "Marked Off."

One spectacular effect which the crowd desired, but did not see, was the contest for Mrs. John L. Gardner's seat. It was not put up at public this year, but was "marked off" before the bidding began.

While the prices paid were lower than usual, there seemed to be less whimsical craze for particular locations, which has carried the values up enormously in the past. The best seats brought the best premiums yesterday, and the bidding was steady.

Mrs. Gardner was present during part of the morning, and took the greatest interest in the proceedings. Among others there were William C. Endicott, Mrs. Samuel Aldrich, Mrs. William Humphrey and Alvin Schroeder. The number of women was not as large as usual, but they were strongly in evidence.

The bidding yesterday was on the $12 seats, while today the $7.50 ones will be put up. Ticket dealers took a number of the better seats. Most of the contests, such as they were, ranged about the seats on the aisle. Gen. W. W. Blackmar took his usual places in row C, and a number of other "old-timers" were on hand to secure their favorite positions.

Woman Bid Against Self.

There were some amusing incidents, though the proceedings lacked the vim which those who went purely for fun would have liked to see. One lady ran the price of a ticket up to $23, and would have given more had not the auctioneer courteously told her that she was bidding against herself. A few small boys, who had slid by the argus eyes that should have seen them, created a momentary diversion in the general monotony by making some enormous bids for rather undesirable places. They were quickly discovered and summarily ejected.

The bidding today probably will be less lively than yesterday, as the seats are not those over which there is generally a spirited struggle.

PAY HIGHER PREMIUMS FOR SEASON TICKETS

Journal — Oct. 3, 03
Symphony Concert Auction Closes
With Good Sales of Seats.

The auction of seats for the Symphony concerts closed yesterday with the sale of the $7.50 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts.

The premiums paid on the average ranged higher than last year, although there was little speculation. The seats were sold for the most part to lovers of good music who do not pretend to be "fashionable." Students and educational institutions bought largely.

The highest price paid yesterday in premium was $21, while in some instances seats went as low as $3.

SYMPHONY STOCK GOES UP.

Yesterday's Sales About the Average—
Closing Sale of Tickets Will
Herold Be Held Today. Oct. 2, 03

Auction sale bids for $12 seats to the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra took a brace yesterday morning after low prices for rehearsal seats, and brought the prices up to an average of what they were last year for the sale. The rehearsal auctions led to an impression that the bottom had fallen from the Symphony market, but yesterday morning interesting competitions for many end seats kept the prices at a good average.

The highest premiums yesterday were $50 each for seats 18 and 19 in row J; $50 for end seat 17, row P, and $47 each for 15 and 16 in the same row. Bids over $20 for aisle seats were frequent. Five dollars was a starter on most bids, and only rarely did seats sell lower.

Last year the highest bid on $12 seats at the evening concerts was $34 for seats 18 and 19 in row K. These seats sold this year for $24 and $29.

In the sale were many paradoxes of bidding, inside seats in row I bringing $20 premium, when aisle seats in the same row sold for $10. A $50 premium bid was sandwiched between $22 and $17 sales. After a $19 sale the next two seats sold at $42 premium.

Many of the peculiar variations of price for seats presumably equally advantageous came from interesting manipulations by the bidders. Most of the purchasers were regular ticket dealers, buying for clients. Unlike many of the scattering bidders, they could not take seats at random wherever the opportunity for a low bid occurred, but had to purchase seats already designated by their clients. These brokers very soon became identified with a bear movement to keep the bids on their seats as low as possible. Several bidders, however, became conspicuous in a bull charge upon the bears, and put many of the bids up, wherever the dealers seemed especially to want certain seats.

Very often when a dealer got the choice of a pair of end seats at a high bid he would take but one, hoping to get the other at a much lower figure. At times the scheme was successful, and this accounts for the great difference in the premiums of contiguous seats. At other times, however, a gentleman who was bidding apparently to inject a little ginger in the sales would catch a dealer and chase him into the high figures to keep two seats together.

After such flurries the squad of dealers seated together in a front row turned around to this gentleman, and with thunderous expressions would play a chorus of facial symphonies that were highly Wagnerian.

An average of the premiums for the choice $12 seats at the Saturday evening concerts is not much below $20.

The closing sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra's performances will be held at Symphony Hall today, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered at auction. These low priced seats afford opportunities for many music lovers to hear at a very reasonable outlay concerts of extraordinary attractiveness at which many of the world's great singers and instrumentalists will appear. There are 917 tickets to be sold today.

SYMPHONY SEAT AT PREMIUM OF $61

Journal — Oct. 2, 03
Bidding at Yesterday's Sale Lively and Average Good.

Sixty-one dollars was the highest premium paid yesterday when the $12 concert seats were put on sale. The prize seat was S 17. Seats on either side brought half as much. The next highest figure was $51, paid for an aisle seat in the center of the hall. Several seats in the immediate vicinity brought over $40 and two over $45.

The strangest bid was $44 for seats in U 24 and 25, while seat 28 of the same row brought only $9. The lowest bid was $2, which was paid for several seats in J J, the last $12 row on the floor. The highest balcony bid was $38, for seats A 20 and 21. The attendance was good and the prices for the day averaged a bit better than usual.

SYMPHONY TICKETS CHEAP.

Many Bought at Sale of Rehearsal
Seats at Rate of 42 Cents
Herold Per Concert. Oct. 30.

Symphonies slumped again yesterday in the market. A persistent raid, driven by the amalgamated lovers of music who sit in the second best seats at the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon rehearsals, knocked the props from under the traditions of what Symphony reserved seats are worth.

Seats in the rear of the hall on the first floor sold as low as $2 and $2.50 premium, which, added to the $7.50 face value of the tickets, makes it possible to hear 24 Boston Symphony rehearsals for $19, or at about 42 cents a concert. The lowest premiums on these seats last year were $15 and $16.

The next sale will be tomorrow at 10 A. M., when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned.

SYMPHONY SALE ENDS <sup>Oct 2 1903</sup>

Today the $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Night Concerts Were Sold by Auction

All the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold by auction today in the hall. There was a fairly good-sized attendance, but bidding lacked the spirit of former years. The premiums as a whole averaged lower than last year, although no seats offered today were without a ready purchaser. More time was required for today's sale than when the same seats were sold Tuesday for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, because in addition to the rear seats on the floor and first balcony the entire second balcony was sold. These upper balcony seats are the so-called "rush seats" for the Friday performance.

Some of the floor seats sold today at a premium of $5, while the average for these few rear rows was about $7. The best $7.50 seats are located back of the first rows in the first balcony and for these the prices ranged considerably higher than for the floor. In the second balcony the highest price of the morning was given for three seats in the first row on the left side. The same seats last year brought a premium of $12.50. Some choice seats in the same row back and front of the hall sold at $7. Today brought the sale to a close.

SYMPHONY SALE.

Drop in the Prices From Last Year's Rates.

Seats for the Friday Afternoon Rehearsals at Auction Today.

About Half as Much Realized as for the 1902 Concerts.

Globe

Whatever may be the cause, and the management seems unwilling to discuss the subject, seats for Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra so far in the public sale have brought only about half the prices received for them last year under similar conditions.

When the public auction of the seats was resumed this morning at 10 in Symphony hall there was about the same sized attendance as yesterday, and the assembly was constantly changing as those present managed to secure seats and left the hall to make room for those who had just arrived with the intention of making purchases. This morning the bidding was more among individuals, although the ticket agents were present and secured a number of desirable locations.

The sale opened with the seats on the rear quarter of the floor, beginning at KK, and the rear half of the first balcony was also auctioned. Last season when these seats were sold three of them in row KK were disposed of at premiums of $22.50, $21.50 and $20, while this morning the highest premium obtained was $18.50 for two end seats, while some of this row sold for premiums of $12 and $12.50. In the next row the prices dropped to $16.50 as the highest premium, and many seats in that row went for $8, $9 and $9.50. The average premiums paid for this row last season was from $15 to $17. Seat 13 in this row sold at a premium of $13, and some merriment was caused as to what may happen to the purchaser when on Jan 29th the 13th rehearsal takes place.

Just $13 was the highest premium paid in the next row, and that was for an end seat, while the lowest in the same row was $7.50, and the average rate was about $9.50. In row NN the highest premium was $9, most of the seats selling for $7.50. Last season row OO sold almost entirely at a premium of $13 each, while this morning $8.50 was the best obtained, and many seats went as low as $5 and $6, while two were purchased at premiums of $4.50.

Row PP is that in which the pillars supporting the first balcony come, and the best secured for a seat in this row was $5.50, while one seat sold for $3.50, and most of them went at advances of $4.50 and $5.

The next three rows are more or less blocked by the pillars, but last year $8 and $10 premiums were paid for seats here, while this morning $4.50 was the high mark and quite a large number sold at premiums of $2.50. In row RR the two center aisle end seats brought $4 each premium, two for $2 each, and others at $2.50 and $3. The 12 seats in row SS realized $2 premium each with the exception of three which went at $2.50.

Prices jumped again when the rear half of the first balcony was offered, and in row E, the first placed on sale, the highest premium obtained was $14 for two seats on the right end of the center tier. One group of four seats went for premiums of $4 each, while $5, $6 and $8 were the prevailing rates. Last year practically $19 each was offered on this row.

One seat in the next row sold at $12.50, but the average premium on the remainder was about $7. Just $5.50 was the average for the next row, and a group of three sold at $6.50, the best price secured. On the last row—H—the best premium was $4 and the majority sold for $3, and the 12 end seats in the corners, at the extreme rear of the balcony, sold at about the same rates.

SYMPHONY TICKETS SELL TODAY AT DOLLAR EACH

Sound ——— Oct 1, 03

Music Loving Public Will Have Chance at Low Prices.

While nearly all of the best seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony concerts have been sold, some as high as $77, there are many of the dollar seats to be sold today at auction. This will give those of the music-loving public that cannot afford to pay fancy prices a chance to secure seats at a reasonable price.

Though there will be many ticket brokers present, the management is determined that the public shall have a fair show in obtaining tickets. It is expected that the rush for dollar seats will be great. The management is pleased with the large number of tickets sold the past few days.

Globe

Sept. 20, 1903

For 22 years the Boston symphony orchestra has been a musical organization so unique as to command both the attention and respect not only of America, but of the world. Founded and maintained by a single individual who has never swerved from his original ideal, there has always been an underlying tendency to advance and to improve, with a resulting standard of performance approaching very close to perfection.

The 23d season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances, Oct 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

Mr Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr Gericke for the next five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, Mr Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr Gericke's second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hovekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others.

Mme Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr Gilbert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago.

Mr Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his reengagement. Mr Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive explaining. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the first violin and concert master, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall Monday, Sept 28, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction Tuesday, Sept 29, at 10 a m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction Thursday, Oct 1, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place Friday, Oct 2, at 10 a m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony, on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with satisfaction.

...Music at all events still hath charms, for did not the stock of the Symphony rally yesterday after the break of the two preceding days? Boston is at least still loyal to this notable specialty.

Concertmaster Arbos Here for Symphony Orchestra

Arrives on the Ivernia with Mr. E. Ferir, First Viola, Both of Whom Will Take Part in String Quartet.

Mr. F. Arbos was a passenger of the Cunarder Ivernia, arriving yesterday afternoon, and is at the Hotel Brunswick. Mr. Arbos comes to take up his duties as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and as principal of the string quartet, which will bear his name and will give a series of concerts here this winter. Mr. Arbos was accompanied by Mr. E. Ferir, who has been engaged as one of the first violas of the orchestra and a member of the quartet.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concert master and first violin and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country. It is a most notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Senor Arbos, is only the third concert master in its 22 years' existence. The following sketch of Mr. Arbos was written by Mr. E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note:

According to the popular idea the Spanish national temperament is compact of passion. It is, indeed, quite a commonplace of descriptive critics when dealing with Spanish musicians to refer to the molten "fire" which glows through their performances with a peculiar warmth. English writers, such as Byron and Charles Kingsley, have helped to form this ready-made idea of the Spanish temperament, and to most of us the word "Spain" conjures up visions of dark beauties with flashing eyes and of men who are either Don Juans or bull fighters.

The popular figure of a Spanish musician should be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carreno, and not Senor Sarasate or Senor Arbos. She has iridescent moods. They have the restrained and nervous subtlety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

Senor Arbos himself is cosmopolitan. Born nearly 40 years ago (to be precise, on Christmas day, 1863), at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music and a special predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster.

The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot, and was solo violinist of the royal band and the royal chamber musicians, and later on became a director of the conservatoire.

Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil (when only 12 years of age he had gained first prizes for violin, harmony, theory, etc.) to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance, so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Senor Arbos has never forgotten.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, director of the conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur and was already a sound, all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame, both as virtuoso and teacher, and for some 10 years had been director of the Berlin high school for music.

This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Senor Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos.

Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect on Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid conservatoire, and soon afterward founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St. James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim and then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet concerto in b minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. The occasion was no doubt inspiring for Senor Arbos and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was the chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maun MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

Of the man himself it should be said that, in these days of self-advertisement, it is refreshing to find a musician who is content to let his reputation rest on his merits alone, and one who, in spite of arduous professional toil, has remained an artist in his whole-hearted love for his art.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concert-master of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concert-master at Weimar. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization. His last engagement before joining the army was as first 'cellist of the Vienna Opera House.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna, and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

Journal - See next page
THE change of concert-masters for the Symphony Orchestra is a matter of larger and more far-reaching consequence than even far reaching consequence than even a regular and observant attendant upon the concerts might think. For the concert-master is much more than the first of "four and twenty fiddlers, fiddling in a row." He is a teacher, expositor, guide and exemplar for them and their associates. He is, as it were, the conducting link, intellectual, technical and esthetic, between the conductor and the band. His first duties have to do with the external form of the music as it shall be presented. He considers and prescribes phrasing accent, bowing and what may be called rhetorical delivery, leaving its expression and color to the conductor. He must also have a quick and correct ear for pitch and tune, so that perfect harmoniousness may be insured; this especially when a soloist is to perform and the orchestral support must be exactly accordant with the pitch of the solo instrument. He has often to be the means of conveying the conductor's desires to the orchestra and of instructing the men as to the execution of them. He is in a way not quite unlike the centurion of the New Testament, being himself "a man under authority," but also having others under him. His knowledge must be large and accurate, his taste refined and his industry and patience endless.

Influence Broader Yet.

But his influence extends beyond the scope of technique and training, and is likely to be most felt beyond that. Even the conductor himself has scarcely more power—although, of course, he has more initiative—in shaping the character and course of an orchestra than the violinist who sits close at his left hand, and seems first to catch his hints and directions. The French call the concert-master the "chief of attack," which term

PLACE AND DUTIES OF Journal (Pickens) Oct 4.03 A CONCERT MEISTER

Possible Influence of the New Man on the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Musical Miscellany.

Intimates the readiness, promptness and decision with which the leading violin must show to the eye the first stroke of his bow and to the ear the first notes it evokes. It might seem strange—if we were not learning in these days so much about thought transference, spiritual suggestion and other psychical facts and possibilities—to think that a single man, sitting with his back to half his associates and directly facing but a few of them, should be able so to influence them all that they will systematically obey or ignore and even controvert the commands of their director, and thus to impress upon them as a body rather his own personality than that of their common master. Ferdinand David was said to have done more to make the Gewandhaus Orchestra what it was than the conductors who nominally controlled both it and him, even though Mendelssohn was among them.

Interest in New Man.

With the coming of a new man to this place at the head of the Symphony Orchestra—where he has had but three predecessors in its score and more of years—several questions arise as to what his influence and usefulness may be. First arises one of nationality. The orchestra is almost entirely German in blood and feeling, having as regular members only the few French wooden-wind players, who could not be easily replaced by men of other lands, a couple of Englishmen, and about as many Americans. What the natural and national temper of the orchestra is has often been unpleasantly shown by its excessive applause of a German soloist and its undisguised and almost supercilious assumption of indifference when a man of another nation has performed. Indeed, at one time, when the choice of a conductor was under consideration and some of the great Frenchmen had been suggested, the founder of the orchestra asked significantly in a note upon the subject if it were likely that the band would respect and obey a director who did not come from their own German stock. It is therefore to be seen whether this same band, with all its rather clanish homogeneity, will be considerate, obedient and pliable under the concert-mastership of a Spaniard, who may be even further from their sympathy than a Frenchman would be. He has in his favor that, after he had been partly formed by Vieuxtemps, he became an admiring, devoted and serious student under Joachim and was for a time leader of the Berlin Philharmonic. After a half dozen hard-working years in Germany he gave some time to Hamburg and finally settled in London, where he has been professor in the Royal Academy. He brings, apparently, his native warmth of temperament, the French finesse and elegance due to Vieuxtemps and the sound reasonableness and classic solidity of Joachim.

Which element of this triad is likely to be most felt in the long run?

Other Masters Compared.

Boston has known two sharply contrasting fashions of mastership. W. Listemann could play anything written for the violin—the most difficult almost as if it were the most facile. He was a fiery, impetuous, undaunted positivist, and when he was once possessed of his daimon he went on, controlled only by that impulse. Sometimes his fellows were entangled and lost in the mazes which were as open champagne country to him, and sometimes, exciting them to follow boldly and securely, he swept on the whole orchestra beyond the conductor's governance to extreme and surprising effects.

Mr. Kneisel, on the other hand, coming to Boston a young man with career and position to make, has always been reflective, calm and conservative, and his influence has been toward self-control, steadiness and intellectuality rather than passionate freedom, although he has shown strength and feeling. His own playing has ever been so exact and elegant, scholarly and sincere, that an admirer once lamented because he would never make a mistake, lose his place or do an inconsiderate thing. He has been close in thought and sentiment to Mr. Gericke, who could hardly have had a lieutenant more in conformance with his ideas.

Mr. D'Arbos enters upon a position made doubly difficult by the possible innate differences of temperament between himself and his chief and companions and by his succession to a favorite and esteemed musician. But his associates and the public must be depended upon to welcome him according to his reputation and accredited accomplishments, to give him favoring opportunity and cordial encouragement, and to bestow upon him without partializing comparisons the just reward of his merits.

CONCERT MASTER.

Rehe. Exp. 13.03
Fernandez Arbos Succeeds
Franz Kneisel.

Interesting Career of the Symphony
Orchestra's First Violinist.

Rudolphe Krasselt, New 'Cellist,
Also a Musician of Note.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra which brings from Europe a new concert-master and first violin and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concert-master in its 22 years' existence. The following is from a sketch of Mr. Arbos by Mr. E. A. Baughan, a London journalist:

Fernandez Arbos was born on Christmas day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin.

RUDOLPHE KRASSELT,
New Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra.

The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war, the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid conserva-

toire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Berliot. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician.

Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Berliot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Mr Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination.

He became leader of the Berlin Phil-

FERNANDEZ ARBOS,
New Concert Master of the Symphony Orchestra.

harmonic society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

In 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. He was chief professor of the violin at the royal college of music and a member of the board of professors, honorary member of the royal academy of music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music, as well as comic opera.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmeister of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concertmeister at Weimar.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first cellist of that organization.

His last engagement before joining the army was as first cellist of the Vienna opera house.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

Bidding at Yesterday's Sale Lively and Average Good.

Sixty-one dollars was the highest premium paid yesterday when the $12 concert seats were put on sale. The prize seat was $ 17. Seats on either side brought half as much. The next highest figure was $51, paid for an aisle seat in the center of the hall. Several seats in the immediate vicinity brought over $40 and two over $45.

The strangest bid was $44 for seats in U 24 and 25, while seat 28 of the same row brought only $9. The lowest bid was $2, which was paid for several seats in J J, the last $12 row on the floor. The highest balcony bid was $38, for seats A 20 and 21. The attendance was good and the prices for the day averaged a bit better than usual.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE CALLS OUT FASHIONABLES

Despite Changes Society's Interest in Musical Organization Never Lessens.

The initial auction sale of the Symphony public rehearsal seats at Symphony Hall on Monday morning served the purpose of collecting a greater aggregation of the smart set than any other happening of the post-summer season.

The sale was briskly conducted and there is another season of unalloyed success assured to Boston's splendid musical organization.

Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, in spite of the many caprices popularly credited to her, never loses interest in music and things musical. She was among the first to arrive at the Monday morning seat sale, having driven over from Brookline in her depot carriage.

During the major portion of the morning she sat in the right hand balcony, going on the floor later to chat with Mr. Alwin Schroeder of the orchestra, who is the 'cellist of the Kniesel Quartet.

Mrs. Gardner is looking particularly well this fall. Monday morning she wore a gown of black nun's veiling, the trained skirt in full accordion effect and the bodice done in jetted bands.

Over this she wore a three-quarters length coat of black taffeta. With this she wore a small black straw hat, colonial in shape and draped in a white chiffon veil.

She wore no gloves, but on her left wrist was a superb snake bracelet of Roman gold in twisted design, and set with a single large topaz.

Others noted at the sale were Hon. and Mrs. George F. Sanger, Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. Samuel N. Aldrich, Mr. William C. Endicott, Jr., Miss Underhill, Mrs. Edward Nelson Kimball, Jr., and Mrs. Frederick Tudor.

SYMPHONY

REHEARSAL & CONCERT SEATS

Are for Sale at
CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE
56 STATE ST. ADAMS HOUSE 05

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS
Seats in 11, $27 each and one seat in V, moderate price. Address F. M. R., Boston Transcript. (A):

$16.50—SYMPHONY CONCERTS
Half of two evening tickets, first balcony centre, D 2 and 3. HERBERT F. SYLVESTER, 43 Bowers St., Newtonville, Mass. (A):

Aptommas Harp Recitals

By the renowned Harpist on FRIDAY AFTER-NOON, Oct. 9th, at 3.30, Faelten Hall, 80 Huntington Avenue. (A):

SYMPHONY
SEASON TICKETS for sale in all parts of the Hall. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. 5t(A): 06

As a usual thing fair weather waits upon the first symphony rehearsal of the year. Or so one may conclude if one has the privilege of consulting the past diaries of a rehearsal girl. And today, though not of the brisk setting-up sort which one may reasonably expect in October, has a soft fairness that makes summer finery seem suitable enough. There is much curiosity among the dear girls to see the new members of the orchestra and judge by appearances, as symphony girls always can, if they look "fit" for the season's work. They can point them out to you, every one of them, if you happen not to be able to recognize them, for the girls who attend these rehearsals regularly, year in and year out, can tell from the remotest seat in the upper balcony the place of every musician and whether or not he is in it.

Symphony Rehearsal and Concert

TICKETS FOR SALE
WADSWORTH'S, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5 Main. Oct. 11, 1903

SYMPHONY TICKETS
Evening, AA centre, $27; also front row left upper balcony, $28. Address E.W.D. Boston Transcript. (A):

OCTOBER 16, 1903.

OLD FAVORITES AND NOVELTY ON PROGRAM

Bauer to Play Tschaikowsky's Piece at Symphony Concert.

WEBER AND DVORAK ITEMS

Selections From Works of These Famous Composers Are Promised to Patrons.

The first symphony program of the new season include two well-known and well-esteemed orchestral numbers—the hunting-flavored overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" and Dvorak's second symphony—the one in D, whose several movements show so agreeably his personal and national characteristics. The first, after its sonorous introduction, is of a pastoral character; the second is contemplative and studied; the third is genial and gracious with a touch of quaintness, and the fourth is a spirited and eager allegro, its brilliant and strenuous finale being long and stirring. The work has been known to Boston audiences since Mr. Henschel introduced it in 1882, and Mr. Gericke has already played it several times.

Will Play Old Favorite.

Between these two numbers will be placed the solo and the novelty of the program. Harold Bauer, who stands foremost for intellectuality, sincerity, self-devotion, pure ideal and lofty accomplishments, and whose mere technical resources are unsurpassed, will play the first pianoforte concerto of Tschaikowsky, which has been heard here from Hepekirk, Joseffy, Sieveking, Sliwinski and others, the last previous player being Harold Randolph, who presented it in December, 1902. It has always been enjoyed for every reason. Its tonality, that of B flat minor, represents one of the most touching minor and one of the most stately major keys in the whole round of diapasons. Its creation caused the composer a bitter hour at first, for Nicolas Rubinstein, to whom he had dedicated it, contemned, derided and caricatured it. But it met different estimation from Von Bulow, who brought it before the world, so that it soon attained such favor that Rubinstein was glad to retract his ill opinion and range himself with its admirers.

Caught From Strolling Beggar.

The first movement, perhaps the most sensitively written of the three, is said to have been suggested by a tune caught from a strolling beggar; its second, an andantino semplice, partly sustained and partly on a Slavish scherzo vein, refers to a gay tune of French origin, but in the third the Slavic disposition of the composer dominates his use of the three themes upon which the vigorous and vivacious rondo is built.

The novelty will be an intermezzo (chosen also from one of his early programs by Theodore Thomas) from Bruneau's unsuccessful opera, "Messidor." When this was produced in Paris, in March, 1897, The Journal printed at full length the laudatory review of the Pall Mall Gazette, and the deplorable French and German criticisms. A few lines, therefore, will suffice to give the reader all he needs now to know.

Early Distinguished.

Lonis Charles Bonaventuro Alfred Bruneau was born at Paris in March, 1857, studied at the Conservatory and won a violoncello player's prize and also a second prix de Rome, the latter in 1881. He has written various concert works and several operas, of which "L'Attaque du Moulin" came nearest to a full success. The theme of this was drawn by the librettist Gallet, from Zola, which perhaps led Bruneau to go to Zola for the book of his next opera, "Messidor," which was furnished in the form of a lyric poem. The story is a legend of the Pyrenees. A stream has supported the dwellers on its banks by bringing them golden sands. One avaricious man has saved his findings and builds a mill which drains the stream. The gold has been given by a miraculous Christ-child, who dwells in a rocky cathedral, and if this is seen by mortal the beneficence will cease. It is discovered, the waters escape in a torrent, and a landslide destroys the once gold-bearing regions. The people must betake themselves to agriculture, and thus regain prosperity. The poem was a vehicle for Zola's mysticism and his theories of life, caste and opposing human conditions, and neither its beauties nor the charms of the music, both of which were undeniable, could save it for the stage. The entr'acte shows Bruneau's lighter thought and touch.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Choice locations; Rehearsals, $27 and $45. Evenings $20, $23, $27. Address F. L. L., Boston Transcript. (A):

$17.50 SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Half of two evening tickets, at $8.75 each; first balcony centre, D 2 and 3. Herbert P. Sylvester, 48 Bowers St., Newtonville, Mass. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKET

$20.00, Concerts (evening), Second Balcony, centre, single seat A14 front row and aisle. Address C.M.R., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKET

FOR SALE—One seat on the floor, MM 29, for the rehearsals. Price reasonable. Address F.O.D., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL BRINGS OUT SOCIETY

Many Fine Gowns Displayed at Yesterday's Concert.

COMING HOME FROM EUROPE

The Steamer Commonwealth Brings Back Delegation of Boston's Smart Set From Abroad.

Society was well represented yesterday afternoon at the initial public rehearsal at Symphony Hall. Mrs. Timothee Adamowski attended in a modish gown of black cloth with hat to match. She was with Miss Madeline Boardman, the latter very chic in a dark blue cloth.

Mrs. "Ollie" Ames was with her mother, Mrs. Preston West.

Mr. Francis Wilson, the comedian, was with his wife, whose costume was a white peau de cygne waist and black skirt.

Mrs. Henry L. Higginson had Mrs. Alexander Higginson with her. Mrs. Neal Rantoul was with her sister, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall. Mrs. Rantoul wore a dark gray tailor gown. Miss Saltonstall was in dark blue velling trimmed in narrow blue satin ribbons. She wore a blue flat hat.

Others present were Mrs. Gorham Hubbard, Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, looking well in white silk waist and gray tailor gown; Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Miss Higginson, Miss Allison Houghton and her mother, Mrs. E. Houghton, Mr. Holker Abbott, president of the Copley Society; his sister, Mrs. William P. Fay, and her daughter, Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Fred R. Comee, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Sears, Mrs. Alfred T. Waite, Mr. Honore Norris, Mr. Arthur S. Hyde (cousin of Mme. Eames-Story), Mr. Dennis, Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Fay, Mr. Lythgow Devens, Mr. Stoddard, Mrs. Aspinwall, Mrs. George Sanger, Mr. R. H. Stearns, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katherine Foot, Mrs. Knowlton, Mrs. Motley, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Thorndike, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Molly Johnson and her sister, Mrs. Jack Lavalley, Mrs. Edward A. Horton, Miss Mary Pecker, Mrs. Rudolph Agassiz, the Misses Susie and Annie Milk, Mrs. Wagniere and her sister, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mrs. Arthur Sargent and her sister, Mrs. Thomas Wales, Mrs. Harold D. Corey, Miss Pancoast, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Amory, Miss Winthrop, Miss Burnham, Miss Susie Howe, Mrs. King, Miss King, Miss Isigli.

SYMPHONY TICKETS
Evening, AA centre, $27; also front row left upper balcony, $23. Address E.W.D. Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY

SEASON TICKETS for sale in all parts of the Hall. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. 5t(A): o 6

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Seats in II, $27 each and one seat in V, moderate price. Address F. M. R., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, will be as follows:
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in B minor for piano...Tschaikowsky
Entr'acte from "Messidor".....Bruneau
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Brahms
Mr. Harold Bauer will be the pianist.

PRICES ARE BETTER.

Sale of $12 Seats for Saturday Evening Symphony Concerts Brings In Higher Premiums.

When the public sale of the $12 seats for the regular Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra had been more than half concluded yesterday morning it was found that better prices had been obtained than at the other sales this fall. The average of the premiums obtained for these seats yesterday was above that of last year. Last season the highest premium obtained was $34 for seats 18 and 19 in row K. Yesterday at different times two single seats sold for premiums of $50, a number for premiums over $40, and a great many at $30 and over.

Bids came briskly after the sale was well started, and the large gathering made competition for desirable end seats so brisk that the regular ticket agents who were after them showed signs of grave surprise at the rates they were compelled to pay to obtain the seats they most desired.

In row J came the surprise of the morning, when the dealers were making things lively in bidding for seats 18 and 19, the two end seats in the center. When they had run the price up pretty well an outsider in the rear of the house began to bid, and the two seats were knocked down to him at a premium of $50 each. All the ticket dealers "rubbered" to see the man to whom the seats had gone, but he was unknown to them.

Row P was also a very high-priced tier of seats, Mr. Wadsworth securing a single center end seat at a premium of $50, and $47 each being paid for two others in the same row.

Today the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FOR SALE—Two good floor seats for alternate Saturdays, $30.00 Address E.T.M., Boston Transcript. (A):

FOR SALE

Two season tickets, SYMPHONY Saturday concerts; on floor front. $19 EACH. Address P.W.C., Boston Transcript. WF(A): o 14

38
HAROLD BAUER.

27
39
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in B flat minor, No. 1,
op. 23.

I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con
spirito.

II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.

III. Allegro con fuoco.

BRUNEAU,

ENTR'ACTE SYMPHONIQUE, from "Messidor."
(First time.)

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Adagio non troppo.

III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.

IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD BAUER.

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte.

HAROLD BAUER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in B flat minor, No. 1,
op. 23.

I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con
spirito.

II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.

III. Allegro con fuoco.

BRUNEAU,

ENTR'ACTE SYMPHONIQUE, from "Messidor."
(First time.)

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Adagio non troppo.

III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.

IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD BAUER.

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS.

The Overture to "Euryanthe," as Usual, Heads the List.

Concerto by Tschalkowsky, Entr'acte by Bruneau and Symphony by Brahms Complete the Programme—Wilhelm Gericke is the Conductor Again This Year.

The programme of the first concert of the 23d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall, last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor for piano, Tschalkowsky
Entr'acte, Symphonique from "Messidor," Bruneau
(First time.)

Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Brahms
The overture to "Euryanthe," in Europe, as well as in this country, often serves as opening or closing piece at a first symphony concert of a season. Thirty years or more ago, when negro minstrels were fashionable as well as popular entertainers, the opening chorus, or, to speak by the card, the "opening load," was an arrangement of a chorus from "Ernani," and it was entitled "O Hail Us, Ye Free!" Had not this particular chorus been sung, the audience would have been suspicious of the jests, songs, dances and farces that followed. So, too, there was a time when all popular concerts began with the overture to "Zampa" or the overture to "Massaniello" or the overture to "Poet and Peasant." In concerts of a more dignified nature "Euryanthe" is accepted by many as the fitting announcement of the beginning of another season.

There is a reason other than more caprice for this choice. The overture is not without a certain old-fashioned but veritable pomp; it has the spirit of ceremony which the admirers of Weber call "the chivalric spirit." What Mr. Apthorp was fond of naming the characteristic Weberian upward rush—in other words, the flourish peculiar to Weber, his signature, which was his mannerism—contributes no doubt to the general feeling of pleasurable expectation and promotes what Athenaeus held to be one of the chief ends of music—"a gentlemanlike joy."

It would be perhaps an idle task for an ultra-modern to insist that the only music in this overture that appeals to the men and women of the younger generation is that of the short episode which was originally intended to accompany a pantomimic scene on the stage, a scene of old-fashioned romantic melodrama, with tomb, kneeling heroine, gliding ghost, and an eavesdropping, intriguing woman. In these few mysterious measures Weber thought far beyond his period. The ultra-modern might say that the rest of the music is decorative and that the decorations are substantial till they are cumbrous; that the melodies are like unto a cameo-brooch worn by a faded woman who remembers nights of coquetry and dances long out of fashion; that the few measures of counterpoint show Weber as a plodding amateur. Nevertheless, the conventionally jubilant swing and the impetuous pace make their way in a concert hall even in 1903.

So, too, the choice of a symphony by Brahms was in this instance judicious. The symphony in D is the most genial of the four, the most easily accepted by an audience, for if there are pages of supreme beauty in it, as toward the end of the first movement, so there are pages that are Mendelssohnian in the form and in the rhythm of the easily retained melodic thought. Mendelssohn, a shrewd composer, seldom, if ever, committed the blunder of surprising an audience. As in the theatre, so in the concert hall, an audience does not wish to be left in doubt, and in this symphony, which is in reality a storehouse of truly beautiful things, there is every now and then a passage that is accepted by the hearer as an agreeable commonplace.

The entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor" is a prelude to the fourth and last act of that opera, for which Zola wrote the libretto in prose. In the opera house the curtain rises toward the end of the prelude and the final measures are enchainé with the music of the scene. The entr'acte is built on five typical themes, for Bruneau invented themes to typify situations or to serve as symbols. An earnest commentator assures us that there are at least 26 of these themes and they must be mastered for the purpose of prompt identification, or the hearer sits in his seat with as foolish a face as that of Parsifal standing during the communion scene in the castle of the Holy Grail. The themes in the entr'acte typify Spring, Sowing, Water, Love and Toil.

In the opera house these themes may suggest what has gone before, serve as a summing up of preceding action, or awaken thoughts concerning the outcome of the story. In a concert hall this entr'acte sandwiched between a concerto and a symphony can be considered only as absolute music. The themes are merely melodies without esoteric significance. As absolute music, the entr'acte is a pleasing work. The themes are fresh; they are introduced with apparent spontaneity; they are not too laboriously combined; and the orchestration is ingenious and sonorous. Bruneau is a composer concerning whom there is a marked difference of opinion even in Paris. A man of decided convictions, a critic who wrote bravely and honestly, he inevitably made enemies. Let us hope that we shall have an opportunity of hearing more of his music and of judging for ourselves. He has composed a symphonic poem, "The Sleeping Beauty," which will soon be played at Chicago, and excerpts from his latest opera, "L'Ouragan," have been warmly applauded in Parisian concert halls.

Tschalkowsky's first piano concerto has been played many times in Boston since it was introduced here and to the world, by von Buelow in 1875. Last night the pianist was Mr. Harold Bauer, and his performance was a memorable one, memorable for rhythm and passion. Tschalkowsky was an oriental in his love of rhythm and color, in his delight in rhythmic iterations, in drum beats or in haunting phrases that repeated do not weary, but take possession of the hearer and fret his nerves.

till he is mastered by the spell, till he thinks and dreams or would fain act to that compelling rhythm.

It has been said of this great tone-poet of longing, anguish and despair, that he at times is melodically trivial or coarse. His melodies have a direct appeal; pathetic, they stab the heart; but their gayety is not that of the idle dancer. Let the tune be at first ever so sprightly, sadness creeps in, and the sadness is soon poignant in the expression of the melancholy. Tchaikowsky might well have written the dance tunes for the revellers in Poe's wild tale; music that now halted strangely, that shuddered in its measure, knowing the approach of masked Red Death. In this concerto how suddenly the merri-ment of the French dance tune in the second movement is chilled! And how the dance fades away as at command.

Now Mr. Bauer not only appreciated the essential spirit of this concerto, which is too often misunderstood or belittled by being turned into a mere show piece, but by an intellectual force charged with artistic passion, he interpreted the music and revealed Tschalkowsky's soul, a soul that, as we now know from the composer's correspondence, was full of strange contradictions; the soul of a man shy, now distrustful and now confident of his genius—one yearning for affection, yet suspicious and inclined toward misanthropy; a man of the loftiest and noblest aspirations, vexed by grievous mental ailments.

The concerto is to be taken as Victor Hugo took Shakespeare—in bulk. It is enough to say of Mr. Bauer's performance that never before did the work seem so colossal in proportions, so tenderly beautiful, so rhythmically entrancing and irresistible, so demoniacally, and yet so nobly, passionate. The long continued and repeated applause was merely the attempt of the audience to show in a measure its profound appreciation of the concerto and Mr. Bauer's artistic worth.

All in all, a concert of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted, and he conducted with fervent authority. His reading of the first movement of the familiar symphony was perhaps especially admirable in a concert that even at the very beginning of the season was often worthy of the reputation of the orchestra at its zenith. Mr. Arbos, the concert master; Mr. Ferir, the violin player, and other new members were in their respective seats. Mr. Krasselt, the cellist, will be present at the next concert.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-Third Season Opens in Symphony Hall—Harold Bauer Soloist—New Faces in the Orchestra.

With the opening of the 23d year of the Boston symphony orchestra, the local musical season may be said to be fairly under way, and for six months at least the outlook presages great activity in the realms of melody, with many famous artists announced to appear in this city and almost innumerable concerts and recitals, vocal and instrumental, scheduled at the various halls. New quartets, prominent orchestras from other cities and grand opera companies will be in evidence during the fall and winter, and no lover of music of the higher class will have any reason to complain either of the quality or quantity of the musical surfeit which is promised by the advance heralding.

This season's symphony orchestra shows some changes in membership. The first desk of the first violins is now allotted to Mr. Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr. Adamowski. Back of them are seated Mr. Birmbaum, a new member, and Mr. Roth. Mr. Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear at the second concert. There is a new viola player, Mr. Ferir, and the second violins have a new leader, Mr. Barleben, formerly of this organization.

One Symphony audience is like another nowadays, and has been for years, and the opening rehearsal and concert were given before the usual large gatherings with the same hearty greetings for Mr. Gericke when he first appeared upon the platform. The program introduced Mr. Harold Bauer as soloist in Tschalkowsky's first concerto, for piano. The orchestral numbers were the "Euryanthe" overture, Weber; entr'acte from "Messidor," Bruneau, for the first time, and Brahms's D major symphony.

Mr. Bauer is very popular in this city, and deservedly so, for his honors have been won by an honest musicianship displayed in the many concerts and recitals in which he has assisted. He is a skilful artist, modest and without affectation; an interpreter who does not exploit the abilities of the performer at the expense of the composer. The Tschalkowsky concerto was played beautifully throughout. The octave chords in the opening theme were given with a grandeur and verve that balanced perfectly with the heavy orchestral background; the peculiar rhythmic dialogue between the solo instrument and the orchestra went as smoothly as one could wish and in the fortissimo finale the piano maintained its proper relations with the orchestral contingents. The daintier second movement was sung with charming effect, the lullaby, of course, showing Mr. Bauer's legato fingering to special advantage. The characteristic Slav melody of the last part was given with delightful abandon and clarity of tone, despite the rapid tempo, and the climax was reached midst applause, for the audience did not wait for the closing measures before beginning its plaudits. Mr. Bauer made many journeys from the retiring room to the stage before his delighted auditors allowed him to finally retire.

The orchestral work was of the usual high standard. The novelty number, Bruneau's entr'acte music, is a pleasing descriptive piece in which the various themes are well contrasted, one movement suggesting the "Pilgrim" chorus from "Tannhauser," and the others showing originality in ideas. The piece is admirably scored, the strings having some charming passage work, and the horns showing up well in the earlier part of the movement. There were no difficulties which the orchestra could not readily meet, and the interpretation was thoroughly commendable.

The familiar "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, with the exquisite pianissimo measures for the strings, which were faultlessly played, and ending with a rousing coda given with excellent effect, open the concerts auspiciously and were cordially received. The Brahms symphony went well, and although to some there are many moments which may be described as uninteresting and vague, the performance lacked nothing in merit.

This week's program will be as follows: Overture in C. Beethoven; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Glazounow's fourth symphony, and Mr. E. F. Arbos will appear as violin soloist, playing a Mendelssohn concerto and a Spanish morceau of his own composition.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

On Saturday began the present season of symphony concerts, the twenty-third in succession. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again conducts, and the make-up of the orchestra is much the same as it was last year, barring the withdrawal of the members of the Kneisel Quartet. This was the programme of the opening concert, Mr. Harold Bauer being the soloist:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."

Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Pianoforte in B-flat minor, No. 1, Op. 23.

Bruneau: Entr'acte Symphonique, from "Messidor." (First time.)

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

So early in the season, even a mediocre concert must give pleasure, but, in point of fact, this first of the twenty-four orchestral concerts was distinguished alike for a delightful programme and for remarkably brilliant playing. Of greatest interest, perhaps, was the prelude from Bruneau's opera, "Messidor," for of this famous composer's work we have heard here little, if, indeed, anything. For many years now Bruneau has enjoyed a high reputation in Paris. He has written orchestral music, several operas which have been produced at the Opéra or the Opéra Comique—where, to be sure, they have never permanently held the stage; he has written, in a charming style, at least two volumes of thoroughly interesting musical criticism; and, latterly, he has become a conductor at the Opéra Comique. In his published criticisms, Bruneau has been an impassioned defender of the use of prose in opera librettos. Putting his theory into practice, he set a prose text by Zola, with results that pleased some but displeased more. The prelude from "Messidor" played the other night is based on six typical themes, or motives, of the opera. Regarded as absolute music, it is indeed pleasant to hear, melodious, easily and naturally flowing, and beautifully orchestrated.

As for the Brahms symphony, the one composition of this master which all the world, anti-Brahms people included, unite in admiring, it was given a performance not soon to be forgotten. Never before has the poetry of the exquisite pages at the close of the first movement been brought out more sympathetically, nor the tender charm of the andantino, which no less a personage than Mr. Runciman compares to a "wild rose." And it is safe to say that rarely, if ever, here, has the finale gone with such amazing brilliancy. The entire symphony, as well as the accompaniment to the concerto, or, indeed, the whole concert, was a triumph of splendid orchestral playing.

In his former appearances here with the orchestra Mr. Bauer has always chosen to play a work that was a rare pleasure to hear, but which has given him little opportunity to display his powers as a virtuoso. By way of a change, probably, on Saturday he played a composition of quite a different complexion, the wild and barbaric B-flat minor concerto of Tchaikovsky, with its tremendous first theme that sweeps listeners off their feet at the start, its moments of frantic passion and of poignant sadness. That Mr. Bauer has added to his great reputation can hardly be claimed. That so absolutely adequate a performance, with so many moments of great brilliancy, with such uniformly beautiful tone, with such musical understanding, could make so little impression is an interesting psychological study. Surely Mr. Bauer played this rhapsodical, demoniacal, fantastic work called a concerto far too much as though it were the Beethoven E-flat concerto. Instead of one long glow of emotion, now passionate, suddenly sad, and then, before one realizes it, gay, its gaiety quickly turning to fury, the concerto, as Mr. Bauer had it, consisted of many sharply contrasted episodes, all stopping neatly and cleanly at the end, with a pause before the next. Mr. Bauer has done far greater playing than this.

At the next concert Mr. E. Fernandez Arbos, new concert master, will play. This is the programme: Beethoven, Overture Op. 115; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin; Wagner, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; E. F. Arbos, Morceau de Concert for violin and orchestra, "Tango"; Glazounow, Symphony No. 4, in E-flat (first time).

R. R. G.

LARGEST CROWD OF WEEK AT SYMPHONY SEAT SALE.

Premiums for $7.50 Places Were Not as High as Last Year—$3 the Minimum.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts was continued this morning, with the largest crowd of the week present to bid for the $7.50 tickets for Saturday evenings. The 917 seats disposed of brought very fair prices, the premiums averaging between $10 and $15, not quite so large as last year.

The better choices brought good bids, while some of the poorer seats went as low as $3 premium. The sale was begun at 10 o'clock, and continued for about three hours, with an almost continual change of onlookers.

Though speculators were present, the greater part of the gathering was made up of persons who bought for their private use. Society bought its tickets earlier in the week, purchasing the $12 seats through agents, but there were still others of the "set" who attended this morning's sale.

First Symphony Rehearsal Of Season This Afternoon.

Handwritten: 16.03

Much Curiosity to See the New Concert-Master, Mr. Arbos, and the New Orchestra Players—The First Two Programmes.

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place this afternoon at Symphony Hall at 2:30. The first concert will be on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. There is natural curiosity to see the new concert-master, Mr. Arbos. Mr. Krasselt, the new first 'cellist, will not join the orchestra until the second concert. Mr. Ferir, the new viola player, who will sit at the same desk with Mr. Max Zach, is a Belgian, who has spent several years in London. The leader of the second violins this season will be Mr. Carl Barleben, who was formerly a member of the orchestra. Mr. Birmbaum, a violinist, plays with the orchestra for the first time. Mr. Gericke has chosen for the first programme these pieces: Overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschalkowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor No. 1; entr'acte from "Messidor," by Bruneau; and Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major. The overture and the symphony are familiar. The piano part of the concerto will be played by Mr. Harold Bauer. Bostonians feel a peculiar interest in this work, for it was played here for the first time in any concert hall by Von Buelow, who cabled the news of success to the composer; and, as the story goes, Tschalkowski borrowed the money to cable back his gratitude. The entr'acte from Bruneau's opera is really a prelude to the fourth and last act, and it is built on "typical themes" used throughout the opera. These are the themes of Spring, Water, Sowing, Toil and Love. The opera itself, when it was produced at the Opera, Paris, excited hot and acrimonious discussion. The libretto, written by Emile Zola, is in prose. Gauthier-Villars said Zola wrote it in prose because he did not have time to versify it, and this was only one of many bitter jests cracked at Zola's expense. Some found symbolism in the story—the struggle between gold and nature. The music was warmly praised and violently condemned. The entr'acte has been played at Parisian concerts.

The programme of the second concert will include Beethoven's overture in C, op. 115, which is seldom played; the Waldweben from "Siegfried," and Glazounoff's symphony No. 4, which will be performed here for the first time. Mr. Arbos will play Mendelssohn's concerto and a Spanish dance of his own composition.

The new string quartet, made up of Messrs. Arbos, Roth, Ferir, Krasselt, is now rehearsing, for Mr. Barth is playing 'cello until Mr. Krasselt will arrive.

TABLE GOSSIP.

—The first Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon drew a larger audience than usual at a first performance, and very many patrons came from their seaside and country homes. Every seat was taken, and Mr Gericke received a demonstration of applause as he came upon the stage. Mr Harold Bauer, the soloist, was recalled again and again after his playing of the concerto, and he has lost none of his former prestige. The places formerly filled by Mr Kneisel and Mr Loeffler were taken by Mr Arbos, the new concert master, who will be the soloist at next week's concert, and Mr Timothee Adamowski. A few in the audience were Mrs James H. Beal, Mr and Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr and Mrs Converse (Miss Tudor), Mrs Irving Wood, Miss Heloise Hersey, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Miss Mollie Johnson, Mrs Albert Nickerson, Mr E. Pierson Beebe, Judge Charles Allen, Mrs Gericke and her little daughter, Mrs Mudgett, Mrs Arthur H. Sargent, Mrs Hall Curtis, Mrs William P. Fay, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Margaret Dana, Miss Susie Amory, Mr Wallace Goodrich, Miss Madeline Boardman, Mrs Frederic R. Comee, Mrs George Mann, Mrs Arthur Stanwood, Mr Arthur Foote, Miss Foote, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Manning, Mrs Thomas Wales and Mr James P. Stearns. Mrs John L. Gardner was not in her accustomed seat, as she is still in Washington. Mrs Adamowski was looking well in a black cloth costume, with black hat, and wearing a corsage bouquet of violets. Mr Ellis and Mr Comee were both on hand, giving a cordial greeting to many old friends.

WANTED—Two tickets for SYMPHONY, FRIDAY AFTERNOON REHEARSALS. Address, stating price and location, M., 517 Exchange Building, Boston. (A):

SYMPHONY

A few good Saturday evening concert tickets for sale and to rent for each concert. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. Tel. 4235-5. (A):

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tschalkowsky.....
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23.
Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist.
Bruneau.....
Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor" (First time.)
Brahms....Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

There ought to be no animadversion upon the first symphony concert of any season, for the orchestra have not quite shaken off vacation ease and the critic who has become music-hungry after a four months' fast, would digest, and enjoy, and rhapsodize over a much poorer orchestra and programme than this. "A short retirement urges sweet return," and the homing of our orchestral swallows is always ardently looked forward to.

On Saturday, for the first time in many years, an element of novelty entered into the orchestra itself! A new "concert-meister," and a new violist, were only two of the stranger guests in the band, but these were the most important. We doubt whether there will be any noticeable change in the ensemble, for Mr. Gericke has a habit of making his added material blend, as we have seen some years ago, when changes were far more frequent than they have recently been. Senor Arbos, the new concert-meister, sat at the chief desk, with Adamowski at his side; emphasizing the change in the first violins. Herr Ferir and other newcomers were seen in the ranks, and next Saturday the new leader of the violoncellos, Herr Krasselt, will be in his place. We shall have an opportunity to judge of these men very soon, Senor Arbos being the first to present himself for criticism, in the Mendelssohn concerto (violin), and in one of his own compositions, at the next concert. The good old "Euryanthe" overture, which began the concert, was as effective as ever. Yet it had one point of surprise. The chief theme of this work ends with a resounding crash, in Weber's most theatrical style. We remember the manner in which Berlioz chops off the head of the young lover, in the "Symphonie Fantastique," and the way in which Rubinstein brings down the house in the "Tower of Babel," but we still regard the explosion with which Weber rounds off (or rather blows off) the end of the chief theme in this overture, as one of the remarkable crushes of music. We were greatly astonished, therefore, when Mr. Gericke caused it to roar as gently as a sucking dove!

The next feature in the interesting game was the playing of the right Bauer. Harold Bauer was certainly the right man in the right place in Tschalkowsky's noble concerto, the concerto that Boston first discovered and appreciated. Often as we have heard the work since its first performance here, in 1875, we doubt if ever it made so strong an impression as upon this occasion. Mr. Bauer is a rival to the great D'Albert in breadth and massive power, and his conception of the concerto was sufficiently individual to give a new interpretation without distortion of any kind. He won a great triumph.

The concerto itself is very long, but not prolix in the slightest degree. It contains enough ideas to fit out the entire modern school of composers with thematic material. Every day we are more impressed with the genius of Tschalkowsky,—a composer who gives originality without eccentricity, who is modern without being full of vagaries! His chief fault is a lack of symmetry and logical sequence; there is a certain roughness in his work, but this gives a barbaric splendor that in itself has a sort of attraction. And this is the man whom the Russians accused of being too German! Had he but possessed a little more of the Teutonic power of detail he would have been one of the greatest tone-masters.

A novelty in the first concert! A bit of the French music of the present, which somewhat resembles the extreme music of the future. We are glad of this earnest of a progressive spirit in the matter of programme make-up. If Bostonians only knew what Theodore Thomas has given the citizens of Chicago in the recent years (sometimes against their will!) they would feel that the sceptre of catholicism in music does not belong to Boston.

Bruneau's Entr'acte was, however, badly placed. Coming after the great concerto it scarcely had a fighting chance. Heard, let us say, after either a Mozart symphony or a D'Indy jumble, it would charm by its thematic work on the one hand and its comparative clearness on the other. It is an earnest work, and sincerity is worth something in these days of musical affectation. It has some broad climaxes which are effective enough. We should hear Bruneau again soon, and in some of his larger works. The Brahms symphony, which closed the programme, made a peculiar effect after an hour of modern passion. It fully demonstrated the sure touch of the master of figure treatment, but it also emphasized the phlegmatic character of the German composer. Tschalkowsky has left it on record that he held Brahms to be decidedly inferior to himself in composition, and this was but natural, for the two are opposites in almost every particular. If Brahms had more of Tschalkowsky, if Tschalkowsky had more of Brahms, in his make-up, then we should have a musical ideal. The two men seem to supplement each other. The Scherzo was, as ever, the gem of the symphony, a calmly beautiful movement with something of the tranquillity of the Bach Christmas Oratorio in its measures. The finale was brilliantly performed, and the two last movements were the best given, and the most interesting of the symphony. The more the pity that the concert was so long that there was a decided exodus before these movements were played. Only the faithful Brahmsites stayed to the end.

46

 Louis C. Elson.

[Photo by Notman.]

SENOR FERNANDEZ ARBOS,

First Violin and Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

35
 47
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE in C major, op. 115.
MENDELSSOHN,	CONCERTO for VIOLIN in E minor, op. 64.
WAGNER,	"WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried."
E. F. ARBOS,	"Tango." MORCEAU DE CONCERT op. 6, No. 3. (First performance.)
GLAZOUNOFF,	SYMPHONY No. 4, in E flat, op. 48. I. Andante. Allegro moderato. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. III. Andante. Allegro moderato (First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. E. FERNANDEZ ARBOS.

for the two are opposites in almost every particular. If Brahms had more of Tschaikowsky, if Tschaikowsky had more of Brahms, in his make-up, then we should have a musical ideal. The two men seem to supplement each other.

The Scherzo was, as ever, the gem of the symphony, a calmly beautiful movement with something of the tranquillity of the Bach Christmas Oratorio in its measures. The finale was brilliantly performed, and the two last movements were the best given, and the most interesting of the symphony. The more the pity that the concert was so long that there was a decided exodus before these movements were played. Only the faithful Brahmsites stayed to the end.

Louis C. Elson.

[Photo by Notman.]

SENOR FERNANDEZ ARBOS,

First Violin and Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE in C major, op. 115.
MENDELSSOHN,	CONCERTO for VIOLIN in E minor, op. 64.
WAGNER,	"WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried."
E. F. ARBOS,	"Tango." MORCEAU DE CONCERT op. 6, No. 3. (First performance.)
GLAZOUNOFF,	SYMPHONY No. 4, in E flat, op. 48. I. Andante. Allegro moderato. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. III. Andante. Allegro moderato (First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. E. FERNANDEZ ARBOS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture in C major, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
.....Mr. Arbos, violinist.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
"Tango," Morceau de Concert op. 6, No. 3
(First performance).....E. F. Arbos
.....Mr. Arbos, violinist.
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff

A programme full of interest and of novelty. But it began rather tamely. Beethoven's C major overture may have been a picture of a festivity in the early years of the 19th century, but it by no means thrills the modern pulses. It received a sedate and conservative reading, as befitted its Sir Charles Grandison style.

Why Mr. Arbos should have chosen Mendelssohn's violin concerto as his visiting card is difficult to understand. There are many violinists who can play this work well, and it is not a revelation of high musicianship to achieve a flawless interpretation of it. Even the Bruch G minor concerto would have given as much of technique and revealed more of individuality and of expression. When Mr. Kneisel, 18 years ago (less one week) presented his credentials, he played Beethoven's great concerto,—a crucial test.

Mr. Arbos played the Mendelssohn work very finely, if a trifle nervous in the first movement. The interpretation of the slow movement was very delicate and refined. Of course the intonation was always perfect and there was no blurring, although the finale was taken at a break-neck speed. The cadenza of the first allegro, oddly placed by the composer in the middle of the movement, was also perfect. Much applause followed the performance and Mr. Arbos was recalled three times. Yet the work was not a convincing one to the reviewer and the points of technique, even, were not of sufficiently exacting character whereby to judge a virtuoso.

These, however, came later in a composition by Mr. Arbos himself. In the Tango Mr. Arbos' foot was upon his native heath (if there are any heaths in Spain) and he displayed a most brilliant virtuosity. The work itself was but a popular trifle, with variations of a theme in an easily-grasped manner, but the tricks of execution which garnished it made it piquant enough. There were harmonics galore, and double stopping; pizzicato effects and combinations of pizzicato and arco (bow); skips, runs, chords and G string display. In short, Mr. Arbos in this composition showed that he is a virtuoso of high rank. He reminded one of Sarasate in this school of execution.

The gem of the programme was Wagner's "Waldweben". One can enjoy this fully as well in Symphony Hall as in Boston Theatre. On the operatic stage one has several adjuncts that draw the mind away from the glorious music. There is a bird that will not fly, a dragon with a face like an apothecary shop-window on a dark night, Siegfried piping on a reed which often speaks in the orchestra a few seconds after he blows, and a canvass forest that does not help the mental picture in any degree. Here we are spared these handicaps and have besides, an orchestra such as one does not hear in American Wagner performances in any opera house. The interpretation was altogether beautiful, the manifold voices of the strings being well-balanced and the intricate score being made as clear as it ever can be.

Glazounoff's fourth symphony has a fault that leans very far over to Virtue's side. It is too melodic! It opens with two chords, in the style of Beethoven's Heroic symphony, but this preamble leads to a Russian pastorelle rather than to anything sterner. The chief theme is lyrical and gentle, after the manner of a subordinate theme, and, as a consequence, the themes of the first movement lack contrast. The development is rather confused, but exposition and recapitulation are very sweet and so clear that the movement ought to become popular at once.

The Scherzo is a melodic gem, and here the tuneful character can only be regarded as a merit. There are carollings and pipings in great profusion and even a drone bass adds to the pastoral character. The composer displays a great affection for the woodwind (all the Russians seem masters of this department of the orchestra) and he gives a chord accompaniment of wind instruments that is novel and effective. There is a strongly rhythmic undertone that saves the movement from becoming too effeminate. The trio is, however, as saccharine as a Mendelssohn Song without Words, and the muted strings carry on a most tuneful theme.

In the finale the composer uses a slow introduction (he omits a slow movement, altogether) and then plunges into the most complicated counterpoint, as if to make up for the prettiness of the first two movements. There is more than a suggestion of Tschalkowsky in this movement, and a waltz-like theme accentuates the resemblance, for Tschalkowsky and Berlioz are the only two great composers who have used the waltz in a symphony. There was some beautiful oboe playing in this finale, but the horns were not as secure as usual.

The symphony is short, melodious, popular, and should not be shelved. It would be well to hear it again, if only to prove that there are a few composers who still write music.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The second symphony concert, held Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, was made interesting by the first appearance in Boston of the new concert-master, Mr. Arbos, and, in lesser degree, by the first hearing of a new symphony by Glazounoff. This was the programme:

Beethoven: Overture in C major, op. 115.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin in E minor, op. 64.
Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
E. F. Arbos: "Tango," Morceau de Concert, op. 6, No. 3.
(First performance.)
Glazounoff: Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.
(First time.)

All the world, naturally, was agog to hear Mr. Arbos play. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the new violinist should have appeared for the first time here on an evening when inspiration and enthusiasm were, for the most part, conspicuously lacking. The Beethoven overture in C major, very correctly played, aroused feelings only of wonder that Beethoven, in his later years, should have written so dry and academical a work; also that any conductor, in this year of 1903, should choose to produce it.

It was after this depressing introduction that Mr. Arbos played. Evidently a musician of solid worth and an accomplished violinist, he showed throughout the Mendelssohn concerto an agitation and a disquiet that plainly bespoke painful nervousness. He was more at his ease in his own pretty trifle, the set of Spanish dances called "Tango," but still it would be discourteous to Mr. Arbos to opine that on Saturday he was at his best. One point, however, is from many signs clear: the nervousness that to some extent marred his solo performance in no wise affects Mr. Arbos' manifest ability as concert-master.

Between the two solo pieces came the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," rather dryly and prosaically played till the end, when the entire orchestra swept up to a magnificent climax.

The main offering of the concert was the first performance in Boston of a symphony, No. 4, by Glazounoff. Although this composer is but thirty-eight or nine years old, he has found time, in the intervals of teaching instrumentation and of conducting symphony concerts, to write seven symphonies, several symphonic poems, long ballets, and other orchestral works. Whatever else may be thought of this symphony No. 4, in E-flat, it by no means savors of labor and of frantic search after ideas, for it is absolutely spontaneous and glows with life. There are only three movements, the necessary contrast, however, being furnished by slow introductions to the first and third movements. While the symphony was constantly a pleasure to hear, from the Oriental richness and the sparkling brilliancy of its orchestration, and the piquancy and the variety of its rhythms, once heard it leaves little impression beyond that of a charming fantasia, in which pretty themes (the first, by the way, sounding as though the composer had borrowed it from Dvorak, after the doctor's researches in America) appear, are tossed about in varying forms, and then disappear. Of the three movements, the gay scherzo, really delightful, seems strongest, although the finale works up to a high point of brilliancy. On the whole, it is the gorgeous raiment rather than the body of the symphony that makes its hearing so well worth while. It is indeed on quite a different level from the first movement of the composer's sixth symphony, played here a few seasons ago. The performance was admirable.

This week Mme. Johanna Gadske purposes singing with the orchestra. This will be the programme: Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala"; Mozart, Aria, "Il Re Pastore"; D'Indy, "La Fort Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland); Massenet, Aria from "The Cid"; Schumann, Symphony in D Minor, No. 4. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second symphony program introduced the new concert master, Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos, for the first time in this country as a soloist. His selections were Mendelssohn's E minor concerto for violin and the Arbos concert piece, "Tango," a kind of Spanish dance. The other program numbers were Beethoven's C major overture, the forest music from Wagner's "Siegfried" and Glazounoff's fourth symphony, the latter piece and the "Tango" by Mr Arbos being new at these concerts. The debut of Mr Arbos as soloist made the concert of special interest, for he challenged comparison with other violinists heard in the city by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto, a graceful, brilliant and sentimental work, in which the solo instrument is so prominent that any lack of skill in the performer is readily detected.

At the outset Mr Arbos showed that a quiet elegance and daintiness of tone marked his execution, and if this tone was not very broad it was, nevertheless, of a resonant quality and pure. All the themes in the first part of the concerto were beautifully delivered, the cadenzas and trills were exquisitely given and accomplished with seeming ease, and the arpeggios were handled with the skill of a master. In the second part the breaks in the melodies were played very smoothly, soloist and orchestra being in perfect accord, and the dashing finale, though a bit lacking in vigor, was a splendid example of rapidity in chord fingering and complicated bowing. In execution Mr Arbos left nothing to be desired, for all the work of the left hand was distinguished by a clarity of tone and deftness of fingers that made his performance highly enjoyable and satisfied his auditors that the new artist was admirably equipped for his labors with the great orchestra.

His own composition, "Tango," a florid, sprightly bit of dance music, was played with an abandon, verve and technical skill that were delightful. At the close of each number Mr Arbos was greeted with immense applause and recalled innumerable times to the platform.

The Glazounoff symphony has but few of the so-called Russian characteristics, dissonant phrases and cross harmonies, and although the heavier instruments are vigorously employed at times the score is generally free from the harshness usually found in the longer works of the Slav composers of the present day. Many of the themes are given alternately to different instruments in brief solos or duets, suggesting rather too much of repetition, specially in the first movement; but the orchestration is as clever as it is complicated, and the instrumental combinations are very effective and usually harmonious. One peculiar arrangement for the instruments makes the violins play a theme in the upper register, while the basses and brasses furnish a robust staccato background. The third part is rather chaotic in tempo and musical matter, until the key is attained, then the close becomes a rushing finale. The orchestra played the score commendably as a whole, if one may judge from a single hearing of the work. The clarinets and flutes in their figurations were in unison, the horns heard to advantage in their more robust phrases and the heavier instruments intoned the rapid passages smoothly. The symphony is hardly one that will please the general ear, though the admirable performance by the orchestra entitled it to respectful consideration, which it received.

The majestic opening in the Beethoven overture was given with the proper ceremonious treatment and the joyous finale went with splendid swing and dash. In the wonderful forest music from "Siegfried" the orchestra played with its usual spirit and nicety in shades of expression, the familiar excerpt being received with great favor.

This week's program will have Mme Galski as soloist. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and an excerpt from Massenet's opera, "The Cid." The other selections will be the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala"; "The Enchanted Forest," a symphonic poem by D'Indy, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

ARBOS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the second Symphony concert last evening, Conductor Gericke presented the following programme:

Beethoven.....Overture in C major, Op. 115
Mendelssohn.....Concerto for violin, Op. 64
Wagner....."Waldweben," from "Siegfried"
Arbos....."Tango," concert piece, Op. 6, No. 3
Glazounoff.....Symphony No. 4

Fernandez Arbos was the soloist. The feature of the orchestral number was the symphony of Glazounoff in E flat, Op. 48, which was heard for the first time in this city.

The work is of only moderate length, in three movements, more or less subdivided, and is brilliantly scored, like most of the latter-day Russian compositions.

The performance was a very fine one, and the symphony is certainly worth another hearing in the near future.

Beethoven's overture in C major, which began the programme, has not been heard at these concerts for many years.

The "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" was superbly played and made the usual delightful impression.

The soloist was the new cornet master, Fernandez Arbos, who made his first appearance last evening. His interpretation of the familiar Mendelssohn concerto was without affectation, clean cut and at times most brilliant.

The finale has been given her by some other artists with more virtuosity and brilliancy than was the case last evening, but as a whole the performance was highly artistic and worthy of much commendation.

The programme of the third rehearsal and concert will include Goldmark's popular "Sakuntala" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony, and a symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," by D'Indy. Mme. Galski will sing numbers by Mozart and Massenet.

ARBOS ESTABLISHED IN HIGH POSITION

Journalist — Editor
Solo Performance at Symphony Concert Splendid One.

"TANGO" HEARD FIRST TIME

Artist's Own Composition Proves Diverting and Full of Abandon in Expression.

Mr. Arbos, by his solo performances at the second symphony, placed himself at once in the caste of true and high artist. In spite of all the ardor, chivalry, passion and abandon of the Spanish nature, there is always in it a fundamental element of gravity. One feels that the mendicant is somehow akin to the hidalgo and wears his torn cap and rags as he might carry a plumed hat and cloak, and even when Don Quixote most moves our laughter or our pity, we recognize regardfully his inherent dignity.

Mr. Arbos lacked neither poetry, vitality nor warmth in the Mendelssohn concerto, of which his playing was elegant, wholesome, symmetrical and well-colored; but still, if one were to characterize it briefly, it would be to consider it as rather reflective and restful in its general temper.

There was none of the half pathetic languor of Camilla Urso, nor yet of that most intemperate rush and outcry of De Seve. The opening allegro glowed with the lambent light of a happy content that might well range with the pleasing, bland melancholy of Jacques, which indeed it might have served to illustrate, while the finale rejoiced lightsomely with a spirit of such fairy frolic, as breathes life into so many of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" scenes, only intensified and enforced by a man's energy and activity. It was a rendering that appealed alike to intellect, fancy and taste and contented all.

"Tango" for First Time.

Mr. Arbos' own "Tango" concert dance now heard in public for the first time was diverting and animating, but seemed rather a ballable to dance with than by, marking rather say spirits than regular steps and figures. Being of a light and lively nature, rising to eager and active exhilaration as it proceeds toward its climax, it gave more opportunity for virtuosity in technique and abandon in expression. But while that virtuosity was ample, easy and affluent, it was always as the means to an end, and not displayed for itself alone, and behind the abandon there was always a light sense of reserve to qualify and dignify it.

The definite impression derived then from the hearing of his two numbers confirmed Mr. Arbos as an artist whose mastery of his instrument is complete in strength and fulness—for his tone is large and rich—as well as in facility of execution, variety of color and finesse of detail, whose mind is clear, whose judgment sound, and whose sentiment is honest, delicate and persuasive. A single debut only serves to fix a few gauge-points, however, and one must wait for the advance of the season to draw all the outline and fill the whole body of his disposition, ability and artistry, from which much good will be expected.

Beethoven Overture.

The Beethoven overture, broad, stately and strong at first, and then nobly gay and festive, began the evening well, and the ever-delightful pictorial poetry of Weber's "Waldweben" made a refreshing interlude.

The Glazounoff fourth symphony, new to Boston, shows in its idealism and in the limning thereof in orchestral colors that known sympathy of its author for the romantic, the legendary and the mysterious, and hinted at the predilection which he still preserves for the ballet—the real ballet, with its continuous story, its definite personages, its truthful, pantomimic action and its constant blending of the poetry of motion with that of sound. It has but three movements, and in their subdivisions the andante seems to be both the favorite and the prevailing tempo.

The tones are sometimes languorously sentimental, or again dreamy and lulling; but they are always romantic and winning. The scherzo of the second movement, which leaves the quieter tonality of the first movement, centering closely about the grave tranquillity of E flat, and passes at once into the vigorous vitality of E flat, is full of hearty happiness told in phrases that ring and roll as with merry cordial laughter. It thus brings a strong contrast, but is not too antipathetic in sentiment or shape.

Suave Amatory Theme.

The last movement opens with a suave amatory theme, but as the treatment enlarges with episodes for trumpets and strong wood winds, and assertive though not vehement contrapuntal elaboration, it becomes emphatic and almost declamatory. The instrumentation becomes richer and more diversified, and the variety of thematic treatment is more insisted upon. It justifies the composer's place as eminent among Russian professors of orchestration; but it is neither pedantic, tedious nor heavy, although scholarly, authoritative and forcible.

The orchestra did excellently by the work, which made so favorable an impression that the mass of the audience would evidently enjoy a repetition while it is still bright in mind.

The next program does not offer novelties, but it holds out the pleasing promise of arias from Mozart and Massenet, to be sung by Mme. Galski.

THE second Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was a crush, for there was a strong desire to hear Mr. Arbos, the new concert master upon his first appearance as a soloist. He was warmly applauded both upon his entrance and after his playing. One could not help noting the strong resemblance of the young violinist to Mr. Gericke, a sort of younger brother indeed. He has the same coloring and figure and wears his beard similarly. It had at first sight really an odd effect, as if Mr. Gericke of 1892 was leading the violins and Mr. Gericke of 1903 the orchestra. Mr. Arbos made a wonderfully good impression, and his modesty was not the least of his charm.

Some of those at the rehearsal were Mrs. Boylston Beal and her sister, Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer Crosby, Mrs. John Fairchild, who was with Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Miss Susan Thayer, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Mrs. Preston West and her daughter Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. T. Adamowski, who had Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott with her; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Jordan, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Minna Lyman, with Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Charles Head and Miss Margaret Head, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Miss Abby Manning and her niece, Miss Margaret Manning; Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Elizabeth Devens, Miss Dorothy Forbes, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. C. W. Barron and her daughter, Miss Jane Waldron; Mrs. John E. Hudson, Mrs. F. L. Emerson and Mrs. George Cushing and her sister, Miss Alice Littleton.

Miss Gertrude Elliott (Mrs. Robertson) attracted much admiring attention. She wore a simple but effective costume of dark-tinted cloth, brightened with red, and a large picture hat. Mrs. Gardner has changed her rehearsal places which she has always had heretofore in the front row of the right balcony to the back seats against the wall, as she says the lights are less trying there. Mme. Gadski will be the soloist this week.

CTOBER 23, 1903.

MUSICAL BOSTON TO HEAR A NEW MASTER

Debut of Mr. Arbos Slated to Take Place This Week.

PROGRAM IS ATTRACTIVE

Includes a Mendelssohn Concerto, Beethoven Overture and Original Piece.

A personal and artistic interest attaches to the Symphony program of this week, because it provides for the Boston debut of Mr. Arbos, the new concert-master. For his serious and classical selection he will play the Mendelssohn concerto, an undying favorite with virtuosi and their audiences. First presented in London in 1845, it has been heard wherever high violin music is known, and there is scarcely a player of any consequence who has it not in his standard repertory, so that to cite all who have used it in Boston would be virtually to catalogue all the violinists who have figured in concerts here. It gives joy in the hearing and it is so familiar as to furnish a better gauge of an artist than almost any other.

It is all genial, elegant, fanciful and lively. Mendelssohn is at his best and happiest in it, and its beauties and graces of form were probably enhanced by the technical skill of David, who was so long in the Gervandhaus orchestra, and was often consulted while the concerto was a-making. The movements will be remembered as three—an impassioned allegro, an andante, and a vivacious allegro. The construction is such as to offer chance for sentimentality, dash, gayety or ebullient spirits at the fancy of the player, and excuse can be found for some excess in any one of these directions. It will be easy to argue from Mr. Arbos' reading whether conservatism or temperament is likely to predominate in his work here. Besides the concerto he will play a morceau of his own writing, a tango or tanago. Mr. Arbos explains that there is a dance bearing the same name, which he thinks to be of Cuban origin. It is an outdoor dance, for fiestas or festal occasions, and it is still in vogue. His music is meant to be appropriate and illustrative.

A not very familiar Beethoven overture, the opus 115, will begin the program. This was under the composer's hand for two years, being devised as part of an intended setting for Schiller's "Hymn to Joy," which was finally absorbed into the ninth symphony. It was appropriated, however, in 1814 for a celebration of the Emperor's name-day, and so called "Namenfeier." It has a stately, marchlike opening, and passes soon into a lively and good-humor 6-8 form, which continues to the end.

The grateful, lulling, "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," will be given, and there will be for a novelty Glazounoff's fourth symphony, being that in E flat which he introduced to London in 1889 at a Philharmonic concert.

ARBOS' DEBUT AS A SOLOIST

New Symphony Concert-
Master I sto Make His First Appearance in America in This Role Today.

PROF. J. K. PAINE ON MUSIC'S FUTURE.

Harvard Man Spoke at the Dedication of Wagner Monument, Predicting a World-Wide Art.

Mr. E. Fernandez Arbos, the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance as a soloist in this country this afternoon at the second public rehearsal and tomorrow evening at the second concert. He will play Mendelssohn's familiar concerto and a piece of his own composition. Few wandering virtuosos have played the concerto at Symphony concerts, but it has been played by Messrs. De Seve, Nowell, Loeffler, Kneisel and Miss Leonora Jackson.

Mr. Arbos' own composition, entitled "Tango," is one of a set of three pieces for violin and orchestra, composed this year at London. "Tango" is dedicated to Sarasate, and it will be played this afternoon for the first time. The title is the name of a dance, still popular in Spain in the street and in hall and theatre. Mr. Arbos is inclined to think that both name and dance are of West Indian origin, and the tango is still danced in Cuba.

The orchestral pieces on the Symphony programme of this week are an overture in C major, op. 115, by Beethoven; the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Glazounoff's symphony No. 4 in E flat major. The overture is seldom heard either in this country or in Europe. It was written, as some say, for the "Name day" celebration of the Emperor Joseph II., but others scout the idea and insist that it had its origin in sketches for the finale of the ninth symphony. The body of the overture is developed from a theme that is almost insignificant. Glazounoff's symphony was composed in 1893. It is in three movements, without a separate slow movement, but the first movement and the finale are introduced by an andante. The music is not ferociously Russian in its character. The symphony is played here for the first time. It will include an early work by Vincent d'Indy, a symphonic poem, entitled "The Enchanted Forest." It is at least 25 years old, but some of our novelties come late. Mme. Gadski will sing an air from Massenet's "Cid" and an air from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore." The other orchestral numbers will be the overture to "Gakuntala" and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor. The orchestra will leave the following Sunday for its first trip to Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York.

The first of the Kneisel concerts in Potter Hall will be on next Tuesday evening. The programme will include Schubert's posthumous quartet, the one with the variations on the "Death and the Maiden" theme; a piano trio by Smetana (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); and a new quartet by Kopyloff. Alexander Kopyloff is counted a member of the younger Russian school, although he is in his 50th year. He has written a symphony in C minor and a scherzo for orchestra, two string quartets, fugues and other pieces for piano, choruses and songs. The quartet is said to be exceedingly interesting on account of its beauty and strength. It is by no means revolutionary, and there is no straining after grand effects. The Kneisel quartet has just made an engagement to play in Paris on March 15 of next year. Mr. Arbos is busy preparing the programmes for the concerts of his quartet in Jordan Hall. The programme of the first concert will be Beethoven's quartet in F minor and Tschalkowsky's piano trio, with Mr. Harold Bauer as pianist. Mr. Arbos will play excerpts from Bach's suite in E major for violin alone. The programmes will be composed of both ancient and modern works, and Cesar Franck, Faure, d'Indy and the Russians will be represented, as well as Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann.

Prof. John K. Paine of Harvard University spoke at the banquet on the night of the dedication of the Wagner monument at Berlin. He closed as follows: "We all realize that most of the forms of modern music have been developed to the highest point by the great masters of Germany from Bach to Wagner. Through their supremacy the strict national limits of musical style have been greatly modified. It is no longer a question of purely German, Italian, French, Slavonic or Anglo-Saxon music, but cosmopolitan music. No doubt certain national characteristics will continue to exist, but I believe, in the future, composers will be distinguished more by their individuality of style than by nationality or what is called local color. It is with this strong conviction that I enthusiastically propose the toast 'The Future of International Music.'"

Mr. Harold Bauer's first recital in Steinert Hall will be on the afternoon of Wednesday, Nov. 4, when he will play Brahms' variations on a theme by Handel; Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor, and pieces by Chopin (among them the Tarantelle), Schubert and Saint-Saens.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Glazounoff's Fourth Symphony
a Novelty for Boston.

Mr. Arbos, the Concert Master, Makes His First Appearance as a Violinist, Playing "Tango"
One of His Own Compositions—A
Glance Backward. P. Hall

The programme of the second concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last evening in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Concerto for violin... Mendelssohn
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".... Wagner
"Tango," concert piece for violin.... Arbos
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major.... Glazounoff
(First time.)

Beethoven's overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name-day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the ninth symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tschalkowsky is rank fetishism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boring.

Glazounoff's symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his 39th year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliance, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism; sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and exhales the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this symphony in E flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the sixth symphony, but how high it towers above the "Raymonda" suite and the "Solemn" overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination. The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are not of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasantly but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again. The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gaiety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the piquancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter-day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (Oct. 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurity, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr. Arbos played the other movements with greater self-control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as it is, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr. Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or colonial dance tune with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a Promenade than to a Symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

Mus. Courier Oct 21, 1903

BEFORE reprinting what Philip Hale thought and wrote in last Sunday's Boston Herald on the opening of the twenty-third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be well to state that for the first time in ten years seats for these concerts were for sale at Symphony Hall, and that at the auction sale of tickets for the season there was a loss of about 25 per cent. on the Friday afternoon sales and of about 10 per cent. on the Saturday evening sales, as compared to the sums received last season.

Two reasons are assigned for this manifestation of a decreasing interest. The one is the absence of attractive solo stars, which is proved by the fact that the prices of the tickets for the concerts when Melba is to appear are advanced by the ticket speculators to figures far ahead of the average concerts, which indicates that Boston musical culture is no lower and no higher than the music culture of this star ridden town.

The second reason assigned for the falling off of income is the self evident fact that Mr. Gericke as a conductor fails to draw. Naturally THE MUSICAL COURIER, like other critical sources, has its theory for this. People very soon tire of academic orchestral conducting, and they will find in this city this approaching season the reason why so many European communities have become interested and fascinated by some of the men who are coming over here to conduct the Philharmonic concerts. Most very deeply or analytically into the playing of the Boston and are no longer academic authority. Mr. It will be ob-ng from the fact

; which, like all
ependent, cannot
e, as will be seen
pon any criticism
will be observed
hat the daily mu-
e the absent com-
the local musician,

with their permanent vorably by the critic, be-daily papers, being the n, cannot afford to have olumns. They are in a

NY CONCERTS.

New York 1903

EVENING, NOVEMBER 5.
..... Weber
..... Mendelssohn
..... Wagner
..... Brahms

AFTERNOON, NOVEM-

..... Goldmark
..... Weber
..... (d'après une Ballade
..... D'Indy
ew York.)
..... Schubert
..... Schubert
..... Glazounoff
America.)

ts of the Boston Symphony
be regarded as among the
of our metropolitan season.
ass this splendid organiza-
the world, and it is a cusalmost every respect. A ring attends the concerts
nd on Thursday and Sat-ll saw all the old familiar
new. The attendance must nd the manager.

special reason for going
the playing of the Boston

Overture in C major, op 115.....Beethoven
 Concerto for violin.....Mendelssohn
 "Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
 "Tango," concert piece for violin.....Arbos
 (First performance.)
 Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major....Glazounoff
 (First time.)

Beethoven's overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name-day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the ninth symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tchaikowsky is rank fetishism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boresome.

Glazounoff's symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his 39th year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliance, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism; sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and exhales the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this symphony in E flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the sixth symphony, but how high it towers above the "Raymonda" suite and the "Solemn" overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination. The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are not of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasant but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again. The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gaiety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the piquancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter-day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (Oct. 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurity, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr. Arbos played the other movements with greater self-control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as it is, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr. Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or colonial dance tune with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a Promenade than to a Symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

Mus. Courier Oct 21, 1903

BEFORE reprinting what Philip Hale thought and wrote in last Sunday's Boston Herald on the opening of the twenty-third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be well to state that for the first time in ten years seats for these concerts were for sale at Symphony Hall, and that at the auction sale of tickets for the season there was a loss of about 25 per cent. on the Friday afternoon sales and of about 10 per cent. on the Saturday evening sales, as compared to the sums received last season.

Two reasons are assigned for this manifestation of a decreasing interest. The one is the absence of attractive solo stars, which is proved by the fact that the prices of the tickets for the concerts when Melba is to appear are advanced by the ticket speculators to figures far ahead of the average concerts, which indicates that Boston musical culture is no lower and no higher than the music culture of this star ridden town.

The second reason assigned for the falling off of income is the self evident fact that Mr. Gericke as a conductor fails to draw. Naturally THE MUSICAL COURIER, like other critical sources, has its theory for this. People very soon tire of academic orchestral conducting, and they will find in this city this approaching season the reason why so many European communities have become interested and fascinated by some of the men who are coming over here to conduct the Philharmonic concerts. Most

very deeply or analytically into the playing of the Boston

and are no longer authority. Mr.

It will be ob-
 ing from the fact
 ; which, like all
 ependent, cannot
 e, as will be seen
 pon any criticism
 will be observed
 hat the daily muse the absent com-
 the local musician,

with their permanent
 vorably by the critic, be-daily papers, being the n, cannot afford to have olumns. They are in a

NY CONCERTS.

—
 EVENING, NOVEMBER 5.
 .....Weber
 .....Mendelssohn
 .....Wagner
 .....Brahms

AFTERNOON, NOVEM-

.....Goldmark
 .....Weber
 onie (d'après une Ballade
 .....D'Indy
 ew York.)

.....Schubert
 .....Schubert
 .....Glazounoff
 America.)

ts of the Boston Symphony
 be regarded as among the
 f our metropolitan season.
 ass this splendid organiza-
 the world, and it is a cus-
 almost every respect. A ring attends the concerts
 ind on Thursday and Sat-
 ll saw all the old familiar
 new. The attendance must
 nd the manager.

special reason for going

Concerto for violin, op. 115, Mendelssohn
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner
"Tango," concert piece for violin, Arbos
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major, Glazounoff
(First time.)

Beethoven's overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name-day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the ninth symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tschalkowsky is rank fetishism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boring.

Glazounoff's symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his 39th year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliance, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism; sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and exhales the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this symphony in E-flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the sixth symphony, but how high it towers above the "Raymonda" suite and the "Solemn" overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination. The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are not of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasant, but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again. The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gaiety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the piquancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter-day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (Oct. 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurity, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain performance. Mr. Arbos, other movements with great control, and he often reveals an accomplished violinist himself, admirably made a work to call forth the strain of a great artist. The sandpapered, and the part of a Sir Charles Grandison of ladies. The music raised to its highest point Arbos played it as a sentiment, not as a sentimental thoughtless virtuoso. He applauded after the concert his own "Tango," which set of variations on a signal dance tune with in postlude. This piece of piquancy, but it is one of the Promenade than to a concert, for its intrinsic value.

Mme. Lisa Delh

There were more than 200 guests distinction in art and letters, the home of one of our most structures was brilliant with the

Mr. Walker was worse box than the
Mrs. Mary W. Ketc

Among those present were Dr. Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Dana, Nye, Dr. and Mrs. Theodore ding and Miss Redding, Mrs. ter, Mrs. B. Simonson, Mrs. K. Miss Kate Percy Douglas, Jo

Mrs. Sydney Rosenfeld, the Waldweben, from Siegfried. Chaffin, Mrs. George Olcott, Theodore Conolly and Miss Co

lane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Sa Mrs. Earle, Miss Woodward, Simonson, Miss Mary McCull

Black, Stephen Hewlett, Dr. a Mrs. Frederick Goodwin, Miss Hewlett, Professor and Madam

Madame Jeannin, Miss Ada Pat Hauser, Mr. Rudra, Mr. and M

the Misses Spencer, Mr. and M West, Mrs. Stephen C. Hunter

Mrs. J. Albert Hawkins, the Mis Mrs. Belleville, Miss Ruby Rees Mrs. Archie Robinson, Mrs. Hen of these men have graduated and are no longer academicians, but are demonstrators of authority. Mr. Gericke is an amiable time beater. It will be observed that Mr. Hale, who is suffering from the fact that he is writing for a daily paper, which, like all dailies, cannot afford to be independent, cannot afford to print the truth. Mr. Hale, as will be seen by the following, does not enter upon any criticism of Mr. Gericke's conducting. It will be observed by students of these phenomena that the daily music critic can always freely criticise the absent composer and the transient guest, but the local musician, the local musical institution, with their permanent pull, cannot be treated unfavorably by the critic, because the owners of the daily papers, being the slaves of their public opinion, cannot afford to have the truth printed in their columns. They are in a

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FIRST CONCERT, THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5.
Overture to Euryanthe.....Weber
Concerto in E minor, for violin, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....Brahms

SECOND CONCERT, SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7.
Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from Der Freischütz.....Weber La Forêt Enchantée, Légende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade d'Uhland .....D'Indy
(First time in New York.)

Songs—
Gretchen am Spinnrade.....Schubert
Erlkönig .....Schubert
Symphony No. 4, in E-flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff
(First time in America.)

These annual New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have in time come to be regarded as among the most important musical events of our metropolitan season. It has long been customary to class this splendid organization with the best orchestras in the world, and it is a custom which seems justified in almost every respect. A large and representative following attends the concerts here of the men from Boston, and on Thursday and Saturday of last week Carnegie Hall saw all the old familiar faces and a goodly sprinkling of new. The attendance must have cheered both the players and the manager.

There is at this late day no special reason for going very deeply or analytically into the playing of the Boston

56
Symphony Orchestra. This body was long ago letter perfect in everything that pertains to orchestral routine, and there was no cause to suppose from the playing at the concerts last week that the leader has lessened his vigilance or the orchestra its earnestness. We have heard the Boston Symphony in nearly all the classical works, and we have many times bestowed on them the large measure of praise and the small share of adverse criticism their work warrants. It remains but to say that the widely advertised changes in the personnel of the body were without any audible effect on its playing. There were the same suavity, the same elegance, the same even balance of tone, that have always distinguished the Boston Orchestra from our local organizations. The first violins played with more elasticity and with better bowing under the new concertmaster, but that is a question of temperament rather than of musicianship. The first 'cellist had little opportunity to display any individual prowess, but his tone was sympathetic, even if small.

The Weber, Wagner and Brahms numbers of the first concert need only general comment. Mr. Gericke's merits and demerits are familiar to all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER and they are familiar, too, to the persons who year in and year out have heard Mr. Gericke's readings of the standard score. It seems superfluous therefore to state that the Weber number was done con amore, that the "Waldweben," though a technical delight, lacked freedom and warmth, and that the Brahms Symphony was austere and correct. It is not the Hamburg master's greatest creation, by the way.

The soloist of the Thursday concert, E. Fernandez-Arbos, made a favorable impression on the whole, though following so closely on the heels of Thibaud it was inevitable that the Spaniard should suffer by comparison. Such violin playing as Thibaud's is not heard often in a decade, and it was certainly not heard in the performance of Mr. Arbos. It is not quite just to pass a final opinion at this moment on his solo playing. Mr. Arbos was plainly so nervous that he could not do himself justice. His intonation was lamentable and his phrasing unnatural for such a good musician as we know him to be. His tone wavered and wanted in warmth. His left hand is speedy, but erratic. However, as was remarked before, this criticism must be taken with reservations, and it is to be hoped that it may be revised when Mr. Arbos plays in New York again, later in the season.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Gericke read the Goldmark Overture without spilling any surplus passion. He got color from the score, but it was not the purple and gold of Goldmark. It was rather the gray of Gericke. It is this lack of temperament which prevents the Boston leader from ranking with the great ones of his craft, and makes of him an artisan where other men are artists. It is this lack of temperament, too, which prevented Mr. Gericke from getting an engagement in Europe after he left Boston some years ago and went to try his luck abroad.

D'Indy's symphonic legend was analyzed in these columns on the occasion of its first Berlin production by Richard Strauss. THE MUSICAL COURIER then called the work well made, melodious, and pretty. It is all that now, but nothing more. The story of the enchanted forest and the sleeping hero is old in literature and in music. D'Indy has found no new formula of expression, but he has traveled in the worn grooves with grace and distinction.

Glazounoff is not a Russian of the untamed bear variety. His paw is shod in velvet and he dances to every tune but the Tartar. His name is Calmuck but his music is French. The delicacy and discretion of the orchestration suggest Saint-Saëns, and the treatment of the brass and strings in combination more than once recall memories of Massenet. Glazounoff has enough learning to mix all this limpid sweetness with a sufficiency of counterpoint, and the result is not only pleasant but also interesting. One is grateful for a relief from the usual symphonic hubbub. The first movement shows the most sustained effort, but the scherzo caught the fancy of the listeners. It was played with marvelous finish and daintiness, and the first violins, under Arbos, covered themselves with glory. The Glazounoff work is in three movements, a slow introduction to the third part taking the place of the customary andante.

Mus. Courier
Tribune.—* * * Arbos' performance was woefully impure in intonation.

Mus. Courier
Sun.—* * * His intonation was almost invariably correct.

IS not this a pretty thing to set before the New York musical public? These two excerpts were culled from the Tribune and the Sun the morning after Arbos' first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A PROBLEM

FOR THE PUBLIC.

Now, did Arbos play with pure or impure intonation? The public would like to know, and we would like to know, and it seems not at all improbable that Mr. Arbos himself would like to know. Who is right, the music reporter of the Tribune, or the music reporter of the Sun? Which of these two men is tone deaf, consequently unmusical, consequently incompetent as a music reporter, and consequently guilty of spreading information which on the face of it is false, and perhaps even libelous? One of these two men must in the nature of the evidence adduced be wrong. Which

45 the case of "Parsifal" 57
civilization do with us

Those who are of attitude of egotism. opportunity to go by w Then why do the pap Manchuria? It is the Russia from securing Manchuria—when we obvious intention. So tion. England annex north coast of Africa ment with other Powe ply took it. The Unit Philippines—paid cash notwithstanding their 1775; but we hold on the European countri China. Why should Panama while it is gr hearing, which had been adjourned November 6, was again adjourned November 13. It is probable that further delay next Friday has been amply demonstrated by arguments on both sides another week before the judgment. The meantime Tammany has facetiously called "the" when we take into consideration the Evening Post in the "

"Parsifal"

50
Symphony Orchestra. This body was long ago letter perfect in everything that pertains to orchestral routine, and there was no cause to suppose from the playing at the concerts last week that the leader has lessened his vigilance or the orchestra its earnestness. We have heard the Boston Symphony in nearly all the classical works, and we have many times bestowed on them the large measure of praise and the small share of adverse criticism their work warrants. It remains but to say that the widely advertised changes in the personnel of the body were without any audible effect on its playing. There were the same suavity, the same elegance, the same even balance of tone, that have always distinguished the Boston Orchestra from our local organizations. The first violins played with more elasticity and with better bowing under the new concertmaster, but that is a question of temperament rather than of musicianship. The first 'cellist had little opportunity to display any individual prowess, but his tone was sympathetic, even if small.

The Weber, Wagner and Brahms numbers of the first concert need only general comment. Mr. Gericke's merits and demerits are familiar to all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER and they are familiar, too, to the persons who year in and year out have heard Mr. Gericke's readings of the standard score. It seems superfluous therefore to state that the Weber number was done con amore, that the "Waldweben," though a technical delight, lacked freedom and warmth, and that the Brahms Symphony was austere and correct. It is not the Hamburg master's greatest creation, by the way.

The soloist of the Thursday concert, E. Fernandez-Arbos, made a favorable impression on the whole, though following so closely on the heels of Thibaud it was inevitable that the Spaniard should suffer by comparison. Such violin playing as Thibaud's is not heard often in a decade, and it was certainly not heard in the performance of Mr. Arbos. It is not quite just to pass a final opinion at this moment on his solo playing. Mr. Arbos was plainly so nervous that he could not do himself justice. His intonation was lamentable and his phrasing unnatural for such a good musician as we know him to be. His tone wavered and wanted in warmth. His left hand is speedy, but erratic. However, as was remarked before, this criticism must be taken with reservations, and it is to be hoped that it may be revised when Mr. Arbos plays in New York again, later in the season.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Gericke read the Goldmark Overture without spilling any surplus passion. He got color from the score, but it was not the purple and gold of Goldmark. It was rather the gray of Gericke. It is this lack of temperament which prevents the Boston leader from ranking with the great ones of his craft, and makes of him an artisan where other men are artists. It is this lack of temperament, too, which prevented Mr. Gericke from getting an engagement some years ago and went to

D'Indy's symphonic legends on the occasion of it Richard Strauss. THE MUSICAL COURIER work well made, melodious, and but nothing more. The story of the sleeping hero is old in literature, but has found no new formula of expression in the worn grooves with Glazounoff is not a Russian. His paw is shod in velvet and the Tartar. His name is Caliban. The delicacy and discretion of Saint-Saëns, and the treatment of the combination more than once. Glazounoff has enough learned sweetness with a sufficiency of it is not only pleasant but also for a relief from the usual staccato movement shows the most successful caught the fancy of the listener. The marvelous finish and daintiness, Arbos, covered themselves in work is in three movements, the third part taking the place of

Mus. Courier
Tribune.—* * * Arbos' performance was woefully impure in intonation.

IS not this a pretty thing for the New York musical public? It is culled from the Tribune, and is the result of an investigation after Arbos' first appearance in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A PROBLEM FOR THE PUBLIC.

we would like to know, and it is probable that Mr. Arbos does not know. Who is right, the Tribune, or the music reporter? One of these two men is tone-deaf, and consequently incapable of making a correct report, and consequently incapable of giving information which on the face of it is perhaps even libelous? One of the nature of the evidence one is it? If a thing is plain blue, it is not red, nor is it green, unless the eye of the onlooker be color blind. If a violin performance is in tune it cannot be out of tune, and vice versa, unless the listener be tone deaf. Is the music reporter of the Sun tone deaf, or has the sense of pitch been denied his colleague on the Tribune? Here is a profound puzzle for the student of such matters, and we shrink from expressing any hasty opinion.

45
57

It is certain that one of these men is wrong, and the other is right, although we are by no means convinced that the man who is right is not wrong, and the man who is wrong is not right. This is a puzzle in itself, mayhap, but these music reporters are very puzzling creatures. The puzzle is how a tone deaf man could ever have acquired a position where he is allowed such a reckless use of adverbs and adjectives on musical subjects? A candidate for an active position with a railroad company is at once rejected if he is found to be color blind. This is a duty which the railroad company owes the public. Similarly, should a newspaper not discharge a music reporter who is found to be tone deaf? That is a duty to the musical public which pays money for its newspaper and should not be imposed upon. A man who cannot hear properly is a bad music reporter, for he is compelled to guess at things and thus frequently is put in the position of bearing false witness in print against an innocent artist.

If one of these men is not even able to determine pitch—the fundamental basis of all music—how then dare he have the hardihood to flounder about in discussions of musical æsthetical questions, and to presume to dictate to composers how they shall compose, and to players how they shall play? What iota of value have the collected writings of such a man when he is unable to tell whether a violinist plays in or out of tune—a feat that we have actually seen musical babies perform correctly!

The parallel at the head of this article has been made mentally by nearly every musician in town this week. It caused so much mirth that the reporter of the Sun felt himself called upon to make the following explanation in his Sunday column:

There was almost as great a difference of opinion expressed about E. Fernandez-Arbos, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some persons declared that his intonation was excellent, and others that it was painfully bad. Now this question of intonation is very uncertain. What one man hears in one part of an auditorium is not always that which another man hears in a different part. Acoustics play weird tricks on hearers. Sometimes at the opera people in different parts of the house cannot agree at all as to the quality and power of certain voices.

The truth is that tone colors are affected by varying conditions of acoustics and there has never been any question that pitch is very susceptible to them. Carnegie Hall rejoices in the possession of notoriously bad acoustics. The writer of this department heard Mr. Arbos play sadly out of tune in certain passages of the Mendelssohn Concerto, but in others he heard the gentleman play with absolutely perfect intonation. Mr. Arbos was so painfully nervous that the writer thought this must be the cause of the numerous slips, while he judged that extended passages which he played in accurate tune represented the normal performance of the artist. Is it possible that he was in his normal state when he played out of tune and that he was overcome temporarily by nervousness when he played in tune?

It is hardly necessary to dissect this limping twaddle at great length. Acoustics have nothing to do with the question of intonation. In some halls a tone may sound large when it is small or small when it is large, but it could under no conceivable circumstances sound false when it is pure, or pure when it is false. We must express surprise that the Sun reporter's acoustic phenomena, if true, have never been discovered before by the thousands of persons who have been listening to concerts at Carnegie Hall for many years.

"What one man hears in one part of an auditorium is not always that which another man hears in a different part." Quite true. But if a man be tone deaf it would make no difference whatever, for no matter where he might sit he would always hear the same thing—nothing. Several persons of our acquaintance sat on the left side of Carnegie Hall, three rows behind the Sun reporter, and they heard Mr. Arbos play out of tune almost incessantly. So it would appear that persons sitting in the same part of the auditorium do not necessarily hear the same thing.

Here is another parallel wherein the Sun music reporter contradicts himself:

Sun (Friday)—* * * His      Sun (Sunday)—* * * The

intonation was almost invariably correct.

This makes the problem more picturesque, but not more difficult. The question still faces us:
Which of these two men, the Sun reporter or the Tribune reporter, is tone deaf?

the place is all astir are looking for the er falls. Then begin-beds and setting of t 8 o'clock the milked
the smaller animals
and strength begin
the first serving.
ally cleaning of the plants, and the sub-rounds. Temperagues and noses are s examined and ompared with those medicines dealt out receiving office and lacked by something of animals aris-
to the progress of
is ringing most tra-either seeking involimmediate assistance
arriving at all time
animals are agalfecserved out to their o'clock the smaller second feeding. In-regular menu, con-
the butcher anings
f juice, essence esent
th, or egg-nogg, ( our ed milk, or some o has ons for babies. Or an w readily sick an piano hat they would no poor hen in good health an had a severe tin may s very weak whches-
d refused all food Mr.
to get strength let us
egg-nogg was pr color
urprise of all thoman-ture—a quart e met-
three ounces of ru time after the

GADSKI TO SING AT THE SYMPHONY

The solo singer at the third public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and at the concert tomorrow night will be Mme. Johanna Gadske. It will be her second appearance at these concerts. Her first was on Oct. 29, 1898, when she sang in German "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!" from "Oberon," and Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser." She will not sing today the arias announced, viz.: One from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which Melba sang some years ago, and "Pleurez, Mes. Yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," which Emma Eames sang here at a Symphony concert in 1893. After Mme. Gadske's arrival in New York Wednesday she spent some time in weighing the comparative advantages of this aria and that one, and yesterday she finally decided to sing Agathe's familiar recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking."

Mme. Gadske, born at Auklam in Pomerania, June 15, 1872, studied at Stettin and made her first operatic appearance at Kroll's, Berlin, in May, 1891, as Pamina in the "Magic Flute." In 1894 she became a member of the Bremen opera company. Her first appearance in Boston was as Elsa, April 2, 1895, when she was a member of the Damrosch German opera company. She married in 1892 Mr. Hans Tauscher, who was then an army officer.

The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's well known "Sakuntala" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Schumann's romantic symphony in D minor, which was a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest," op. 8, will be performed in Boston for the first time, yet it is an early work of this talented and fastidious composer. It was written in 1878 and it was played for the first time at a "Concert Populaire," conducted by Paderloup at Paris March 24 of that year. The music, a legendary ballad for orchestra, is in illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald," which he wrote for a drama, "Tamlan und Jane." The drama, founded on an old Scotch ballad—it is in many collections, as in Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border"—was never completed; the poem was published in 1813. Harald and his knights ride through the forest. The knights are pelted with roses by elves; they are wooed and caressed, then dragged from their horses, and borne away to Fairyland. Harald's armor of steel protects him from the blandishments and wiles of the elves, but, lonely, he wanders and at last drinks of a spring and falls asleep. He is still sleeping, and around him, as he sits, gray-haired and gray-bearded, the elves by moonlight circle slowly about him; but when the storm roars, he stirs uneasily and reaches for his sword.

D'Indy wrote this music when, a pupil of Cesar Franck, he was a warm admirer of the German romantic school. He made pilgrimages to Weimar, Bayreuth, and even to Vienna, where he hoped to see Brahms, and not finding him he tracked him to his lair at Tutzling, where Brahms was anything but amiable. The Ballade has been played in Chicago by Mr. Thomas' orchestra.

The chief events of next week are the first production here in English of Verdi's opera, "Othello," by Mr. Savage's company; the first piano recital of Mr. Harold Bauer; and the first appearance in Boston of Mr. Jacques Thibaud, the eminent, though young, French violinist, whose marked abilities are recognized throughout Europe. Mr. Thibaud will make his first appearance in this country today at New York and at Mr. Wetzler's orchestral concert. A his afternoon recital a week from Saturday at Jordan Hall—there will be no Symphony concerts next week—Mr. Thibaud will play with Mr. Andre Benoit Cesar Franck's sonata for violin and piano, and solo pieces by Bach, Chopin-Wilhemj, Saint-Saens, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, Guiraud and Wieniawski.

Mr. Bauer will play at his recital next Wednesday afternoon, at Steinert Hall. Brahms' variations on a theme by Handel; Schumann's sonata in F sharp minor; Chopin's polonaise in E flat minor, etude in C sharp minor, nocturne in F sharp minor and Tarantelle; Schubert's impromptu in A flat, and Saint-Saens' etude in the form of a waltz.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts a fortnight from today and tomorrow will be Miss Adele aus der Ohe, who will play a piano concerto by H. H. Huss of New York. There are few distinguished virtuosos who are willing to play a wholly unfamiliar work, especially when it is by an American. Teresa Carreno has played MacDowell's second concerto in Europe as well as in this country, but the virtuoso as a rule prefers to do with a sure applause-winner. And after all, even a virtuoso may in certain respects be human.

Felix Mottl was safely landed in New York on Wednesday. He is to be general musical director and supervisor at the Metropolitan Opera House; but when a reporter ventured to ask him how he felt about the production of "Parsifal" and whether he considered the music-drama greater than "The Ring" or "Tristan," Mr. Conried asked Mr. Mottl not to answer, lest, by injudicious remarks, he might injure the feelings of both Cosima Wagner and the manager and, incidentally, hurt the business. Mr. Mottl will prepare the production of "Parsifal" at rehearsals but he will hand over the stick to Mr. Hertz on the eventful day. This is nice conduct. Let us hope that Mr. Hertz has a retentive memory. Perhaps Cosima may yet be persuaded to come over to sit in a stockholder's box, so that she may confirm her suspicions. She would not be the least important feature of the show. We saw her at Bayreuth in 1882, the first year of "Parsifal." She and her husband and Liszt and the miscellaneous children and grandchildren were all together, and even in such company she seemed a dominating person, with a nose full of determination, a nose to threaten and command.

of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some persons declared that his intonation was excellent, and others was painfully bad. Now this question of intonation is uncertain. What one man hears in one part of is not always that which another man hears in another part. Acoustics play weird tricks on hearers: at the opera people in different parts of the auditorium agree at all as to the quality and power of certain tones.

The truth is that tone colors are affected by conditions of acoustics and there has never been that pitch is very susceptible to them. Carrington, in the possession of notoriously bad acoustics, the writer of this department heard Mr. Arbos play out of tune in certain passages of the Mendelssohn, but in others he heard the gentleman play with perfect intonation. Mr. Arbos was so painful that the writer thought this must be the cause of numerous slips, while he judged that extent to which he played in accurate tune represented the performance of the artist. Is it possible that a normal state when he played out of tune and overcame temporarily by nervousness when he played in tune?

It is hardly necessary to dissect this twaddle at great length. Acoustics have to do with the question of intonation. A small tone may sound large when it is small when it is large, but it could under conceivable circumstances sound false when it is or pure when it is false. We must express surprise that the Sun reporter's acoustic phenomena, if true, have never been discovered before by the thousands of persons who have been listening to concerts at Carnegie Hall for many years.

"What one man hears in one part of an auditorium is not always that which another man hears in a different part." Quite true. But if a man be tone deaf it would make no difference whatever, for no matter where he might sit he would always hear the same thing—nothing. Several persons of our acquaintance sat on the left side of Carnegie Hall, three rows behind the Sun reporter, and they heard Mr. Arbos play out of tune almost incessantly. So it would appear that persons sitting in the same part of the auditorium do not necessarily hear the same thing.

Here is another parallel wherein the Sun music reporter contradicts himself:

Sun (Friday)—* * * His Sun (Sunday)—* * * The

BOSTON ROMANCE.

[From Harper's Weekly.]

It was during the intermission. The men from Boston, otherwise the Boston Symphony orchestra, had just played the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried"—that magic idyl of woodland life—and some one was complaining of the lack of poetic truth in the interpretation, which was inelastic, metronomic, icily regular. These, surely, it was observed, were not Siegfried's woods!

"Oh, no," was the illuminating response; "these were Boston woods." It was an admirable criticism. Those were, essentially, Boston woods; and, by the same token, Mr. Gericke's emotion is Boston emotion; his impulses, his method of approach, are characteristic. To praise his orchestra—that orchestra whose virtuosity has become almost vulgarly traditional—is merely to indulge in the unexhilarating pastime of acknowledging the obvious. But perfection has its disadvantages. Do we not too complacently welcome the splendor and purity of tone, the flawless technical accomplishment, of this unique band, ignoring the vital shortcomings which are palpable, under the present direction, in its performances? If our memory serves, it is Mr. Finck who has frankly declared his preference for an inspired pianist and an indifferent piano over a perfect instrument and a poor performer. Not to make too harsh an application of the parable, one may say that the Boston Symphony orchestra is the perfect instrument, and Mr. Gericke, its conductor, the—well, let us say, unsatisfying performer. For color and movement, for passion, for romantic suggestion, you are offered the metronome and the stop watch.

intention was almost inheard Mr. Arbos play sadly out of tune.

This makes the problem more picturesque, but
not more difficult. The question still faces us:
Which of these two men, the Sun reporter or the
Tribune reporter, is tone deaf?

GADSKI TO SING AT THE SYMPHONY

The solo singer at the third public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and at the concert tomorrow night will be Mme. Johanna Gadske. It will be her second appearance at these concerts. Her first was on Oct. 29, 1898, when she sang in German "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!" from "Oberon," and Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser." She will not sing today the arias announced, viz.: One from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which Melba sang some years ago, and "Pleurez, Mes, Yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," which Emma Eames sang here at a Symphony concert in 1893. After Mme. Gadske's arrival in New York Wednesday she spent some time in weighing the comparative advantages of this aria and that one, and yesterday she finally decided to sing Agathe's familiar recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking."

Mme. Gadske, born at Auklam in Pomerania, June 15, 1872, studied at Stettin and made her first operatic appearance at Kroll's, Berlin, in May, 1891, as Pamina in the "Magic Flute." In 1894 she became a member of the Bremen opera company. Her first appearance in Boston was as Elsa, April 2, 1895, when she was a member of the Damrosch German opera company. She married in 1892 Mr. Hans Tauscher, who was then an army officer.

The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's well known "Sakuntala" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Schumann's romantic symphony in D minor, which was a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest," op. 8, will be performed in Boston for the first time, yet it is an early work of this talented and fastidious composer. It was written in 1878 and it was played for the first time at a "Concert Populaire," conducted by Pasdeloup at Paris March 24 of that year. The music, a legendary ballad for orchestra, is in illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald," which he wrote for a drama, "Tamlin and Jane." The drama, founded on an old Scotch ballad—it is in many collections, as in Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border"—was never completed; the poem was published in 1813. Harald and his knights ride through the forest. The knights are pelted with roses by elves; they are wooed and caressed, then dragged from their horses, and borne away to Fairyland. Harald's armor of steel protects him from the blandishments and wiles of the elves, but, lonely, he wanders and at last drinks of a spring and falls asleep. He is still sleeping, and around him, as he sits, gray-haired and gray-bearded, the elves by moonlight circle slowly about him; but when the storm roars, he stirs uneasily and reaches for his sword.

D'Indy wrote this music when, a pupil of Cesar Franck, he was a warm admirer of the German romantic school. He made pilgrimages to Weimar, Bayreuth, and even to Vienna, where he hoped to see Brahms, and not finding him he tracked him to his lair at Tutzing, where Brahms was anything but amiable. The Ballade has been played in Chicago by Mr. Thomas' orchestra.

The chief events of next week are the first production here in English of Verdi's opera, "Othello," by Mr. Savage's company; the first piano recital of Mr. Harold Bauer; and the first appearance in Boston of Mr. Jacques Thibaud, the eminent, though young, French violinist, whose marked abilities are recognized throughout Europe. Mr. Thibaud will make his first appearance in this country today at New York and at Mr. Wetzler's orchestral concert. A his afternoon recital a week from Saturday at Jordan Hall—there will be no Symphony concerts next week—Mr. Thibaud will play with Mr. Andre Benoit Cesar Franck's sonata for violin and piano, and solo pieces by Bach, Chopin-Wilhemj. Saint-Saens, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, Guiraud and Wieniawski.

Mr. Bauer will play at his recital next Wednesday afternoon, at Stelmert Hall, Brahms' variations on a theme by Handel; Schumann's sonata in F sharp minor; Chopin's polonaise in E flat minor, etude in C sharp minor, nocturne in F sharp minor and Tarantelle; Schubert's impromptu in A flat, and Saint-Saens' etude in the form of a waltz.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts a fortnight from today and tomorrow will be Miss Adele aus der Ohe, who will play a piano concerto by H. H. Huss of New York. There are few distinguished virtuosos who are willing to play a wholly unfamiliar work, especially when it is by an American. Teresa Carreno has played MacDowell's second concerto in Europe as well as in this country, but the virtuoso as a rule prefers to do with a sure applause-winner. And after all, even a virtuoso may in certain respects be human.

Felix Mottl was safely landed in New York on Wednesday. He is to be general musical director and supervisor at the Metropolitan Opera House; but, when a reporter ventured to ask him how he felt about the production of "Parsifal" and whether he considered the music-drama greater than "The Ring" or "Tristan," Mr. Corried asked Mr. Mottl not to answer, lest, by injudicious remarks, he might injure the feelings of both Cosima Wagner and the manager and, incidentally, hurt the business. Mr. Mottl will prepare the production of "Parsifal" at rehearsals but he will hand over the stick to Mr. Hertz on the eventful day. This is nice conduct. Let us hope that Mr. Hertz has a retentive memory. Perhaps Cosima may yet be persuaded to come over to sit in a stockholder's box, so that she may confirm her suspicions. She would not be the least important feature of the show. We saw her at Bayreuth in 1882, the first year of "Parsifal." She and her husband and Liszt and the miscellaneous children and grandchildren were all together, and even in such company she seemed a dominating person, with a nose full of determination, a nose to threaten and command.

JOHANNA GADSKI AS "SIEGLINDE."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |           |  |
|-----------|--|
| GOLDMARK, | OVERTURE, to "Sakuntala," in F major, op. 13.  |
| WEBER,    | ARIA from "Freischuetz,"   |
| D'INDY,   | "La Forêt Enchantée," LEGENDE-SYMPHONIE(d'après une Ballade de Uhland,) op. 8.(First time.)  |
| SCHUBERT, | a) "GRETCHEN AM SPINNRAD."b) ERLKONIG.   |
| SCHUMANN, | SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.I. Ziemlich langsam. Lebhaft.II. Romanze : ziemlich langsam.III. Scherzo : lebhaft. Trio.IV. Langsam. Lebhaft. |

Soloist:

Mme. JOHANNA GADSKI.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

TONE POEM GIVEN BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

D'Indy's Illustration of Uhland's Fairy Ballad Is Novelty Produced With Acceptance at Third Concert of Season, and Madame Galski Sings.

That odd little story of Edward Everett Hale's, "How Mr. Fry Would Have Preached It," would come to mind while Mr. Gericke's men were playing the novelty of last night's concert. How would Richard Strauss have treated that Upland ballad, "The Enchanted Wood," of which Vincent d'Indy's illustration was then on hearing? Yet there was no fault to find with this musical poem. D'Indy has surely as romantic a strain in him as Strauss, though he cannot be so strong or heroic, and he has a deeper founded of love for old fantasies and for the picturesque, the wild and the enchanting in nature. And one thought again, how might the two men possibly have collaborated, as the Flemish painters did when one put the figures into another's landscape or Rachel Ruysch surrounded with her matchless flowers a head limned by a great portraitist. How if D'Indy has made the music for the murmuring forest, the gurgling streams, the amorous fairy fascinations and that enchanted sleep whose peace was only broken by dreams of war, while Strauss had depicted the march of the bold knights, their songs of battle, and their contest with temptations?

Yet D'Indy's poem was delightful, beautiful and persuasive. Such a simple story! The forest rustles in the band's hushed, wood winds and shimmering violins, while the muted horns hint of the distant approach of the bold Harald and his men. "Louder and louder the war horns ring," the hoof beats hurry and rattle, and the troop is already drawing by, when lighter figures and instrumentation come alluringly with sweeter songs and the touch of harp. The elven maidens surround the knights with beauty and blandishment; the martial thoughts and sounds melt away, and with a recurrence of the braver moods Harald rides on alone. His momentary outburst of new courage and determination dies down, and again the orchestra's softer voices suggest the tranquillizing influence of the fairy spring and his sinking into the endless slumber with the bands of elves ringing him about.

Gracious to the Ear.

It was delicate music, crossed occasionally by larger strains, and while it asked no serious consideration or academic analysis, it was gracious to the ear, suggestive to the fancy and commendable for accomplishing just what it set out to do. From the very beginning it less implied vigor, self-assertion and resistance than languor, dalliance, charm and compliance. One had little need to read the ballad to feel that music was full of spells, present and to come.

The orchestra played the poem in the right spirit, as they also did the "Sakuntala" overture, in which the strings and the middle wood wind were notably rich and accordant. The symphony, Schumann's fourth, that in D minor, was also well handled according to Schumann's work for a connected rendering, only a momentary and half involuntary suspension at the end of the first movement making any check in its progress. The lovely romance gave a brief chance for observing in the entrance of its theme the full and satisfying tone of the new first cello.

Mme. Galski.

It is not wise for artists who have to come hither over seas to make their appearance follow too closely upon their debarkation. Mme. Galski, who had wavered as to her choice of numbers, finally settled down upon Agatha's scene from "Der Freischütz" and two Schubert songs, "Margaret at Her Spinning" and "The Erl King." Her singing was, as always, correct and sincere, but it lacked in ease and elegance. Both Margaret and Agatha are but young women, "as yet unsifted in the perilous matters of life; their passions are poignant, but not narrow. But Mme. Galski's weight of emphasis made them appear elder and more experienced than they were, and the executive passages in the Weber scene had more honest effort than elasticity. The "Erl King" was something too hard and declamatory in its narrative stanzas, and the last two words were—as is too often the case—assertive, rather than thrilling; but the goblin's lines were beautifully true. Mme. Galski was most cordially received, but she won less than her usual and anticipated applause after her numbers.

This being the orchestra's absent week there will be no rehearsal and concert until Nov. 13 and 14, when Miss Ausder Ohe will play.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The third symphony concert, like the second, was a somewhat depressing occasion, although the programme, on paper, with Mme. Galski as soloist, looked unusually attractive. This, by the way, was the musical feast offered:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," F major, op. 13.

Weber: Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischütz."

D'Indy: "La Foret Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland), op. 8. (First time.)

Schubert:

a. "Gretchen am Spinnrade."

b. "Erlkönig."

Schumann: Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

In the past few years we have been growing tolerably familiar with the genius of Vincent d'Indy—the genius of a man singularly endowed with musical and poetic gifts. The inheritor of an ample fortune, d'Indy was possessed by an enthusiasm for music that led him to employ his opportunities for work as diligently as though his very life depended on the outcome of his labors. After studying the organ for two years at the conservatory with César Franck, he became a private pupil of the master in composition, later going to Weimar for the benefit of Liszt's influence. Wishing to become thoroughly familiar with the inner workings of the orchestra, for some time he was second drummer under Colonne, in the Chatelet orchestra.

"La Foret Enchantée," Legende Symphonie, after a ballad by Uhland, is an early work of d'Indy's, being written in 1878, when the composer was twenty-six years old; it was brought out the same year at a "Concert Populaire," under Pasdeloup. The verses relate the experiences of one Harald, riding with his warriors, of a moon-lit night, through a wild, mysterious forest. Elves "come down from the clouds and start from the torrent's foam," enticing, by their harmonious tones and voluptuous kisses, all the followers away to Elfland. Harald, left alone, drinks from a spring—a magical spring—whose waters send him into a deep sleep from which he has never awakened. To this day he rests on a black rock close by the bubbling waters, where the elves, every moonlight night, flit silently about him.

The d'Indy of later years, inspired by this romantic subject, would surely have enriched the musical literature of the world by a tone poem of surpassing loveliness, in which listeners might feel the darkness of the night, relieved only by the pale light of the moon; the strange sense of mystery that always broods over a forest; the shimmer of leaves in the moonlight; the majestic motion of clouds from which elves float down to earth; the plashing of waters; the seductive charm of the elves, that so irresistibly overpowered the frail warriors; the stern strength of Harald;

the sense of deep repose as he sleeps on the rock, forever and ever. No composer of music, living or dead, can, more sympathetically and delicately, yet unmistakably, suggest the moods of nature, with her clouds and sky, wind, rain, than Vincent d'Indy; witness his wonderful symphony on a mountain air and his fantasia for oboe and piano. In this legend, however, there is little suggestion of nature or of the supernatural. The work, indeed, is so little imaginative and poetical that it seems as though d'Indy had paid but slight attention to his text, preferring to write "absolute" music. Considering the legend, then, as absolute music, it is not easy to find in it much that is lofty and great, or even strikingly melodious. Barring many fascinating flashes of color in the orchestration, the close of the poem alone leaves a vivid impression of beauty. As an early work by a composer of extraordinary talent, "La Foret Enchantée" was, none the less, highly interesting to hear. Its performance, too, was beautiful and sympathetic.

The exquisite Schumann symphony, unfortunately, went heavily and rigidly, all its poetry, from lack of well-felt rhythm, turning to prose. The playing of the "Sakuntala" overture was far better.

Mme. Galski disappointed many people by her change of programme, singing Agathe's aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischütz," and two Schubert songs instead of an air from "Il RePastore" and "Pleuriez mes yeux," from "Le Cid." Mme. Galski's final selections were exceedingly ill-judged, for this aria "Leise, leise," is all but impossible to sing properly, requiring a soprano with a great dramatic voice that has been trained to bel canto. In the Schubert songs, which are quite out of place on a symphony concert programme, Mme. Galski was still less successful.

This week there will be no symphony concert. Miss aus der Ohe will play the week after, this being the programme: "Eine Feste Burg," overture, Raff; concerto for pianoforte, Huss; "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country"), symphonic poem, Smetana; symphony No. 2, Beethoven. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

A few choice locations at reasonable prices. Apply at once, MR. HARDING, 95 Kilby St. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

M 13, 14, 15, $50 each. JJ 28, 29, 30, 31, $25 each. MISS LOCKE, Box 140, Boston. 2t(A): o 14

LAUGH! Illustrated by PROF. HYPNOTISM—LEARN CARPENTER, Potter Theatre, 177 Huntington Ave., opening Thursday Oct. 15, 8 P.M. 25, 35 and 50 cents. tc(A): o 14

FOR SALE Two season tickets, SYMPHONY Saturday concerts; on floor front. $19 EACH. Address P.W.C., Boston Transcript. WF(A): o 14

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest" Here.

An Imaginative Work with Original Harmonic Thought and Exquisite Invention—Mme. Gadski Sings Aria from "Der Freischuetz."

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
"The Enchanted Forest," op. 8.....D'Indy
Songs: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "Erlking".....Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

D'Indy's orchestral ballad, based on a poem, "Harald," by Uhland, was played here for the first time, yet it is one of the composer's earliest works and it was produced by Pasdeloup at Paris in 1878. Mr. Thomas acquainted Chicago with it in 1901.

Uhland's poem tells of Harald and his warriors riding through the forest. The elves woo his knights, pelt them with roses, and finally drag them from their horses and bear them away to fairyland. Harald's armor of steel is proof against the spells, but the hero, weary and alone, rests by a spring and drinks of its water. He falls asleep and there he sleeps forever; and in the moonlight the elves circle around him; but when the storm howls through the forest and thunder crashes and lightning glares, the hero stirs a little and reaches for his sword. Loewe set music to this ballad.

The American is inclined to consider the forest with a commercial rather than poetic eye. Even in the earlier and simpler years, there were no forest dwellers in New England save a stray witch or the awful shape of the Black Man with his directory. The Redskins had their forest legends and curious forest lore, but the Yankee child was not intimate with fairies of wood or meadow, hill or stream. Today a forest is so much lumber, and the first thought is the price for cutting and transportation. Picnickers have little respect for a beautiful or a wild stretch of woods; they make their chattering way, and during a halt provoke the wonder and scorn of the observing trees, and leave a trail of paper bags and tin cans. Man marks the earth with ruin. But to Germans and even Frenchmen the forest is still romantic, and the fairy lore they learned in childhood clings to them even when they are professional materialists. To such D'Indy's orchestral ballad would make necessarily a stronger appeal.

D'Indy wrote it at a time when he was influenced by German composers, by Schumann and Brahms, as well as by Wagner. He was otherwise handicapped—for he was rich and an aristocrat, and it is so easy for such to write music and to win parlor and snobbish applause. Yet even in this early work there is the same avoidance of the commonplace that characterizes his more mature compositions, there is the same loftiness of thought. This music is something more than panoramic. There is no too deliberate attempt to portray a forest and its moonlit mystery. There is no attempt to label each episode so that the hearer who finds delight in identification can safely say: "Now the warriors succumb; now Harald is drinking the magic water; now he falls asleep." A composer who strains every effort to mimic sleep runs the risk of disposing of his audience as well as of his hero.

D'Indy composed music that is poetic, imaginative; music that confirms and enlarges the mood suggested by his programme-paraphrase of the ballad, and in this paraphrase there is no reference to Harald hearing as in a dream the storm. There is not, perhaps, the firm grasp noticeable in D'Indy's later works, the repression that is often more effective than expansion; but there is romantic feeling, there is individuality of expression, there are pages of true beauty. The most effective portion of the ballad is the close, which is highly original, both in harmonic thought, orchestral expression, and is, indeed, of exquisite invention. It is a pleasure to add that the ballad was finely played and warmly received.

Mme. Gadski is well known here as an indefatigable singer in opera. She has often been a great help in time of managerial trouble. She has constantly added to her repertory, and, while she seldom, if ever, rises to any great imaginative height in the interpretation, she is earnest, painstaking and generally satisfactory. Her emotional gamut is slight; her face is not mobile; her action is safely conventional; but she sings much better than the majority of her German sisters, and she acts with greater discretion than many of the favorites in German opera houses. Last night she was more effective in Agatha's scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz" than in the songs of Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Hermann Klein, in his self-appreciative memoirs published lately, is sure that as a boy he saw Jenny Lind in this scene kneel while she sang the prayer, although she was on a concert stage. Mme. Gadski is to be praised for not attempting to sing the scene as she would in opera. She avoided this pitfall for the dramatic singer. When she made effects it was by the legitimate use of her voice. Nor was it her fault that the allegro of the scene was not more effective, for the music is abominably written for the voice; it is almost as stiff and ungainly as the song that Tannhaeuser sings to Venus and afterwards repeats at a most inopportune moment before the Landgrave, his merry men, and the well conducted Elizabeth, who was not in the mood for such a ribald strain—at least in public.

Mme. Gadski did comparatively little with Gretchen's song. The crescendo of passion was not irresistible, and the recollection of Faust's kiss was not last night the climax of her woe. Nor do we care to hear any woman sing the "Erlking," which is a man's song, and was first sung by men. The more dramatic the woman, with her imitation of a gruff and then terrified father, of the piping child and of the seducing elf, the more does she remind us of the gifted ventriloquist who sits gloriously between the bearded lady and the Circassian girl. Mme. Gadski was moderate in her mimicry; nevertheless, there was the suggestion.

The "Sakuntal" overture, with its swooning languor, its reminder of lush vegetation, sultry atmosphere, and the mysterious Orient—the India and its women described so sympathetically by Pierre Loti—is always welcome. Auber, wearied of Felicien David's orientalism in music, exclaimed: "If he would only get down from his camel"; but Goldmark's strength was renewed each time he touched the burnt and sacred soil. After he abandoned the East, his music grew less characteristic, nor did his excursion into Greece save him. Sakuntala was far kinder to him than Prometheus, and even Sappho, a little woman with raven black hair and a strange smile, did not woo from him the tribute he paid the superb Balkis, Queen of Sheba, who asked hard questions of Solomon, and, according to the Rabbins, loved him passionately.

So too the symphony of Schumann, with its restless and vague melancholy, is always welcome. There might have been more elasticity in the performance of the trio in the Schero—that trio of haunting rhythm and ineffable regret—but on the whole, the symphony was played with poetic appreciation.

There will be no concerts this week. The programme of the concerts No. 13 and 14 will include Rabb's overture, "Eine Feste Burg"; Huss' piano concerto (Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist); Smetana's symphonic poem "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's symphony, No. 2.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, to "Sakuntala," in F major, op. 13.....Goldmark
Aria from "Freischuetz".....Weber
Mme. Gadski.
"La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonie (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland,) op. 8.....D'Indy
(First time.)
(a) "Gretchen am Spinnrade," (b) Erlking.....Schubert
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann

Matters began with a splendid performance of Goldmark's overture. We have never heard the orchestra do better work. It was as if Mr. Gericke desired to give a practical demonstration that changes in the ranks do not mean retrogression. There is, of course, nothing new to be said about the work itself; it is an exciting piece of sensuous beauty, ending with most ingenious counterpoint which, however, has not the slightest touch of austerity.

Madame Gadski is always a delight. She intones perfectly and does not often go to extremes. On this occasion even the B in alt was broadly sung and without much effort. But there was too much of dalliance with the tempo. To take the opening recitative so slowly is to kill the effect of the Prayer which follows. For once the great singer exaggerated the effects, not only in the beginning but in other parts of the scene. Some of the text is most difficult to sing clearly. When a singer comes to a line like,—"Tauscht das Licht des Mond's mich nicht"—the conductor ought to be allowed an umbrella!

The two Schubert songs were given with much sincerity. We would have liked the first with a piano accompaniment. If the subject is to be orchestrally treated we prefer Berlioz to Schubert. The brooding Marguerite in the "Damnation de Faust" is a real orchestral picture, with the melancholy English horn against the dejected vocal strain, and the street tumult, the jostling rhythms of the Soldier's chorus and the Student's chorus, the hurly-burly of busy life, in vivid contrast against the forsaken girl in her solitude.

The "Erl-king" we prefer to hear as a tenor song, spite of the fact that Mme. Schroeder-Devrient was famous in the interpretation of the work. Mme. Gadski sang it well, but again rushed to extremes of tempo. The final speech of the monarch,—"So brauch ich Gewalt!"—was weak, but the last words of the song,—"Das Kind war todt!"—were melodramatically spoken.

We were glad that the song was given in the original language. We well recall a performance of this song in the old Music Hall, in English, where poor Schubert was butchered to make a translator's holiday. In the dialogue between the father and child, the composer has of course imitated the pitch of the voices.

Father. (deep voice) Mein Sohn, was birgst du so bang dein Gesicht?

Son. (higher notes) Stiehst, Vater du den Erl-koenig nicht?

Which was overset into English as follows,—

Son (In bass tones) Oh father, see yonder, see yonder,—he says.

Father. (in sweet treble.) My son, upon what dost thou fearfully gaze?

And afterwards there came a most sudden change of weather in a single verse, as follows:—

"Oh father, my father, and saw you not plain,

The Erlking's pale daughter glide fast through the rain?

Oh, no, my heart's treasure, I knew it full soon,

It was the grey willows that danced to the moon."

An alternation of rain and moonlight which could scarcely have taken place even in our New England climate. Those who wish can find this gem of literature in Augener's edition, edited by Pauer.

"Revenons a nos concerts!" Mme. Gadski was recalled many times, with much enthusiasm after her numbers.

Mr. Gericke gave us our weekly novelty in the shape of a slumbering warrior, a la Barbarossa, set by the dissonant D'Indy, who, in this early work reveals much of beauty and spontaneous poetry. Association of ideas can sometimes spoil the best work, and the strongly marked rhythm of "The Cork Leg" (as Barnabee used to ing it prevented our entering into the spirit of the beginning. But the subsequent dreaminess, the elfin charm of the orchestration, soon made us a very willing captive. The evil-toned muted horns contrasted well with the subsequent ecstasies. There was a good deal of lightness of the Berlioz "Danse des Sylphes" order, and the performance was altogether excellent. It was an especial wood-wind night and in this work, in the Goldmark overture, and in the Romanza of the Symphony, the players (especially the oboists) were commendably excellent.

The Schumann symphony was a good test of the first violins, and they met the requirements bravely, both in the dash- ing figure of the opening of the allegro (omnipresent afterwards, even in the finale) and in the brilliant coda to the Scherzo. It was a noble work nobly played. We do not remember a better in- terpretation; it was a triumph for Mr. Gericke and for his men.

Where is there a better melodist than Schumann? Where a deeper poet? Liszt called him the best music-thinker after Beethoven! Only when he turns to studied counterpoint do we find him less than great. Thus, in his wonderful "Manfred," he ends with a very ugly and artificial double canon; and in this work the con- trapuntal touches near the end of the finale, only detract from its beauty. But a great symphony nevertheless.

Louis C. Elson.

Mr. Arbog and the Mendelssohn Concerto.

MANY critical listeners were greatly disappointed in the playing of Mr. Arbog, the new concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, when he made his debut in Boston with Mendelssohn's Concerto, concerning which performance the reviewer of the Boston Herald says that in the first move- ment the playing "was inclined toward undue haste and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected and it may well account for cer- tain features of this performance"; adding that "greater self control marked the other movements, and that the player often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist."

To me this nervousness proceeded to the extent that the rhythm suffered, the time was unsteady, the phrasing not well delivered, the intonation impure, and the execution, which must be acute in its piquancy, was not well defined, conditions that prevailed throughout the performance, the player thereby failing to impart distinction to the composi- tion and to hold the attention of the critical listener.

The playing, however, evoked from the Herald's reviewer the compliment to Mr. Arbog that "he displayed an agree- able tone, and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling."

And then the reviewer, as if to mitigate a feeble perform- ance, refers to the composition as "not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist"; adding also that the concerto is "salon music raised to its highest degree."

Now, here is a composition that has ever held a distinsts of the afternoon. Mary Avery Camp- dience.

Orchestra, the Ama- at the residence of Fanny Losey was ary of the meeting.

ving: Prof. Harry ss Lottie Simon, Burke, Z. Zaebler.

great artists; a beauty and har- ents the oppor- and most refined attention of such ilhelmj, Ysaye, l distinction.

esting, as com- critical listener as

New Haven Oratorio Society and the officers are now arrang-nd the officers are now arrang- previous to holding rehearsals.

re stated to be "the promotion Haven and Connecticut, in co-dition of music of Yale Univer- city are about equally repre-of the officers and directors, ent, Prof. S. S. Sanford; vice

d; secretary, Philip E. Brown-

Mr. To The Musical Courier AFTER reading you duction to Philip Symphony Concert in condition of the minist man for swearing for say just what you said to use the New Englat

Everyone likes Mr. conceded that he cond- ded, as a patron of- lately: "He conducts the Pianola." And th- function and the indiv- lays no claim, clearly

The loss is manifest. remember Nikisch at- hear Wetzler in New- beginning to find fau- Boston way, to be s- and the fault-finding- tickets a fortnight si-

There are other c- demic style of conc- modern compositions- for anything and e- virtues, even in a sh- we were not a bit p- ard Strauss for at- not, many of us did- our pennies to hea- they come to town- to hear Strauss and- the season.

Boston, Mass., Oct-

The Ohio Stat- sumed this year- Thursday, Nov- opened by Seld- tone. Mr. Prat- Mills director o- servatory of Mu- appearance in C- season in Berlin- Royal Hochschu- which he has h- Nevada Concert- last season with- is a great favori-

A concert will- November 4, und- cycle, "Wind Fl- among the novel-

Miss Annabel- day evening in the-

Two talented y- ner, aged sixteen- admitted to the- Klengle will be H- turns from his A- Irene. Mrs. Stett- sic, a very proper

Miss Alice Turn-

THE Bron" and Lieber's "Adoration. for th- the dramatic cantata "Hi- Boston; I was sung by the choir of the- Philip Ha- ted by Mr. Fellows.

Mr. Hale same time- signed, RIER they- dited Number of Advanced P- SHERWOOD STU- est 57th Street, WARD- STRO- TENOR. t 92d Street.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mme Gadski, the soloist at the third symphony rehearsal and concert, made a change in her program as originally announced, and instead of selections from Mozart and Massenet, sang a recitative and aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz," with orchestra, and Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkonig." Mr Max Zach playing the Schubert accompaniments. The orchestra played D'Indy's legend, "The Enchanted Forest," first time at these con- certs; the overture to Goldmark's "Sa- kuntal" and Schumann's fourth sym- phony. Mme Gadski's contributions were delightful examples of that great singer's art, which has steadily devel- oped during the past eight seasons of opera and concert work, and she re- turned to the city in which she has gained thousands of admirers with her voice unimpaired and her personality even more attractive than before.

The familiar excerpts from "Der Freischutz" were given with the splen- did expression and opulence of voice which denotes the artist of grand opera, and her performance of Aga- the's scene was in every way satisfying. The Schubert selections also deserve praise for superb interpretation. In the "Erlkonig" Mme Gadski made the vocal contrasts somewhat more marked than is usual with singers by using the mezzo voice very effectively and sweetly. The popular artist was greeted with tumultuous plaudits and numerous re- calls.

The romantic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," is a charming musical pas- toral, imbued with bits of martial and mystic suggestiveness, some in chro- matic form and some in harmonies more pleasing to the general ear. The brasses and percussion instruments proclaimed in sonorous measures the heroic and storm episodes, the violins sang the daintier phrases of the dancing pixies in exquisite unison, and the woodwinds gave forth their mysterious and somber music with due precision and weirdness of effect. The composition is very in- teresting, and the orchestral work was fully up to the usual high standard, though there was no stumbling blocks, sufficiently formidable to bother Mr. Gericke or his men.

Goldmark's "Sakuntal" overture was splendidly played, each theme showing up in perfect form among the different instrumental contingents, the quaint melodies given to the horns and oboes being specially piquant. The cadenzas for wind instruments were admirably played, and the brilliant finale was all that the term implies. The well-known Schumann symphony, which closed the program, and was performed without a division into parts, was interpreted in an impressive and sympathetic manner.

There will be no rehearsal and con- cert this week. Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist next week, playing a piano concerto by Huss, the American composer. The other numbers on the program will be Raff's overture, "Eine Feste Burg," a symphonic poem by Smetand, and Beethoven's second sym- phony. Stoke Nov. 1903

is a Steinway.

sing it) prevented our entering into the spirit of the beginning. But the subsequent dreaminess, the elfin charm of the orchestration, soon made us a very willing captive. The evil-toned muted horns contrasted well with the subsequent ecstasies. There was a good deal of lightness of the Berlioz "Danse des Sylphes" order, and the performance was altogether excellent. It was an especial wood-wind night and in this work, in the Goldmark overture, and in the Romanza of the Symphony, the players (especially the oboists) were commendably excellent.

The Schumann symphony was a good test of the first violins, and they met the requirements bravely, both in the dashing figure of the opening of the allegro (omnipresent afterwards, even in the finale) and in the brilliant coda to the Scherzo. It was a noble work nobly played. We do not remember a better interpretation; it was a triumph for Mr. Gericke and for his men.

Where is there a better melodist than Schumann? Where a deeper poet? Liszt called him the best music-thinker after Beethoven! Only when he turns to studied counterpoint do we find him less than great. Thus, in his wonderful "Manfred," he ends with a very ugly and artificial double canon; and in this work the contrapuntal touches near the end of the finale, only detract from its beauty. But a great symphony nevertheless.

Louis C. Elson.

Mr. Arbos and the Mendelssohn Concerto.

MANY critical listeners were greatly disappointed in the playing of Mr. Arbos, the new concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, when he made his debut in Boston with Mendelssohn's Concerto, concerning which performance the reviewer of the Boston Herald says that in the first movement the playing "was inclined toward undue haste and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected and it may well account for certain features of this performance"; adding that "greater self control marked the other movements, and that the player often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist."

To me this nervousness proceeded to the extent that the rhythm suffered, the time was unsteady, the phrasing not well delivered, the intonation impure, and the execution, which must be acute in its piquancy, was not well defined, conditions that prevailed throughout the performance, the player thereby failing to impart distinction to the composition and to hold the attention of the critical listener.

The playing, however, evoked from the Herald's reviewer the compliment to Mr. Arbos that "he displayed an agreeable tone, and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling."

And then the reviewer, as if to mitigate a feeble performance, refers to the composition as "not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist"; adding also that the concerto is "salon music raised to its highest degree."

Now, here is a composition that has ever held a distinsts of the afternoon. Mary Avery Campdience.

Orchestra, the Amara at the residence of Fanny Losey was ary of the meeting. ving: Prof. Harry ass Lottie Simon. Burke, Z. Zaebler.

great artists; a beauty and har- ents the oppor- and most refined ttention of such ilhelmj, Ysaye, 1 distinction.

esting, as com- critical listener as

New Haven Oratorio Society and the officers are now arrang-

re stated to be "the promotion Haven and Connecticut, in co- dition of music of Yale Univer- city are about equally repre- of the officers and directors, ent, Prof. S. S. Sanford; vice d; secretary, Philip E. Brown-

Mr. To The Musical Courier AFTER reading you duction to Philip Symphony Concert in condition of the minist man for swearing for say just what you said to use the New Engla

Everyone likes Mr. conceded that he cond deed, as a patron of t lately: "He conducts the Pianola." And th tion and the indiv lays no claim, clearly

The loss is manifest. remember Nikisch ar hear Wetzler in New beginning to find fau Boston way, to be s and the fault-finding tickets a fortnight si

There are other c demic style of conc modern compositions for anything and e virtues, even in a s we were not a bit p ard Strauss for at not, many of us did our pennies to hea they come to town to hear Strauss and the season.

Boston, Mass., Oct

The Ohio Stat sumed this year Thursday, Nove opened by Selden tone. Mr. Prat Mills director o servatory of Mu appearance in C season in Berlin Royal Hochschu which he has Nevada Concert last season with is a great favori

A concert will November 4, und cycle, "Wind F among the novel

Miss Annabel day evening in the

Two talented y ner, aged sixteen admitted to the Klengle will be H turns from his A Irene. Mrs. Stet

Miss Alice Turn

THE Bron" and Lieber's "Adoration. for t the dramatic cantata "Hi Boston; I was sung by the choir of the Philip Ha ted by Mr. Fellows.

Mr. Hale same time signed, RIER they daily pap to their c times criti reporters, stands no Herald c Hale is th

ADELE MA Piano Instructi

ited Number of Advanced P SHERWOOD STU est 57th Street,

WARD STRO

TENOR. t 92d Street.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mme Gadski, the soloist at the third symphony rehearsal and concert, made a change in her program as originally announced, and instead of selections from Mozart and Massenet, sang a recitative and aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz," with orchestra, and Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkonig." Mr. Max Zach playing the Schubert accompaniments. The orchestra played D'Indy's legend, "The Enchanted Forest," first time at these concerts; the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntal" and Schumann's fourth symphony. Mme Gadski's contributions were delightful examples of that great singer's art, which has steadily developed during the past eight seasons of opera and concert work, and she returned to the city in which she has gained thousands of admirers with her voice unimpaired and her personality even more attractive than before.

The familiar excerpts from "Der Freischutz" were given with the splendid expression and opulence of voice which denotes the artist of grand opera, and her performance of Agathe's scene was in every way satisfying. The Schubert selections also deserve praise for superb interpretation. In the "Erlkonig" Mme Gadski made the vocal contrasts somewhat more marked than is usual with singers by using the mezzo voice very effectively and sweetly. The popular artist was greeted with tumultuous plaudits and numerous recalls.

The romantic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," is a charming musical pastoral, imbued with bits of martial and mystic suggestiveness, some in chromatic form and some in harmonies more pleasing to the general ear. The brasses and percussion instruments proclaimed in sonorous measures the heroic and storm episodes, the violins sang the daintier phrases of the dancing pixies in exquisite unison, and the woodwinds gave forth their mysterious and somber music with due precision and weirdness of effect. The composition is very interesting, and the orchestral work was fully up to the usual high standard, though there was no stumbling blocks sufficiently formidable to bother Mr. Gericke or his men.

Goldmark's "Sakuntal" overture was splendidly played, each theme showing up in perfect form among the different instrumental contingents, the quaint melodies given to the horns and oboes being specially piquant. The cadenzas for wind instruments were admirably played, and the brilliant finale was all that the term implies. The well-known Schumann symphony, which closed the program, and was performed without a division into parts, was interpreted in an impressive and sympathetic manner.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist next week, playing a piano concerto by Huss, the American composer. The other numbers on the program will be Raff's overture, "Eine Feste Burg," a symphonic poem by Smetand, and Beethoven's second symphony.

St. Louis, Mo., 1903

is a Stemway.

66
sing it prevented the spirit of the beginning. The orchestration, soon made captive. The evil-toned trusted well with the sub. There was a good deal of Berlioz "Danse des Sylphes" the performance was also. It was an especial wood in this work, in the Go and in the Romanza of the players (especially the ob) mendably excellent.

The Schumann symphony, test of the first violins, requirements bravely, being figure of the opening (omnipresent afterwards, finale) and in the brilliant Scherzo. It was a not played. We do not remember interpretation; it was a Gericke and for his men.

Where is there a better Schumann? Where a do called him the best music Beethoven! Only when he counterpoint do we find great. Thus, in his wonderful ends with a very ugly double canon; and in this trumpet touches near the finale, only detract from the great symphony nevertheless.

Mr. Arbog and the MANY critical listeners playing of Mr. Arbog Boston Orchestra, when Mendelssohn's Concerto, a reviewer of the Boston Herald ment the playing "was in performance was somewhat natural and to be expected tain features of this performance control marked the other often revealed himself as a

To me this nervousness rhythm suffered, the time well delivered, the intonation which must be acute in its conditions that prevailed player thereby failing to in tion and to hold the attention

The playing, however, ev the compliment to Mr. Arbog able tone, and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling."

And then the reviewer, as if to mitigate a feeble performance, refers to the composition as "not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist"; adding also that the concerto is "salon music raised to its highest degree."

Now, here is a composition that has ever held a distinguished place in the repertory of all the great artists; a masterpiece of classic purity, melodious beauty and harmonic simplicity; a composition that presents the opportunity for legitimate playing in its highest and most refined forms.

It has commanded the approbation and attention of such great artists as Joachim, Wieniawski, Wilhelmj, Ysaye, Sarasate and all other players of renown and distinction.

It is today as fresh, as absorbing, as interesting, as commanding of the complete attention of the critical listener as the day its masterly proportions were first displayed before the world. Of course, it has no place as a piece of dazzling virtuosity; on the contrary, defying the ability of the superficial player to imbue its classic measures with the lofty sentiment that marks the opportunities offered when the hand of a great and spontaneous artist is laid upon it.

If great nobility and depth of feeling do not mark its inspired characteristics, its purity and melodious beauty are perennial, and it stands side by side in its intrinsic value with the concertos of Bach and Mozart, the noble Beethoven, the admirable Bruch and that of Saint-Saëns, &c.

Who has not sat entranced in the presence of Wieniawski, Wilhelmj or Ysaye when these Titans of violin art, these inspired and spontaneous interpreters of the highest forms of classical compositions, have revealed the beauties of Mendelssohn's genius as displayed in this concerto?

For the listener it is a misfortune that such a refined inspiration as is this work should fall to the task of being played by one without sufficient appreciation and technical ability to grasp and reveal it in its just proportions.

It is the duty of the competent critic, when such a misfortune overtakes the work of any composer of real value, to uphold the composer and not to let a feeble or an incompetent presentation of the music militate against it.

Everyone has a right to his opinion, even if a want of unbiased judgment is an accompanying item in the conclusions drawn.

In this case the array of great artists who have employed this concerto of Mendelssohn's as a medium for the presentation of their noblest and most inspired efforts furnish an endorsement of its intrinsic value that must serve in rendering the conclusions of the Herald's reviewer of less moment as a critical exposition than if this great obstacle to his judgment did not exist. Here is food for the contemplation of the student and the layman in the mysteries of the art of critical review.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Mr. Gericke Again.

To The Musical Courier:

AFTER reading your altogether discriminating introduction to Philip Hale's account of the opening Symphony Concert in this town, many of us were in the condition of the minister of the gospel who thanked the man for swearing for him. Many of us have wanted to say just what you said in that introductory paragraph, but, to use the New England vernacular, "we dassant."

Everyone likes Mr. Gericke personally. It is generally conceded that he conducts with uncommon accuracy. Indeed, as a patron of the Symphony Concerts said to me lately: "He conducts with the precision and certainty of the Pianola." And there you have it. The personal distinction and the individual warmth to which the Pianola lays no claim, clearly these do not belong to Mr. Gericke. The loss is manifest. And some of the town people, who remember Nikisch and Paur, or who have happened to hear Wetzler in New York or Scheel in Philadelphia, are beginning to find fault—in a thoroughly gentlemanly and Boston way, to be sure, but nevertheless to find fault—and the fault-finding spoke loud in the sale of season tickets a fortnight since.

There are other criticisms of Gericke besides his academic style of conducting. His manifest opposition to modern compositions and more particularly his contempt for anything and everything American do not count as virtues, even in a slow and poky town like Boston. Then, we were not a bit pleased because he did not secure Richard Strauss for at least one concert, and because he did not, many of us did not take season tickets, but have saved our pennies to hear Scheel's Philadelphia players when they come to town and for a trip or two New Yorkward to hear Strauss and the other novelties to be there later in the season.

BACK BAY.

BOSTON, Mass., October 27, 1903.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was on its first circuit tour for this season last week, and therefore did not perform in Boston; hence we are unable to print an article from the pen of Philip Hale in this issue of the paper. It was asking too much of Mr. Hale to expect him to write on the same subject about the same time for two papers. In the Boston Herald his articles are unsigned, therefore in their reproduction in THE MUSICAL COURIER they become more valuable by being credited to him. The daily papers should always have the names of their critics signed to their criticisms, especially in New York, because here sometimes criticisms are written which might be credited to the baseball reporters, or to the golf reporters, or the yacht reporters. As it stands now, whenever THE MUSICAL COURIER reprints the Boston Herald criticisms it brings into prominence the fact that Philip Hale is the recognized music authority of that paper.

PHONY CONCERTS.

67
asked the soloist at the third rehearsal and concert, made in her program as originally and instead of selections of Massenet, sang a recital aria from Weber's "Der Freischütz" with orchestra, and Schumann's "Die Spinnerinnen" and "Mr. Max Zach" playing the accompaniments. The orchestra played D'Indy's legend, "The Enchanted Forest," first time at these concerts, overture to Goldmark's "Sinfonia," and Schumann's fourth symphony. Mme Gadski's contributions of beautiful examples of that great art, which has steadily developed the past eight seasons of concert work, and she re- the city in which she has thousands of admirers with her unpaired and her personality attractive than before. Familiar excerpts from "Der Freischütz" were given with the splendor and opulence of voice notes the artist of grand her performance of Agathe was in every way satisfying. Her selections also deserve a superb interpretation. In only Mme Gadski made the parts somewhat more marked equal with singers by using the very effectively and sweetly. Her artist was greeted with plaudits and numerous reantic legend, "The Enchanted Forest" is a charming musical pastime with bits of martial and suggestiveness, some in chromatic and some in harmonies more to the general ear. The brass section instruments proclaimed as measures the heroic and sodes, the violins sang the phrases of the dancing pixies in unison, and the woodwinds their mysterious and somber due precision and weirdness. The composition is very in- and the orchestral work was to the usual high standard, ere was no stumbling blocks to bother Mr.

overture was theme showing the different the quaint rns and oboes The cadenzas ere admirably finale was all he well-known ch closed the ned without a terpreted in an ic manner. rsal and cons der Ohe will k. playing a the American mbers on the erture. "Eine nle poem by second sym-

ADELE AUS DER OHE.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RAFF,

OVERTURE, "Eine Feste Burg," op. 127.

HUSS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in
in B major, op. 10.

- I. Allegro maestoso.
- II. Andante con sentimento.
- III. Allegro vivace.

SMETANA,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Vysehrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country.")

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2, op. 36.

- I. Adagio : Allegro con brio.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo : Allegro : Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

ADELE AUS DER OHE.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RAFF,

OVERTURE, "Eine Feste Burg," op. 127.

HUSS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in
in B major, op. 10.

- I. Allegro maestoso.
- II. Andante con sentimento.
- III. Allegro vivace.

SMETANA,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Vysehrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country.")

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2, op. 36.

- I. Adagio : Allegro con brio.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo : Allegro : Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Raff—Overture....."Eln Feste Burg," op. 127
Huss—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in B major, op. 10.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, soloist.

Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country.")

Beethoven—Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 35

Luther's hymn "Eln Feste Burg" was the war-cry of the Reformation. The great doctor may, or may not have written its melody, but the fact remains that it was the battle-hymn of all the early Protestants and was not only a most dignified piece of religious music but was admirably suited for counterpoint as well. Consequently it has been frequently employed in music, and in two opposite ways. Bach used it learnedly, in a cantata; Meyerbeer dramatically in the "Huguenots;" Wagner most powerfully in the "Kaiser Marsch;" Mendelssohn contrapuntally in his "Reformation Symphony;" and Raff follows the Bach and Mendelssohn lead and juggles with the theme, his suave treatment especially recalling Mendelssohn's flute tootlings of the great and massive chorale! It makes a very ingenious and a thoroughly uninspired overture. One feels that, if one wanted, Raff could have gone on for 20 pages more of the same sort of musical mathematics.

One was glad to welcome Adele Aus der Ohe back to Boston. It does not seem so very long ago since the sedate young lady appeared, with braided hair and a general air of juvenility, for the first time in our concerts. She has been growing in art ever since, and is today one of the most classical of female pianists, a strong contrast to the two other stars in petticoats, —the fiery Bloomfield-Zeisler and the tropical Carreno. On this occasion she aided the American muse and gave a composition which displayed both technique and feeling. Happy the composer who has such an interpreter! The concerto of H. H. Huss took on new vigor because of Miss Aus der Ohe's noble reading of it. The pianist was most cordially received and recalled after the work with an enthusiasm not entirely warranted by its contents.

We remember the work as given at its first performance many years ago. There were several handicaps then. Mr. Huss was his own pianist at that performance, and composers are not often their best interpreters. That time the concerto came after Tschaiowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and was followed by Berloiz's fiery "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and was crushed out between the two. At this concert there was a much fairer audition, for the work had a splendid interpretation and it was "well placed."

Yet at its best this concerto is a heavily-watered stock in a bear market; it has its points of value (the original introduction and the dashing chief theme of the finale, for example) but these are over-capitalized and are not sufficient to fill three movements. The slow movement is the weakest portion. If the work were shortened into a single-movement "Fantasy," it might become an interesting addition to the standard repertoire. As it stands its beauties lack continuity and there is occasionally a "mauvais quart d'heure" which is made up of padding and inconsequentiality.

Brave old Smetana! How one loves a man who is in earnest! It was a noble homage that this genius, with deafness and nervous troubles torturing him, brought to his beloved Bohemia, in his symphonic poems of patriotism. Smetana is greater than his great pupil, Dvorak, and is much more intensely national. The renaissance of Bohemian music is almost wholly due to this suffering pioneer.

There are moments of grandeur and moments of sadness in "Vysehrad." One passage of tender melody reminds of a clarinette theme in the finale of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" which pictures loneliness in the Trossachs. But it comes with greater force in this work where it is in contrast with the grandeur of powerful themes.

Bohemia comes of right into her musical heritage, for music is often born of national sorrow, and no nation has suffered more than poor Bohemia. But the thirty years' war scourged her into absolute silence, and it is only since Smetana, Dvorak and Srb have begun their work that a national school is beginning to reassert itself. "Vysehrad" was finely performed but was scarcely appreciated at its full value by the audience, which remained if not apathetic, at least unexcited.

The second symphony of Beethoven was interesting, but not much more. It received a reading somewhat different from what we had anticipated, with rather exaggerated shading and not a single repeat omitted. The slow movement was as ever its best part. In this we may especially commend the horn-players, who gave their rather difficult and prominent phrases without a flaw. The bassoons have much work to do in the last two movements and they also deserve honorable mention.

As a whole the programme seemed less inspiring than usual. There was undeniable beauty of performance almost all through the evening, yet matters approached nearer to dullness than we like to see them in a symphony concert.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY TICKETS WANTED

A half interest in two tickets for alternate evenings. Address, giving price and location, R. A. WARE, 246 Devonshire street. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS

A few choice locations at reasonable prices. Apply at once, MR. HARDING, 95 Kilby street. MWT(A): o 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

AN OPPORTUNITY

FOR MISS OHE

Re-entry Is in Pianoforte Concerto of Henry Holden Huss, Which Was Dedicated to Her—Overture Will Be Raff's "Eine Feste Burg"—Other Numbers.

The personal interest of this week's Symphony program centers in the re-entry of Miss Adele aus der Ohe, after a long absence. She has chosen the pianoforte concert of Henry Holden Huss, dedicated to her, but originally introduced by himself at a New York Philharmonic concert. It is a composition well suited to her style and temperament, of which sustained vigor and a certain splendor in display are prominent elements. It is the work of a young writer, eager to speak out what is on his mind, and not pausing long to argue or elaborate.

The nominal key is the bold, brilliant and exciting B major, and the casting is into the usual three movements. The themes are short and strongly set out, and the regulation cadenza is placed near the middle of the first movement, instead of being held back until time for the coda to be shaped.

The overture will be Raff's "Eine feste Burg," written to accompany a drama of the Thirty Years' War, and passing from a majestically martial presentation of the solemn theme to a high-strung and hurried allegro.

One of Smetana's cycles of patriotic tone poems will follow the concerto. This is the "Vyschrad," wherein the composer stands in fancy before Bohemia's historic fortress and reviews its life. First he portrays the dignity, glory and triumph of its proud early years; then come dissension, conflict, crash and downfall; and at last the ruined castle remains alone, sad, desolate and gloomy, a theme for mourning, despair and oblivion.

The wild genius of Smetana, which at last broke into the madness whereof he died, is to be felt in the high tides of emotion and eloquence which swell in the poem and its intense coloring. The symphony, put at the end, will be Beethoven's second.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the B major concerto for piano and orchestra, by Henry Holden Huss, the American composer. The work was given in its revised form. The other numbers of the program were Raff's overture, "Eine feste Burg," Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vyschrad," and Beethoven's D major symphony. The Huss concerto is one that appeals especially to the musician or the advanced student of music, for its constantly varying progressions, its abrupt changes of modulations in different keys and the almost restless and irregular forms of its instrumental combinations, makes the piece too complicated and abstruse for the enjoyment of the general public.

The instrumentation is elaborate and the solo instrument is very prominent in each movement. The first part is so full of fortissimo passages that the physical tax for the soloist is very great, and that Miss Aus Der Ohe was able to maintain the proper proportion in her piano work against the heavy orchestral background, shows the artist possessed of a strength of arms and fingers not usually found in a woman. Her chords, arpeggios and runs, singly and in doubles, were wonderfully vigorous and clear, and in all her fortissimo work she appeared to be easily able to cope with the orchestra. In the second movement she produced a beautiful cantabel tone where required, showing a fine intelligence in her reading and a consummate skill in execution. She gave the two themes of the third movement with splendid contrasting effects, closing the concerto with a brilliant and dashing performance of the crashing finale. The large audience appreciated her performance very highly, and she was recalled several times and received some huge floral tributes.

The orchestra as a rule did its work admirably, though the "conversations" in the third movement seemed to be a trifle uncertain at times. The Raff overture proved to be a pleasing composition of its kind, and the principal theme showed to advantage the efficiency of the different wind contingents. Smetana's symphonic poem was given in a stirring and sympathetic manner, the brasses sounding their phrases in excellent harmony and the contrasts of the festival music and the joyless, sad refrain of the finale being beautiful in their impressive and mournful cadences. The Beethoven symphony calls for naught but praise, the larghetto and the delightful scherzo each being received with the usual manifestations of pleasure by the auditors.

The program of the concerts this week will include Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's symphony in F. Mr. Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear as a soloist for the first time in America, and he will play a concerto by Saint-Saens.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and this is the programme presented by Mr. Gericke:

Raff: Overture, "Eine feste Burg," Op. 127. (First time.)

Huss: Concerto in B major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 10.

Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vyschrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country").

Beethoven: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36.

Mr. Gericke, if an admirer of Raff, was unkind to the composer in producing his overture "Eine feste Burg." At best not a man of the highest genius, Raff nevertheless possessed a genuine gift of melody, a sense of orchestral color, a sound musicianship, and a certain vein of imaginativeness that enabled him, when his unfortunate money circumstances allowed him sufficient leisure, to produce a few works of undying beauty. With these compositions always ready to the conductor's hand, it was an odd conceit of Mr. Gericke's to prowl among dusty music shelves, and finally to drag to light a long forgotten work that even in its palmiest days could not have been regarded as a worthy example of the master's talents. Raff wrote this overture as a prelude to a tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," by one Karl Albert Wilhelm Genast, surely a relation-in-law, for Raff married an actress, by name Doris Genast. Although afterwards revised for concert performance, the overture must still be classed as an occasional piece, written to order or else to oblige a friend. In any case, it is a feeble, old-fashioned composition, which would give an inexperienced concert-goer a cruelly unjust conception of Raff's claim to fame.

Immediately after the overture came a pianoforte concerto by Mr. Henry Holden Huss, which was played here, for the first time anywhere, in 1894, with the composer at the piano. Since then it has been partially re-written. Although offering much in the way of beauty, Mr. Huss's concerto leaves an impression of vagueness, chiefly because the musical material seems to be thrown together without definite purpose. Many of the themes are strikingly beautiful, others are stirring; there are moments of lovely orchestration. No one episode, however, has any ostensible connection with any other, the entire concerto, therefore, suggesting a photographic plate on which several pictures have been taken by mistake; a strong study of a head may be half hidden by a pretty view of a country house, and perhaps both are jostled by a graceful row of quivering poplar trees. These bits, exquisite in themselves, do not make a picture. Miss aus der Ohe did what she could, and aroused great enthusiasm by her noble playing, distinguished alike by beautiful tone, warmth of feeling, fine rhythm, and a general sense of mastery. The artist was recalled four or five times.

Smetana must always command deep respect as a composer who worked long and late, through the trials of deafness and other physical ills, chiefly for the musical glory of his native Bohemia. On first hearing, as well as on subsequent occasions, such of his symphonic poems contained in the cycle "My Country" as have been brought out here made an impression of great originality and poetic imaginativeness. But now, either because they have been heard too often, or because we have got too accustomed to the Czech idiom to be dazzled by the mere strangeness of the sounds, some of these poems, notably that played Saturday night, seem rather commonplace, showing in no way the sprakling freshness of "Die verkaufte Braut."

One constantly reads that in the eighteenth century enthusiasm was regarded as improper, not to say wrong. My Lord Shaftesbury, third of the name, and a person highly thought of in his day, described enthusiasm, according to Mr. Augustine Birrell, as "one of the dangers of the age, a terrible distemper, almost as bad as the smallpox . . . a modification of the spleen, having its centre in an ill-regulated religion." Hume did not hold with enthusiasm, and on this topic Gibbon was led to say of a certain pious author: "Had not Law's vigorous mind been clouded by enthusiasm he might be ranked with the most agreeable and ingenious writers of his time." Had Gibbon, Hume, the Earl of Shaftesbury and all the rest been at Symphony Hall Saturday night, sourly as they might have looked at the demonstration Miss aus der Ohe's playing brought forth, on the whole they would have been well content with the demeanor of this audience of the twentieth century, who went to the length of receiving the first two movements of the Beethoven symphony in almost total silence. Perhaps the playing of the scherzo and of the finale met with more favor.

At the next concert Mr. Krasselt will make his first appearance as a soloist. This will be the programme: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Saint-Saens, concerto for violoncello; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Ideale"; Dvorak, Symphony No. 3.

R. R. G.

SYMPHONY HALL

SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 17, AT 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.
Soloist, MR. HAROLD BAUER.

Programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, Tschalkowski—Entr'acte from "Messidor" (first time), Brueneau—Symphony No. 2, Brahms.

A limited number of tickets for both performances now on sale at box office.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

A few choice locations at reasonable prices. Apply at once, MR. HARDING, 95 Kilby St. [A]

If you cannot have a good thing yourself, it is not other than natural to decry the good thing that another has and try to make him dissatisfied with it, so that either he may put it aside and come down to your level of deprivation, or else dispose of it in such a way that you may get hold of it and its advantages. The Italian proverb says, "Chi sprezza, vuol compare" (who disparages, wants to buy); and the provincial pettiness of some recent New York criticism about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its early concerts of this season indicates rather jealous envy than fair-minded comment. At any time a new conductor and a new concert-master are not enviable men. For until they have quite conquered their public they are the objects of carping censure, of unreasonable comparison, of unjust requirements and downright disfavor. France, which is not inclined to be too gentle in judgment or its expression, and likes to sharpen severity with smartness, has yet the common courtesy and the common sense to allow an artist three debut performances of his own choice, if the verdict upon one or two seems to him partial or too narrowly founded.

But New York was fain to dismiss the new Boston leader contemptuously and conclusively, the harshest spirit, perhaps, being expressed by a writer known to be closely bound to his predecessor, and thus likely to impugn his own judgment and to injure Mr. Kneisel indirectly.

Comparisons Unavoidable.

The unavoidable comparisons—unheard but not unfelt or unknown—which a stranger realizes will permeate and influence the temper of his first audiences, are enough to shake his nerve and his security and depress his performance below the level he has shown himself capable of reaching. But this is no novel or isolated exhibition of haste and intemperance. The eager partizanship of the friends of Bernhard Listemann and Wulf Fries—not to cite other men less prominent than they—was very obviously manifested against their successors in the orchestra, and every other change of leadership was followed by protest and almost violent strictures upon the new men as they came.

New York seemed determined that Mr. Nikisch should not be dismissed, although it showed no disposition to provide for him itself, and the early work of Mr. Paur was almost obviously censured there. This year the dyspeptic disposition shows itself in repeating the old objection that Mr. Gericke is too academic and level-headed—which is but the complaint of the vaudeville singer, that she didn't want her accompaniments correct, but she did want more "go" in them. But now a new complaint has arisen and has even found place in some editorial columns—being frankly set down in these words:

Hold Dominant Position.

"It seems as if the dominant position held by these musicians, over whom Mr. Wilhelm Gericke presides with so much dignity and authority, should carry with it the obligation of musical orthodoxy. But of late the orchestra has abandoned its conservatism and has manifested—mysteriously—a tendency to exploit the works of the newer, more radical and less known composers."

But Boston, which supports and admires its band, and therefore has the first right to opinion and preference, even if the new departure, which has been made with modest reserve and caution, does extend so far as to the writings of "this rhapsodist D'Indy and the racial enthusiast, Glazounoff."

But what has apparently much puzzled and yet more gratified the foreign critics is what they assume to be a falling off in the regard felt for the Symphony Orchestra, as evidenced in the smaller amount of money paid this year for seats. Such a mercenary explanation of the fact comes naturally enough from persons who would not be sorry to see the Boston organization come to grief as have failed even the attempts at organization made elsewhere.

But the explanation rests on premises for different from the assumed dissatisfaction with the band and its management. First of all, the American public is fickle and vain. Because it has been acquainted with a person or a thing for a while, it concludes that it knows all there is know, and it clamors for a new id or a new amusement.

The author whose books sell by thousands this year will not muster more than dozens a score of months hence. Boston has undoubtedly felt that it had pretty well gauged Mr. Gericke and could not exceed a calm local content with him and his doings, so that as no promise was made that any other leader could be heard even in a mere sampling of his quality and manner, there was nothing in leadership to stir a new enthusiasm. Again, interest has always been checked by the customary reticence in regard to the features of the prospective seasons. New works were promised in a general memorandum and an alphabetical list of expected soloists was emitted.

Definite Promises Wanting.

But definite promises and engagements of people whom the public did not already know almost by heart, together with fixed programs for five or six concerts, were wanting, so that there was small inducement for eagerness and competition in buying tickets. But above all, the main cause of diminished receipts lay in the economic condition of the time.

Enforced reductions in the extras and even the necessities of life, compelled by the dubious state of money markets, the excessive and tyrannous exactions of work-people and the fear of what worse might be coming, constrained purchasers to limit their expenditures for concerts as they are still doing in regard to theaters. Contest for places still existed, but all the figures and the advances were less than usual. But the audiences assemble in the old multitude, with the old intelligence, taste and affection for the concerts, while the assembly of patient waiters for the rehearsal seats has never been prompter or larger than this year.

And there has come this individual benefit—that many of the very people whom the founder of the orchestra had in mind have been able to partake of its joys and advantages for the first time in years, because they have not seen the cost of seats overpass the limit of their savings and their balanced expenditures, but could make their means equal their desires. There has been a dwindling of aggregate receipts; some things which the management had in mind to do may be necessarily passed over, and there will be, as in every season, some discontent over individual demands personal or musical; but there is no real defection from the broad-based and firmly founded support of the orchestra and its concerts.

NYONE looking over the richly attired audience at the Academy of Music Friday night of last week would hardly have believed that it represented a community too poor to build a music hall. A good man in his endeavor to excuse money and lack of public spirit in Brooklyn reis a borough (meaning Brooklyn) of wage earners if the great army of fashionably dressed women perous appearing men that assembled to hear the bert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are wage their salaries must amount to fortunes.

the concerts by the Boston Orchestra are artistic events. In Brooklyn—thanks to the Auxiliary—the concerts are regarded as the opera hattan—affairs of society or those who think they he world of wealth and fashion. This feeling de e real music lover, and as for the musician, why is at home or goes to some less pretentious as- ien he wants to hear music. ogram for the concert in Brooklyn is usually of numbers heard at the two concerts in Man- he music presented in Brooklyn was:

Euryanthe.....	Weber
Der Freischütz.....	Weber
ymphonique from Messidor.....	Bruneau
(First time at these concerts.)

(from Siegfried).....	Wagner
Spinnrade.....	Schubert
.....	Schubert
No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....	Brahms

ormance throughout was on a dead level of acaine. Not once did Mr. Gericke rise to the comas of interpretation. A criticism of the music ind on another page of this issue.

If you cannot have a good thing yourself, it is not other than natural to decry the good thing that another has and try to make him dissatisfied with it, so that either he may put it aside and come down to your level of deprivation, or else dispose of it in such a way that you may get hold of it and its advantages. The Italian proverb says, "Chi sprezza, vuoi comprare" (who disparages, wants to buy); and the provincial pettiness of some recent New York criticism about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its early concerts of this season indicates rather jealous envy than fair-minded comment. At any time a new conductor and a new concertmaster are not enviable men. For until they have quite conquered their public they are the objects of carping censure, of unreasonable comparison, of unjust requirements and downright disfavor. France, which is not inclined to be too gentle in judgment or its expression, and likes to sharpen severity with smartness, has yet the common courtesy and the common sense to allow an artist three debut performances of his own choice, if the verdict upon one or two seems to him partial or too narrowly founded.

But New York was fain to dismiss the new Boston leader contemptuously and conclusively, the harshest spirit, perhaps, being expressed by a writer known to be closely bound to his predecessor, and thus likely to impugn his own judgment and to injure Mr. Kneisel indirectly.

Comparisons Unavoidable.

The unavoidable comparisons—unheard but not unfelt or unknown—which a stranger realizes will permeate and influence the temper of his first audiences, are enough to shake his nerve and his security and depress his performance below the level he has shown himself capable of reaching. But this is no novel or isolated exhibition of haste and intemperance. The eager partizanship of the friends of Bernhard Listemann and Wulf Fries—not to cite other men less prominent than they—was very obviously manifested against their successors in the orchestra, and every other change of leadership was followed by protest and almost violent strictures upon the new men as they came.

New York seemed determined that Mr. Nikisch should not be dismissed, although it showed no disposition to provide for him itself, and the early work of Mr. Paur was almost obviously censured there. This year the dyspeptic disposition shows itself in repeating the old objection that Mr. Gericke is too academic and level-headed—which is but the complaint of the vaudeville singer, that she didn't want her accompaniments correct, but she did want more "go" in them. But now a new complaint has arisen and has even found place in some editorial columns—being frankly set down in these words:

Hold Dominant Position.

"It seems as if the dominant position held by these musicians, over whom Mr. Wilhelm Gericke presides with so much dignity and authority, should carry with it the obligation of musical orthodoxy. But of late the orchestra has abandoned its conservatism and has manifested—mysteriously—a tendency to exploit the works of the newer, more radical and less known composers."

But Boston, which supports and admires its band, and therefore has the first right to opinion and preference, even if the new departure, which has been made with modest reserve and caution, does extend so far as to the writings of "this rhapsodist D'Indy and the racial enthusiast, Glazounoff."

But what has apparently much puzzled and yet more gratified the foreign critics is what they assume to be a falling off in the regard felt for the Symphony Orchestra, as evidenced in the smaller amount of money paid this year for seats. Such a mercenary explanation of the fact comes naturally enough from persons who would not be sorry to see the Boston organization come to grief as have failed even the attempts at organization made elsewhere.

But the explanation rests on premises for different from the assumed dissatisfaction with the band and its management. First of all, the American public is fickle and vain. Because it has been acquainted with a person or a thing for a while, it con-

clud- In spite of know Boston women or many are taking meets and are
hunt another y
There are pr riders at the M
year than at t
gether, and eve have more than the hunt, the re
by auto or carr
George Mande
Myopia and on
of riders. Mrs.
as well as her h
to the sport. O her enthusiasm
ter, Mrs. Char
Guy Norman v
Clarence Moo
Swift, was a in at the death
Nannie Langh
Over at Lin
women who l with the Mid exander Higge Higginson, w
who has alwa
tickets. cause of dimi
the economic co
Enforced red and even the ne
pelled by the d
markets, the ex
exactions of fear of what w
constrained pur expenditures fo
still doing in Contest for pl
all the figures
less than usua
assemble in th
the old intellig
tion for the c
sembly of pat
rehearsal seat
prompter or la
And there ha benefit—that m
whom the fou
had in mind h
take of its joy
the first time
have not seen pass the limit

Symphony

SEASON

SYMPHONY

WILHELM GERICKE

their balanced expenditures, but could make their means equal their desires. There has been a dwindling of aggregate receipts; some things which the management had in mind to do may be necessarily passed over, and there will be, as in every season, some discontent over individual demands personal or musical; but there is no real defection from the broad-based and firmly founded support of the orchestra and its concerts.

ANYONE looking over the richly attired audience at the Academy of Music Friday night of last week would hardly have believed that it represented a community too poor to build a music hall. A good man in his endeavor to excuse the parsimony and lack of public spirit in Brooklyn recently said to the writer:

"This is a borough (meaning Brooklyn) of wage earners."

Well, if the great army of fashionably dressed women and prosperous appearing men that assembled to hear the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are wage earners their salaries must amount to fortunes.

In Boston the concerts by the Boston Orchestra are serious artistic events. In Brooklyn—thanks to the Woman's Auxiliary—the concerts are regarded as the opera is in Manhattan—affairs of society or those who think they are it in the world of wealth and fashion. This feeling depresses the real music lover, and as for the musician, why he remains at home or goes to some less pretentious assembly when he wants to hear music.

The program for the concert in Brooklyn is usually made up of numbers heard at the two concerts in Manhattan. The music presented in Brooklyn was:

Overture to Euryanthe.....	Weber
Aria from Der Freischütz.....	Weber
Entr'acte Symphonique from Messidor.....	Bruneau
(First time at these concerts.)
Waldweben (from Siegfried).....	Wagner
Gretchen am Spinnrade.....	Schubert
Erkönig .....	Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....	Brahms

The performance throughout was on a dead level of academic routine. Not once did Mr. Gericke rise to the composer's ideas of interpretation. A criticism of the music will be found on another page of this issue.

In I

Nun

Nun

Nun

The

The

One

drowns his say but w not have
"Then a
been know people sen
rica, to sav

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Novelty for the Series Is the Overture by Raff.

Miss Aus der Ohe's Performance of Huss' Piano Concerto—An Unfamiliar Overture by Raff and Pieces by Smetana and Beethoven.

The programme for the Fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Ein feste Burg".....Raff
(First time at these concerts).

Concerto in B major for piano.....Huss
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Beethoven

Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," was played in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1882. We believe there was a still earlier performance, possibly by Theodore Thomas, but we have not been able to verify this belief.
The overture was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and it was performed for the first time in 1855 as a prelude to the play. Then Raff re-wrote it for concert use. The chief theme is the familiar tune that, long attributed to Martin Luther, is the melody for his version of the 46th Psalm, but the form of this melody as it is now known was shaped by Bach.

The overture is not among the more distinguished works of Raff, who, although he was of a romantic nature and of poetic aspirations, was obliged through poverty to write innumerable pot-boilers. His extraordinary facility in counterpoint lightened this task, and was in the long run fatal to his abiding reputation; for some of his most striking contrapuntal feats are buried in otherwise empty and futile music. It was not that he did not have the faculty of self-examination and consequent glorifying rejection; he did not have the time or money was always needed, and there were the publishers clamorous
for salon music.

This overture is of a kind that was once popular. A well known theme suggested a musical composition, and the aim of the composer was to introduce this theme in as many singular ways as possible. The introduction was both expected and unexpected. There were passages that were written to lead up inevitably to the theme, so that the audience might say with delight, "now it's coming"; and again, when there was the least expectation, the theme suddenly appeared and the audience started, sat up, rubbed eyes and strained ears: "Why, here it is!" Think, for a moment, of Luther's first lines as Englished by Thomas Carlyle:

"A safe stronghold our God is still,
A trusty shield and weapon."

And how does Raff first introduce the melody? With full orchestra and with thunderous brass and roll of drums? No; for in such a case what would he have for a climax? This tune, which is so intimately associated with aggressive Protestantism; this tune, which was a battle hymn in the war against all devils and principalities and powers, is introduced suavely by amiable wind instruments. Then, of course, follows treatment of the melody, and in the main body of the overture, the tune serves in various more or less ingenious ways. But ingenuity is not necessarily a saving grace in a musical composition; and in this instance the ingenuity is that of accomplished routine. The overture is a singularly uninspired composition.

No momentary breath of imagination gives it the semblance of life. Put a looking-glass before the score, and the glass remains untarnished.

Mr. Huss was the pianist when his concerto was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert late in 1894. The concerto then seemed stuffed with so many thoughts and devices that hardly anything definite was left in the mind of the hearer. After this performance
Mr. Huss shortened the work and revised it in other ways. He changed the development in the first movement, broadened the second theme of the finale and "touched up," as he himself says, the instrumentation. Last night the composer was fortunate in his pianist, who did all within her power to make the music an authoritative message. Mr. Huss played his own work, as we remember, after the manner of the average composer. He made no pretence of being a commanding virtuoso.
Mr. Gericke last night read the work with the most painstaking care and with appreciation of the best characteristics of the score, so that the audience undoubtedly had full opportunity to form a judgment concerning the merits of the concerto itself.

This work does not seem to us one of high imagination or of marked distinction. Mr. Huss is a musician who has studied deeply and earnestly; a musician to be respected for certain solid acquirements, for industry, and for commendable ambition; he is to be respected just as he respects his profession; but this does not enable him with all his technical resources to create a concerto of true beauty and strength, nor to display a pronounced individuality. He was an excellent student of harmony at Munich; but in this concerto his harmonic knowledge does not tell. It is not that he is afraid of effects; on the contrary, he is adventurous; but the concerto is so crowded with matter that nothing stands out in simple and bold relief.

There are a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them. There were agreeable moments, but there were quarter-hours of monotony, when, to use a homely phrase, everything was going at once, and without any effect save that of exasperating the hearer. There were pleasant bits of orchestral color, but as a rule the orchestral painting was mono-chromatic. Force was more than once bombast, as in the first movement, and in the orchestral repetition of the chief theme of the finale. Miss Aus der Ohe, to whom the concerto is dedicated, displayed the conscientiousness, the power, the brilliance, the intelligence, that have long characterized her, but not infrequently the piano part seemed as long spun out and tiresome chatter. She was recalled several times.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN,	OVERTURE, "Mid-summer-night's Dream.
SAINT-SAËNS,	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA in A minor, op. 33. Allegro non troppo:— Allegretto con moto:—come prima
LISZT,	SYMPHONIC POEM No. 12, "The Ideal."
DVOŘÁK,	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 2, op. 76. I. Allegro ma non troppo. II. Andante con moto: Allegro. III. Scherzando; Trio, Tempo I. IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT.

[Photo by Notman.]

RUDOLPHE KRASSELT,

First Violincello of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Ideal," Rare in Boston.

Henke — P. Hale

Appearance of Mr. Krasselt, the New First Cellist—Overture from "Midsummer Night's Dream"—Mme. Patti's Second Concert in Symphony Hall.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"...

Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for 'cello....

Saint-Saens
Symphonic poem No. 12, "The Ideal".....Liszt

Symphony No. 2, in D minor.....Dvorak

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal."

Is not familiar to the concert-goers of Boston. Theodore Thomas produced it here in 1870, and it has been played once at a Symphony concert—in 1889. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "The Ideal." The illusions of youth pass away; that which was dreamed of as beautiful and divine seldom appears in reality, and if it does it is a disappointment; fortune, fame, truth and love leave man to find his only consolation in friendship and activity. But Liszt would not accept as a refrain to the poem of human life: "This is the end of every man's desire."

It was necessary to have an apotheosis, so he changed Schiller's ending; he believed that the holding fast of the ideal and the continual realization were the highest aims in existence; and therefore he gained his climax by a jubilant recapitulation of the motives of the earlier and more hopeful sections of his work.

It might be interesting to examine into the reasonableness of such a radical change in a classical poem merely for the purpose of making a Lisztian holiday; but we should not take the "literary" side of music too seriously. Mr. Henley says in his latest volume of essays—alas, it must be the last collection prepared by him—that "the 'aesthetic movement' has made painting so excessively literary, that either it is literature in a new medium or it is nothing." This saying may be applied to much of the modern music; and Liszt is still modern, far more modern than some of his most painstaking imitators of today, who affect to dub him old-fashioned.

It is necessary for a composer first of all to make music. The first question here is not whether Liszt bettered Schiller for his purpose, it is not whether he succeeded in translating into tone passages, line by line, of the poem, but whether the music itself will stand without the mottoes from the poem. An argument as to whether Schiller or Schopenhauer were the more truly philosophic in the view of the ages of man would be a distant digression.

The title, "The Ideal," is enough to any sensitive and sympathetic hearer who is able to make his own programme as it is suggested by the music. The aspirations, the hopes, the illusions, the disenchantment, and then the resolve to be heroic even in the face of cruel disappointment, and of the one supreme doubt, the firm belief in a divine average, in compensation somewhere and sometime in the vast universe to which this proud globe is as the ball rolled painfully by a beetle—these are surely in the music, nor is there any need of Schiller's lines or Lord Lytton's pompous and swollen translation. For the music of this poem is singularly clear, as well as imaginative, and for well-defined lines, for beauty of musical thought, for logical and poetic transformations of the leading idea, for nobility of expression, "The Ideal" must be ranked with the greatest works of Liszt. In this instance simplicity is not affected naivete, and strength is not merely bombast.

Although the poem is long, it is firmly knit together, and although there is a wealth of ingenious detail, there is no cessation in the flow of musical thought. There are passages of exquisite beauty; there is a broad sweep of vision; there is loftiness of imagination. A great, a nobly beautiful work that is not mocked by its title! The performance was a remarkable one, which reflected the highest credit on conductor and orchestra. Name all the qualities that characterize the ideal performance of such a masterpiece, and not one was missing in the performance of last night. And how familiar Wagner must have been with this score! How he helped himself freely with both hands for his own use and glory!

Mr. Krasselt made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. He is young, and youth, as Liszt said, is the time for virtuosity. Mr. Krasselt made a most favorable impression. His tone is pure and eminently agreeable, although it is not large and commanding. His mechanism is well developed; he plays with feeling and enthusiasm, as well as with the authority of an excellent musician. The concerto itself, with the exception of dry and formal padding toward the end, is delightful.

The overture and the symphony are well known and do not call for extended comment. The performance was of a high order. Seldom, if ever, has the overture—one of the few truly poetic compositions of Mendelssohn—been played with such beauty of tone and exquisite precision.

MUSICAL TOPICS.

Krasselt, Cello Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

First Appearance of the Arbos
Quartet—Thibaud's Last Recital.

—Preludes and Echoes.

B. B. B. — Nov 22 1903

Mr Rudolf Krasselt, the new first cellist, was the soloist at the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Symphony orchestra, making his debut here with the Saint-Saens A minor concerto for cello and orchestra. The program opened with Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," the remaining selections comprising Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's D minor symphony. The Saint-Saens concerto is not unfamiliar to Symphony audiences, it being in Mr Schroeder's repertory, and the new member of Mr Gericke's forces may fairly be said to have challenged criticism with the older cellist by selecting this work for his debut here in solo work. Mr Krasselt played the concerto splendidly throughout. So far as the finger execution was concerned, it was very true and facile, and met all the demands dexterously. Possibly the pianissimo passages at times were too lightly outlined for the heavy orchestral background, but as a rule the proper proportions were maintained by the solo instrument, and the themes and their development were given with authority and contrasting effects which showed Mr Krasselt's great abilities in a most favorable light. His tones are very sweet, especially in the upper register; he plays with good expression, and his whole interpretation, while lacking somewhat in warmth and sonority, was characterized by a refinement and brilliancy of execution which won him hearty tributes of appreciation from the audience.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture made a delightful introduction to a program which proved rather better suited to musical experts than to the general concert attendant. The beautiful Mendelssohn number was about as perfect in performance as one could wish, the shimmering fairy music showing the splendid team work of the violins at its best, and the mock pomposity of the Pyramus-Thisbe march being given with amusing vigor in its accented measures.

In the Liszt poem, the playing by the cello contingent calls for special approbation, the instruments giving out their themes with excellent precision and resonance. The figurations by the lighter string band went smoothly, the closing part of the piece was executed brilliantly and the various tonal episodes of the poem were presented in a poetic spirit harmonizing with the theme. Dvorak's symphony contains so many puzzling musical combinations that to the general ear much of the work is unsatisfactory. The beautiful harmonies of the second movement were adequately given, first by the pizzicato strings and wood-winds, and subsequently by the cellos, oboes and flutes, and the quaint scherzo was faultlessly presented, the staccato measures being notably crisp and harmonious.

Mr A. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists in the orchestra, will be this week's soloist, playing Max Bruch's Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra. The other selections are Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, its first performance here.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, "Midsummer-night's Dream"..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor, op. 33..... Saint-Saens Rudolf Krasselt, soloist.

Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal"..... Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 76..... Dvorak

The best came first. If there is any daintier bit of humor in the entire musical repertoire than Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's-dream Overture," we have not the honor of its acquaintance. The gentlemanliness of Mendelssohn's character, which militated against him in displays of deep emotion and of dramatic effect, helped him in the matter of his musical humor, which is delicate and piquant; he makes play with a rapier, not with a bludgeon as Beethoven sometimes did. What the boy of 18 achieved in this overture, the man of 34 could not equal when the Prussian king desired him to write more music upon this Shakespearian play.

It was splendidly performed. One needed no musical Baedeker to trace the fairy elves upon the violins, to identify the theme which portrayed Bottom and his band of amateur actors; the bassoon brayed with the translated weaver and the bass-tuba made shift to reproduce what Mendelssohn wrote for the ophicleide, i.e., the snoring of the drunken Bottom while the fairies danced around his sleeping form. If one will only compare such a work with the humorous (?) piece for Piano by Richard Strauss there may be a lesson in the proceeding.

Rudolf Krasselt, 24 years of age and as juvenile in appearance as Mr. Schuecker was when he first appeared here, is a master of his instrument. We scarcely think that it was judicious to choose for a debut, the number which had been played as his last solo in these concerts by Mr. Krasselt's predecessor. There was bound to be something less of reserve, something more of sentimentality, in the newcomer's interpretation. But this sin of youth was the only shortcoming. There was a surety of intonation and a brilliancy of performance that won a great triumph. There was sufficient breadth in the noble C string passages, the double-stopping was clear, there was mastery in every branch of Mr. Krasselt's work. He is surely a great addition to the orchestra and the audience at once recognized the fact, recalling him time after time with very spontaneous enthusiasm.

Liszt's "Ideal," is not an ideal work. He soars after the infinite, in this labored composition, and meets with the usual fate of flying-machines. In "Les Preludes" the master attains what he here only attempts. There is no "team play" in the work; it is every man for himself. The clarinette gives a monologue, then the trombone unburdens itself of a series of troubles in a long soliloquy, and even the kettle-drum has its tale of woe to tell as a solo.

We did not attempt to follow the work as programme-music, and ignored the Schiller pegs upon which the spasmodic phrases were hung, for if instrumental music cannot stand without the support of a poetic explanation in words it will sink to the lowest rank among the Arts. Heard then as pure music this work seemed wearisome and incoherent, and it lacked the great climaxes which Liszt has launched forth like thunder-bolts in many of his other symphonic poems. It was most carefully performed, but the audience were mystified as well as Lisztified, and applauded but little.

Dvorak's second symphony, although in regular and accepted form, begins with a movement that is rather heterogeneous and abstruse, and this coming directly after Liszt's musical ejaculations was piling Ossa upon Pelion.

But the rest of the work seemed stronger than upon previous hearings. There is a pastoral character in the symphony that makes of it a species of symphonic "Waldweben," filled with carollings and tender woodland sounds. That it is sometimes reminiscent cannot be denied, even the four heavy accents which are found in Schubert's ninth symphony (and which he may have copied from Beethoven's violin concerto,) being present in the finale. Nevertheless these do not amount to plagiarism, they are simply new sermons upon old texts. There are, however, other symphonies in the repertoire which might have precedence over Dvorak's earlier works in this form. One might wish, for example, to hear Goetz's short symphony again, or either of Volkmann's two, or Paine's "Spring Symphony," which ought not to remain forever upon the shelf.

Louis C. Elison.

KRASSELT'S DEBUT MOST AUSPICIOUS

Tomel

Fifth Symphony Is Overlong and Underbalanced.

The Fifth Symphony was overlong and underbalanced, its main weight, like the plums in the sea captain's pudding, being loaded into one end. It began delightfully with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, with which Mr. Gericke had wisely ameliorated his program, first planned to begin with the grandiose and ponderous "Tragic" of Brahms.

Then came Mr Krasselt, to make his debut as the new first cellist, choosing for his entrance the A-minor concerto of Saint-Saens, which is excellent for an introduction, as it gives the performer chance to display both instrument and art. Mr. Krasselt is boyish in face and manner, but he seems serious and settled when he gets fairly at his work. He plays with confidence and aplomb, but with due reserve and deflection.

His tone gratifies at once, being full, smooth, rich and equable, suggesting something of Giese's in a general way. His technique appears well-founded, broadly developed and as polished as need be, his delivery of scales and ornate passages being light, swift, clear and shapely, without hurry or petty showiness. He regarded justly the form of what he had to deliver, put gaiety into the allegros and a pleasant sentiment—nothing deeper is needed—into the allegretto.

Excellent Impression.

He made an excellent impression, and those who remember Hekking, half-wondering that he had not been chosen, soon felt that this young man would show the solid qualities and graces in due time, without the academic hardness and dryness of the older master.

Liszt's tremendously and tediously transcendental rhapsody (which he calls a poem) meant to parallel Schiller's metaphysical ode, "The Ideal," followed. It has its great and high moments and its massive orchestral splendors, but it confounds, burdens and wearies through its long course, wherein the relief of contrast comes but fitfully. It has been well called an "elegy on departed youth," and a long, laborious elegy, without soft consolation, bright hope, or spiritual uplift, is not so easy to hear and bear.

Rich and Comfortable.

Dvorak was to be the symphonist, and Mr. Gericke—who had at first thought of the work in F, which would have been new here—took up the No. 2, in D-minor, which has been known favorably here for about twenty years. This contains one rich and comfortable movement, the adagio, which has a religious character, its grave themes being heightened and cheered by the ornate development in which they are set. The rest of the symphony, while not treated by Slavonic passion or urged by Slavonic energy and insistence, makes yet strong demand for close and analytic attention, and is not well placed after an hour and a half of constant and often laborious listening. That all these things were well played needs not to be proclaimed; but the symphony might have been finer in places if the men had not been, as some were boldly willing to admit, fatigued in mind and hand and breath by their long previous exercise.

In Smetana's "Vysehrad" imaginative force is recognized at once. With apparently simple means the composer succeeds in musical scene painting; and there is something more than panoramic success; for the idea of former glory and departed grandeur is firmly established. The simplicity of Smetana is honest, while the naivete of Dvorak suggests artful and deliberate childishness as an important part of musical stock in trade. The lamentation over the ruins of Libussa's castle is not sentimental; it is hardie and heroic; it suggests the period, and in the whole symphonic poem there is no incongruous or belittling thought or expression.

Beethoven's early symphony brought the end.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the B major concerto for piano and orchestra, by Henry Holden Huss, the American composer. The work was given in its revised form. The other numbers of the program were Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's D major symphony. The Huss concerto is one that appeals especially to the musician or the advanced student of music, for its constantly varying progressions, its abrupt changes of modulations in different keys and the almost restless and irregular forms of its instrumental combinations, makes the piece too complicated and abstruse for the enjoyment of the general public.

The instrumentation is elaborate and the solo instrument is very prominent in each movement. The first part is so full of fortissimo passages that the physical tax for the soloist is very great, and that Miss Aus Der Ohe was able to maintain the proper proportion in her piano work against the heavy orchestral background, shows the artist possessed of a strength of arms and fingers not usually found in a woman. Her chords, arpeggios and runs, singly and in doubles, were wonderfully vigorous and clear, and in all her fortissimo work she appeared to be easily able to cope with the orchestra. In the second movement she produced a beautiful cantabel tone where required, showing a fine intelligence in her reading and a consummate skill in execution. She gave the two themes of the third movement with splendid contrasting effects, closing the concerto with a brilliant and dashing performance of the crashing finale. The large audience appreciated her performance very highly, and she was recalled several times and received some huge floral tributes.

The orchestra, as a rule did its work admirably, though the "conversations" in the third movement seemed to be a trifle uncertain at times. The Raff overture proved to be a pleasing composition of its kind, and the principal theme showed to advantage the efficiency of the different wind contingents. Smetana's symphonic poem was given in a stirring and sympathetic manner, the brasses sounding their phrases in excellent harmony and the contrasts of the festival music and the joyless, sad refrain of the finale being beautiful in their impressive and mournful cadences. The Beethoven symphony calls for naught but praise, the larghetto and the delightful scherzo each being received with the usual manifestations of pleasure by the auditors.

The program of the concerts this week will include Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's symphony in F. Mr Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear as a soloist for the first time in America, and he will play a concerto by Saint-Saens. Glabe Nov 11 1903

Popular Concerts at the Theatres

—Preludes and Echoes.

Glabe

Nov. 22, 1903

Mr Rudolf Krasselt, the new first cellist, was the soloist at the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Symphony orchestra, making his debut here with the Saint-Saens A minor concerto for cello and orchestra. The program opened with Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," the remaining selections comprising Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's D minor symphony. The Saint-Saens concerto is not unfamiliar to Symphony audiences, it being in Mr Schroeder's repertory, and the new member of Mr Gericke's forces may fairly be said to have challenged criticism with the older cellist by selecting this work for his debut here in solo work. Mr Krasselt played the concerto splendidly throughout. So far as the finger execution was concerned, it was very true and facile, and met all the demands dexterously. Possibly the pianissimo passages at times were too lightly outlined for the heavy orchestral background, but as a rule the proper proportions were maintained by the solo instrument, and the themes and their development were given with authority and contrasting effects which showed Mr Krasselt's great abilities in a most favorable light. His tones are very sweet, especially in the upper register; he plays with good expression, and his whole interpretation, while lacking somewhat in warmth and sonority, was characterized by a refinement and brilliancy of execution which won him hearty tributes of appreciation from the audience.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture made a delightful introduction to a program which proved rather better suited to musical experts than to the general concert attendant. The beautiful Mendelssohn number was about as perfect in performance as one could wish, the shimmering fairy music showing the splendid team work of the violins at its best, and the mock pomp of the Pyramus-Thisbe march being given with amusing vigor in its accented measures.

In the Liszt poem, the playing by the cello contingent calls for special approbation, the instruments giving out their themes with excellent precision and resonance. The figurations by the lighter string band went smoothly, the closing part of the piece was executed brilliantly and the various tonal episodes of the poem were presented in a poetic spirit harmonizing with the theme. Dvorak's symphony contains so many puzzling musical combinations that to the general ear much of the work is unsatisfactory. The beautiful harmonies of the second movement were adequately given, first by the pizzicato strings and wood-winds, and subsequently by the cellos, oboes and flutes, and the quaint scherzo was faultlessly presented, the staccato measures being notably crisp and harmonious.

Mr A. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists in the orchestra, will be this week's soloist, playing Max Bruch's Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra.

The other selections are Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, its first performance here.

The programme of the fourth public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall includes an overture, "Ein feste Burg," Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. Raff's overture, which is seldom played—it was performed here at a Philharmonic concert in 1882—was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and was first played at a performance of the tragedy at the Grand Ducal Theatre, Weimar, in 1855. Raff rewrote the overture in 1865 at Wiesbaden, and it was performed for the first time in its revised form at Karlsruhe in 1866. The familiar melody, set, as it was long believed by Luther, to the 46th Psalm, is freely used, as it was by Meyerbeer, Nicolai, Mendelssohn, Wagner and many others. The present form of the melody, however, was shaped by Bach and differs from the original.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" has been already played twice at these concerts. It is the first poem of his cycle "My Country." The Vysehrad is a fortified hill in the southern part of Prague. Centuries ago this hill was crowned with the castle of the semi-legendary Libussa, a remarkable woman, who by her marriage to Premysl, a ploughman, founded a powerful dynasty. The old castle and other buildings were destroyed in the Hussite wars. Smetana fancies Lumir, an ancient bard, looking at the ruins and recounting the past glories, the wondrous sights, and then the passing of the glory. The work is highly imaginative, a true orchestral rhapsody.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will play with the orchestra Henry H. Huss' piano concerto in B major. The work was performed for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston some years ago when the composer was the pianist. Mr. Huss revised the concerto, which is dedicated to Miss Aus der Ohe, who, by the way, will play at these concerts in Boston for the eighth time. A pupil of Kullak and Liszt, she first visited the United States in the late fall of 1886. Kullak

GERICKE SCORES TRIUMPH.

First Concert of the Season in New York by Boston Symphony Orchestra Grand Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 5, 1903. At Carnegie Hall tonight the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first concert of the season before one of the largest gatherings of its patrons which has ever assembled there. It has become trite to accord this organization the position of greatest importance among the factors which make a New York musical season, but if Mr. Gericke had not already earned title to such consideration the performance of tonight would have done so.

Mr. Gericke's programme was well put together. Its atmosphere was vernal, buoyant, optimistic. Beginning with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," it included the Mendelssohn violin concerto and the "Waldweben" from Siegfried and was concluded by Brahms' second symphony in D major. The soloist was the Spanish violinist Senor Fernandez Arbos, the recently appointed concert master of the orchestra. There is no need at this time to tell how the Boston orchestra plays the second Brahms' symphony. Mr. Gericke's readings of it here have always constituted memorable musical moments, and that of tonight was fit to bear company with any of its predecessors.

Judged merely as a technical exposition of the score's contents, the performance was remarkable, but above and beyond this there was vitalization of phrase, eloquence of accent, a vocal quality in the singing of the melodies and a polite atmosphere suffused throughout the whole work. In this department of musical literature the band is at its best. Not so wholly satisfactory was the "Waldweben," although played at once with microscopic care for detail and with large sweep. It lacked the "point" which perhaps ruder treatment might have given it, when, toward the close, motion piles upon motion to make that one short, thrilling climax. The solo voices of this orchestra, it must be said, nevertheless, gave it a distinction and refinement that it may never find in the opera house.

As the Mendelssohn violin concerto disclosed him, Senor Fernandez Arbos would seem to be an able successor to the desk of Franz Kneisel, rather than a valuable addition to the ranks of concert violinists. His tone is good but slender, rather colorless and inelastic. His style is classic, precise, unemotional; his technic—particularly that of the left hand—is admirable.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America as a soloist this afternoon, when he will play Saint-Saens' concerto for cello No. 1. Mr. Krasselt was born on Jan. 1, 1879, at Baden-Baden. He studied chiefly with Klengel at Leipzig. His first appearance in public was at Baden-Baden when he was only 13 years old. He has been connected with the orchestra of the Rostock Theatre, the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, and the orchestra of the Vienna Court Opera. He was a member of the Krasselt quartet; the other members were his brother, Alfred, violin; his father, Gustav, viola, and his sister, Jenny, who died four years ago, was the pianist.

The orchestral numbers are the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Dvorak's symphony in D minor No. 2, which was written for the Philharmonic Society of London and first performed at one of its concerts, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," which, introduced here by Theodore Thomas, has been played only once at a Symphony concert. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "Die Ideale," but whereas Schiller names friendship and work as the sole consolations for the disillusion of life as man grows older, Liszt concludes with an "Apotheosis," in which the motive typical of "The Ideal" is glorified and made crashingly jubilant.

The programme of the sixth concert will include Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs (played by Mr. Birnbaum, violinist, a new member of the orchestra), and Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor (first time in America).

84

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Fidelio." op. 72.

BRUCH,

FANTASIA on Scottish Folk Melodies for VIOLIN,
op. 46.

I. Introduction: Grave. Adagio cantabile.

II. Scherzo: Allegro,

III. Andante sostenuto.

IV. Finale: Allegro guerriero.

DOHNÁNYI,

SYMPHONY in D minor.

I. Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Molto Adagio.

III. Scherzo: Presto.

IV. Intermezzo. Andante poco moto.

V. Finale: Introduzione, molto sostenuto; Tema con variazione e Fuga.

(First time in America.)

Soloist:

Mr. ALEXANDER Z. BIRNBAUM.

NEW SYMPHONY BY DOHNANYI

Its First Performance in America Will Be Given at the Public Rehearsal
This Afternoon.

COMPOSER HAS PLAYED IN BOSTON.

Change in Programme for Next Week—News About
Patti and Her Farewell—
Opera in New York.

Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor will be performed at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon for the first time in America. The first performance was at Budapest, in January of this year. The symphony is very long, and it is elaborately worked out. The second movement is of a rhapsodical character, after the Hungarian fashion. There are five movements. The fourth is an intermezzo, with viola solo, and the finale includes a theme with variations and a concluding fugue. The symphony, which shows both the influence of Brahms and the hereditary Hungarian instincts of the composer, has been played in Vienna and in Berlin.

Dohnanyi, who now lives in Vienna as a pianist and composer, is well known in Boston. His first appearance in the United States as a pianist was at Cambridge, Mass., March 15, 1900, when he played Beethoven's concerto No. 4 with the Symphony orchestra. He played the same concerto in Boston, March 17, and gave recitals. He visited Boston again in 1900 and played his own concerto at a Symphony concert, Nov. 3. He also gave recitals. One of his chamber works has been played here by the Kneisels.

Dohnanyi is now in his 26th year. He was born at Pressburg and his father is professor of mathematics and physics at the Gymnasium of that city. The boy showed early musical inclinations, but he was not exploited as a prodigy; on the contrary, some of his family opposed his adoption of music as a career. He studied the piano with Forstner, Thoman and D'Albert and composition with Hans Koessler.

On account of the length of the symphony, there will be only one other orchestral piece, the overture to "Fidelio." Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists of the orchestra, will make his first appearance in this country as a soloist. He is a young man, born at Warsaw, and his teachers were Joachim and Ysaye. He has been connected with orchestras in Hamburg and Paris, and he has played as a soloist in Paris and Berlin. He will play this afternoon Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish folk tunes.

The programme for the concerts next week has been changed. It will include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Tschai-kowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode" (a posthumous work), and the "Childe Harold" symphony by Berlioz. Melba will sing an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Overture to "Fidelio."

Bruch—Scottish Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra. Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, Soloist.

Dohnanyi—Symphony in D minor. (First time in America.)

The "Fidelio" overture, which is one of the weaker of the four overtures attached to Beethoven's single opera, received an excellent interpretation, clear and well-balanced from the first phrase to the last. Is there nothing newer in the way of overtures, waiting for an audition at these concerts?

The interest of the concert began with the debut of Mr. Birnbaum, one of the new members of our orchestra. Bruch's Scottish Fantasia is an interesting work; it grows stronger with repeated hearing. The German composers have always exhibited a fondness for Scottish melodies, as witness Schumann's settings of Burns' poems, Franz's use of the same material, Beethoven's arrangements and harmonizations of Scotch folk-songs, etc., etc. But only two Teutons have become in any degree Scottish under the spell of Gaelic music; Mendelssohn first and foremost,—and Bruch a long way after. Bruch once told the present writer that he was acquainted with fully 400 Scottish folk-songs and could play most of them by heart.

This fantasy is not Bruch's only excursion into this field. He has written a cantata,—"The Fiery Cross"—on a Walter Scott subject, and he gave some beautiful and very un-Gaelic treatment of the "Campbells Are Comin'" in his dramatic cantata, "Fair Ellen."

The material in this Fantasy is drawn from three Scots' melodies and they are given with many variations and with all possible violin virtuosity. They are not disguised beyond recognition and "Scots wha Hae" is worked up to masterly climax, but greater simplicity would have done more justice to the beauty of the most wonderful folk-music on earth. In the Scherzo Bruch caught something of the Scottish lilt, even if he could not build as perfect a Scottish theme as Mendelssohn achieved in the Scherzo of his A minor symphony; but no German can ever hope to equal that.

Mr. Birnbaum was nervous. At first this showed itself in a light, spasmodic tone and in aberrations of pitch. But he grew steadily better as the work went on, and he displayed such skill in double-stopping, in harmonics, and in runs and skips, that we are sure of his being a great addition to our orchestral ranks. He was recalled again and again, and his brilliant work deserved the tribute, in spite of the few shortcomings of the earlier parts of the performance.

Dohnanyi's new symphony equals Beethoven's ninth,—in length. It is however not its equal in sustained breadth. It is intensely modern and attempts every tone-color known to man. It is complex in rhythms as well as in scoring. Its first movement has many groans of despair and its use of kettledrums and contrabass pizzicati, as well as its death-suggesting coda, reminds very strongly of the great Symphony Pathétique.

A young composer is always bound to sing of the charnel-house; it is only your gray-beard who sings glad strains nowadays.

The second movement gave great display of wind instruments, and the English horn was beautifully played, as also was the bass-clarinete. The French horn gave forth some muted tones that were the most dismal sounds imaginable,—which was what the composer intended them to be. In this movement almost everything was ejaculatory and spasmodic. It is another failing of the modern symphonist to mix up his tempi and thus illustrate in a double sense Shakespeare's line, "The times are out of joint!"

The outward procession of the audience began here. But the work grew stronger as it went on. The Scherzo (of course it was not playful) was a striking piece of tone-color and worked up to a noble climax. The intermezzo brought forth an expressive viola solo followed by one on the violin, both perfectly played. But we shall have an infinitely better viola obligata, next Saturday, when the "Childe Harold" symphony is to be given.

The finale was very striking, even upon the kettledrums. It reproduced thoughts from preceding movements, a proceeding sanctioned by Beethoven and perfected by Brahms in his C minor symphony. There was a remarkable fugue in the finale. Most composers content themselves with a fugato, a fugal exposition alone, but not so our young Hungarian; he works out his subject and countersubject ("ganz regelrecht") and seems loth to leave his contrapuntal development.

A young man who has such skill in orchestration, such contrapuntal knowledge, such general power, may yet grow very great. At present one must say that the numerous ideas presented are not well digested or assimilated; the material is there, but it is not yet brought into unity or homogeneity. Nevertheless this is not a symphony to fall asleep over. It presents too much of originality and too many strong ideas, not to speak of the numerous heavy explosions that interrupt tranquil slumber.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Seats in AA-Centre; very desirable and reasonable. Address O.B.J., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): n 11

SYMPHONY TICKET

Single seat—evening—Left Upper Balcony, $10.00. Address J.W.C., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

M 13, 14, 15, $50 each. JJ 28, 29, 30, 31, $25 each. MISS LOCKE, Box 140, Boston. 2t(A): o 14

UNKNOWN SYMPHONY ON SIXTH PROGRAM

Bruch's Scotch Fantasy Will Also Be Played.

Mr. Gericke's sixth program is short enough to look at it, but it is likely to be pretty protracted in the hearing. It will begin with a substantial overture, viz.: that one of the several prepared by Beethoven for his opera, "Fidelio," which bears that name.

Then Bruch's rather long, but often energetic and enlivening "Scotch" fantasia, which is not without its lighter, breezier and brighter phases, will be played, serving for the introduction of the plum-faced and bushy-haired new violinist, Mr. A. Birnbaum, who has been put into the vacancy made by the regretted withdrawal of Mr. Loeffler.

Finally a long hour (and possibly more) will be wanted for the first Boston performance of a symphony in D minor, extending to no less than five movements, composed by Mr. Dohnanyi, who made a favorable impression here as a pianist a few seasons ago. This symphony has been played in Germany, but no accounts about it have come that are calculated to make one quite palpitate with anticipatory interest.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.
The program for the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra, and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, the latter selection played for the first time in America. Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists of the orchestra, appeared as soloist. The familiar "Fidelio" overture was played in the usual vein, Mr. Gericke's sympathetic reading being splendidly illustrated by his men. The selection was received with due appreciation and probably gave as genuine pleasure to the auditors as one movement on the program.

The Bruch fantasia on Scottish folk-melodies introduced Mr. Birnbaum as a soloist for the first time in this country, and the debut should prove satisfactory to the young artist for he was most favorably received. The long composition does not abound in brilliant work for the solo instrument and so does not appeal very strongly to the "popular" taste, but the value of the work is highly appreciated by musicians and it is found in the repertoire of all prominent violinists. Mr. Birnbaum's interpretation was excellent throughout, the strongly marked rhythms of the opening and closing movements being given with broad and resonant effect, the cantabile playing in the second part was generally of good quality, the variations in the second movement were executed with commendable facility and the alternating passages of the third movement went smoothly, although there were some faulty intonations in the rapid figurations. Mr. Birnbaum is evidently an earnest man and conscientious in his work. He has a good tone, possibly better in the lower than in the upper register, and his finger work and bowing shows him to be well equipped in his chosen profession.

The Dohnanyi symphony is very long, there are five movements, and in each one the intricate themes are so interwoven, developed and divided among the different orchestral contingents that to the general concert patron the work sounds abstruse and somewhat uninteresting. Dohnanyi has utilized the resources of the modern orchestra to the fullest extent, some of his combinations are really weird in effect, and to every group of instruments he has given work to do which tests the abilities of the players in no usual way, even in this age of writing melodic difficulties.

A single hearing is not sufficient in forming an opinion as to the importance of the symphony, and so a general commendation for the performance must suffice. The wind instruments were prominent in their harmonious work in groups, many of the themes being played in excellent tone, but there were some rough movements in the full orchestra measures, and the heavier instruments appear frequently to lag behind Mr. Gericke's beat. The third movement showed the violins to be in their usual form in the precision and beauty of tone, the next movement was admirably given by the heavier contingent, and the triumphant finale at the close was all that could be expected. In this part, too, the variations and contrasting themes were splendidly played by all. That the symphony is skilfully constructed there is no doubt, though in the main it appears not to be destined to give satisfaction to any but musical experts.

Mme. Melba will be this week's soloist. The program will include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Tchaikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode" (a posthumous work) and the "Child Harold" symphony by Berlioz. Melba will sing an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and Onhelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra
At the sixth Symphony concert Mr. Rudolf Krasselt made his first appearance here as a soloist. This was the programme: Mendelssohn: Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream." Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor, op. 33. Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal." Dvorak: Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 76.

While the programme was of considerable interest and its performance was unusually brilliant, curiosity was, none the less, aroused chiefly by the opportunity to hear Mr. Krasselt play for the first time. This very young artist won a well-deserved success, for, in so far as a non-celloist can judge, his playing was beautiful in the extreme. Mr. Krasselt produces a tone of delightful sweetness, he phrases with exceedingly fine taste, he overcomes technical difficulties with ease, making bravura passages sound not in the least disagreeable, a great feat for a 'cello player; he plays with authority and, although the Saint-Saëns concerto allows scope for little more than a display of virtuosity and of elegance, with warmth of feeling. Since in spite of his youth, Mr. Krasselt has already gained a varied orchestral experience, our orchestra is to be congratulated on securing the services of a musician of such notable talent. Saturday night his success was great.

The most important, if not the most agreeable, feature of this concert was the production of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ideals," which, while not new here, is still very little known. The inspiration for this composition Liszt drew from Schiller's poem, "Ideale." And yet, it would seem, the musician could not have fallen very powerfully under the influence of the poet, since he chose to amend his version of the poem in distinct contradiction to the spirit and letter of the original. For Schiller, in beautiful verse, depicts the sensations of a poet from whom love and all the joy of living disappear, leaving as comforters only friendship and that supreme consoler, work. Liszt, on the other hand, not holding with the ruthless destruction of ideals, at the end of his orchestral poem gathers them all together in a glowing "Apotheosis." In considering this composition, therefore, Schiller may be disregarded, the question being, has Liszt himself produced something of worth and beauty?

He has, at all events, produced a work that, from its freedom of form, its beauty and expressiveness of orchestration, and its emotional content, might more easily have been written today than in 1856. Exquisitely beautiful, however, as many passages of this tone-poem are, it is so inordinately long and tries to express so much that at the end a listener is chiefly conscious of relief. Its performance Saturday was brilliant and sympathetic, but if Mr. Gericke had made far more sweeping cuts than he did they would all have been to the advantage of a work that then might have made as great an impression as did the composer's "Festklänge" or the wonderful "Todtentanz." In these days, when the work of Richard Strauss and his kind is or ought to be most in evidence, we cannot hear too many of Liszt's orchestral pieces, if only to see how much of it has been done and how well fifty years before.

This evening of great playing began with a brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which was being performed at the very same moment at the Hollis Street Theatre, and ended with an equally fine reading of Dvorak's charming D minor symphony—charming, at least, for three movements, when it suddenly turns sinister, baleful.

Another newcomer will be the soloist this week, Mr. A. Birnbaum. This will be the programme: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Max Bruch, Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra; Dohnanyi, Symphony in D minor (first time). R. R. G.

NEW SYMPHONY BY DOHNANYI

It Proves Itself to Be Long, Independent and Very Agreeable.

VIOLINIST MAKES DEBUT

Mr. Birnbaum Is a New Resident Performer of More Than Ordinary Ability.

The symphony in D minor, composed by Ernst von Dohnanyi, who appeared in Boston as a pianist, producing also a concerto, quintet and other things of his own during the season of 1900, was the novelty of the sixth Symphony program, at the end of which it was placed. This symphony was written not long ago, and its first performance was at Budapest in January last, followed in October by one at Berlin under Weingartner. Not much beyond these bare facts has been heard about it, and it was awaited with little anxious expectation—indeed, there seemed to be little curiosity in regard to it anyway. It had a fair and fine exposition; it was listened to with complementarily close attention; it gratified at times, and left upon the whole a generally favorable impression, deepened to cordial liking at times.

Somewhat Confused.

Yet this impression was somewhat confused, and an early second hearing would be necessary to the formation of a judicial opinion. Dohnanyi, who is credited with an almost too early disposition toward composition, which was sensibly directed to such study and professional practise as should precede it, appears here to be independent, resourceful, gifted, generous and even lavish in the use of his talents and means, hurrying on at times in almost reckless fashion, as if leaving results to take care of themselves.

This symphony is long, requiring more than an hour in performance, and its five movements are arranged in an original way. It has at first an allegro non troppo in the nominal key, the strong initial theme of which has a gentler response in the major, followed by a long tranquil subject in B minor. Out of these the movement is chiefly created, with smaller matters in plenty to fill the development, which rises to a stormy climax or two before its gradual "dying fall" through a quaint and somber figure.

The second movement, which might be called either rhapsody or romance, opens with a long and deeply sentimental adagio for English horn, which reappears later, but always with warm emotional coloring, in various solo voicings, and finally ends where it began, in the English horn. There is full charm in the theme, and many brilliant coruscations flash through the development; yet the movement seems prolix.

The third movement is a scherzo, the upward rushing presto of whose announcement suggests the entrance at a rough canter of a horseman climbing an opposing acclivity. The trio in D flat, departing from the fundamental F of the movement, is dignified and churchly; yet the coda is smartened up for new gaiety by the glockenspiel, cymbals and the percussion in general. The contrast made by the trio of antipodal, yet it is so unexpected as to pique and please.

Fourth Movement.

The reasonably short fourth movement is an intermezzo in B major, built upon a lovely song by the viola, which was beautifully played. The finale, returning molto costenuto to D minor, begins sedately, heavily emphasized by the drums, and soon presents for free variation a serious theme, which is followed by another large one, which is wrought into an elaborate, bold and vehement fugue, the first chorale-like announcement, speedily turning to a thoroughly exciting climax, which reminds one of the "Racoczy" march in spirit and speed.

As may be guessed, here are subject matter and orchestral treatment for many moods and many minds. One may well question whether all these things were deliberately meant to be associated and why, or whether they were seized half at random from a full storehouse and cast together fitfully. It is plain that Dohnanyi has the melodic gift. His themes are almost multitude, and for the most part they are not put out in fragmentary phrases, but in long, symmetrical themes, that give the work almost the character of a fantasia.

Decided Intention.

Their treatment shows a decided intention and a firm, resolute hand, which can also hold softly and kindly. The instrumentation is knowing and progressive, calling for ample provision (including two harps, of which only one was to be had,) and using it without reserve. Some mannerisms in color appear, such as a fondness for muted horns, for trumpet obligatos and a use of the brass and lower wood-wind in a grim and harsh way that suggests the moods of Siegfried's dragon.

There are also several queer, eerie and ghostly colorings, which seem irrelevantly laid on, that would properly tone a "danse macabre." Yet the tenderer themes are poetic and have power to charm, and the music may well be understood as coming from a Hungarian heart and head inspired by the impetuous and erratic national genius.

Besides the new music, there was to be heard a new musician, Alexander Z. Birnbaum, who joins the first violins this season. He chose Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia, which does not use its highland quotations as subjects for formal development, but rather as suggestions toward the direction and sentiment of the poetic moods he desires to invoke and to connect only indirectly with auld Scotia. He takes them for promptings, not for propositions.

New Violinist.

Although virtuosos have adopted it, it is not properly a show piece; for, although it needs a ready and complete technique, it is rather a reflective and sensitive music. Mr. Birnbaum, who had the usual stranger's reception, kindly but cool, played it sympathetically. His execution is light, clean and deft, his tone genial and warm, and his playing was thoughtful, delicate and refined, with an intimation of reserved strength against a time of need. He grew in favor as he went on, was promptly and heartily applauded after the first and third movements, and several times recalled at the end.

The only other number was Beethoven's "Fidello" overture, which began the evening.

The next concert will be a Melba night, for that artist will sing a scene from "Hamlet" and the air (probably) from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," which was looked for from Mme. Gadske.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Symphony in D Minor by Dohnanyi Is Played.

Harold — Nov. 29, 1903.
Its First Performance in United States and It Was First Given in Budapest Last January — Has Length Rather Than Breadth — Mr. Birnbaum Soloist.

The programme of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidello".....Beethoven
Fantasia on Scottish airs for violin.....Bruch
Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in this country.)

Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor was not his first. When he was 19 years old—he was born in 1877—he wrote a symphony in F which took a prize offered by the "King of Hungary" for the best work by Hungarian composers. This symphony was performed at Budapest, but we know of no other performance. The Symphony in D minor was performed for the first time at Budapest on Jan. 7, 1903, and since then it has been played at Vienna and Berlin.

The composer has been eminently serious from his youth up. His father, a professor of mathematics and physics at Pressburg, found amusement in playing the cello, an instrument favored by many physicians, possibly because, as Walt Whitman said: "It is the voice of the young man's complaint." The father was unwilling to exploit the boy, who, they say, "showed unmistakable musical instincts before he was 3 years old," but it is well to remember that there are legends as well as vampires in Hungary. The boy began to compose, at least to scrawl notes on music paper, when he was 7 years old, and a little later he wrote pieces for violin and piano, which were correct in harmony and form; so says the passionate biographer. When Ernst was 12 years old he wrote cello sonatas, string quartets and other chamber music, and when he was 13 he played a piano quartet by Brahms in public, which Messrs. Runciman and Blackburn would characterize as a depraved proceeding.

Ernst became an ardent admirer of Brahms and went to work to write a Brahmsian piano quartet and string sextet. And then his father thought the boy should enter the university and study philosophy—so that he might enter more fully into the spirit of Brahms. The boy, like Hercules, was wooed then by Virtue and Vice; he decided to be a musician; he left the University of Budapest to study the more zealously composition under one Hans Koessler, who is known in Boston as the composer of a singularly lugubrious, pedantic and dull set of "Symphonic Variations," in memory of Johannes Brahms (played here in 1902), variations which were intended to portray Brahms mentally, physically, and socially. And at last Brahms himself became interested in Dohnanyi.

Dohnanyi has visited Boston as a pianist and a composer, and he was then eminently serious, a pianist to be respected even when his playing was massive and concrete rather than sympathetic and emotional.

It will thus be seen that heredity, nationality, early surroundings and the influence of Brahms have all entered into the mind of this composer, and the symphony in D minor may perhaps be the more easily explained. The work is a curious mixture of severe thought and of vague wandering; of precise and carefully considered expression and of rhapsodic utterance; of the dryness of one delighting in squares, cubes, powers and logarithms, and of the quasi-barbaric joy in striking rhythm, jingle and color.

Like an election torch-procession, the symphony is a good hour in passing a certain point. It is long and thick rather than broad and deep.

The themes for the most part are not distinguished, and the chief interest is in the contrapuntal treatment and in the grouping of tonal masses. It is only fair to add that the themes are not always favorably announced. Take the song theme, for instance, of the first movement; on its first appearance it is almost smothered by the drab orchestration; there is no contrast, there is no background; the whole is a blur. Yet this theme when it appears afterward has a certain suavity and grace, although it is neither individual nor striking.

The second movement is largely rhapsodic, yet here the composer is not wholly successful in establishing the appropriate mood. He at times appears as though he were a denationalized Hungarian trying to escape from the old traditions and yet irresistibly drawn back to them. There are frequent hints at melodic and rhythmic desire for the fatherland; there are the cadenzas that would fain remind the hearer of the Zimbalon, but the movement, in spite of occasionally free episodes, gives one the feeling of the composer's self-imposed restraint, of a substitution of that which has been inculcated and acquired for that which was natural and spontaneous.

But it is not necessary to speak of each movement—and there are five of them. It may be said that the scherzo in spite of its glitter and jingle is barren of ideas, and any young composer who for the finale of such a long work chooses the form of theme and variations and fugue surely can have no sense of humor. And so we come back to the original proposition: Mr. Dohnanyi is an eminently serious person. He has studied, he has mastered many things in his calling as a composer; he is unacquainted with the value of reserve, of reticence. He has so much to say, and yet so much is hardly worth saying, and so much of this is said perfunctorily. It would be vain to deny the charm of a little oasis here and there, just as it would be absurd to deny the mechanical talent of the composer. But there is no lofty flight of imagination, there is no continuous line of beauty, there are no great native moments. The emotional quality is slight, and the austerity is dry, not noble. The passion is that of the pedagogue who is excited in the solving of a problem. A crude and even coarse burst of genuine feeling would be welcome as a present delight and a promise for the future.

Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. Mr. Birnbaum was born in the fair land of Poland, which, as Thaddeus in Balfe's opera assures us, was once "ploughed by the hoof of the ruthless invader with might." The seed then sown produced a crop of violinists and pianists. But Mr. Birnbaum has not the qualities we associate with a Polish or a Russian virtuoso. He played Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, which is always interesting, for it affords an opportunity of guessing at the names of the tunes which Bruch has twisted for his purpose. Yet this same piece also gives op-activity for a display of the virtuoso's art. The performance of Mr. Birnbaum cannot be highly praised; indeed it was generally mediocre and occasionally worse than that. His tone was thin, and, without any discussion of his mechanism, it may be said that his interpretation had little diversity of expression and was too often spineless. He was heartily applauded. The overture to "Fidelio" was finely played, and Mr. Gericke took infinite pains with the performance of the symphony.

92

Mme. MELBA

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	ACADEMIC OVERTURE, op. 80.
MOZART,	ARIA, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito." (Clarinet obbligato by Mr. VICTOR LEBAILLY.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	ORCHESTRAL BALLAD, "Le Voyvode," op. 78. (posthumous.) (First time at these Concerts.)
A. THOMAS,	OPHELIA'S MAD-SCENE from "Hamlet."
BERLIOZ,	SYMPHONY in four movements, with VIOLA SOLO, op. 16. "Harold in Italy." I. HAROLD IN THE MOUNTAINS: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy, Adagio. Allegro. II. MARCH OF PILGRIMS SINGING THEIR EVENING HYMN. Allegretto. III. SERENADE OF A MOUNTAINEER OF THE ABRUZZI TO HIS MISTRESS. Allegro assai. Allegretto. IV. ORGY OF BRIGANDS: Recollections of preceding scenes. Allegro frenetico. (Viola Solo by Mr. A. FERIR.)

Soloist:

MADAME MELBA.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

portunity for a display of the virtuoso's art. The performance of Mr. Birnbaum cannot be highly praised; indeed it was generally mediocre and occasionally worse than that. His tone was thin, and, without any discussion of his mechanism, it may be said that his interpretation had little diversity of expression and was too often spineless. He was heartily applauded.

The overture to "Fidelio" was finely played, and Mr. Gericke took infinite pains with the performance of the symphony.

Mme. MELBA

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	ACADEMIC OVERTURE, op. 80.
MOZART,	ARIA, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito." (Clarinet obbligato by Mr. VICTOR LEBAILLY.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	ORCHESTRAL BALLAD, "Le Voyvode," op. 78. (posthumous.) (First time at these Concerts.)
A. THOMAS,	OPHELIA'S MAD-SCENE from "Hamlet."
BERLIOZ,	SYMPHONY in four movements, with VIOLA SOLO, op. 16. "Harold in Italy." I. HAROLD IN THE MOUNTAINS: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy, Adagio. Allegro. II. MARCH OF PILGRIMS SINGING THEIR EVENING HYMN. Allegretto. III. SERENADE OF A MOUNTAINEER OF THE ABRUZZI TO HIS MISTRESS. Allegro assai. Allegretto. IV. ORGY OF BRIGANDS: Recollections of preceding scenes. Allegro frenetico. (Viola Solo by Mr. A. FERIR.)

Soloist:

MADAME MELBA.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first disappointment of the Symphony season was caused by the inability of Mme Melba to sing, as had been announced, at the seventh rehearsal and concert. She was not seriously ill, but took the precaution of not increasing a slight cold. She will appear later in the season, postponing her departure for Europe so as to fulfil her engagements here. There were no numbers substituted for Melba's solos and the program comprised the Brahms "Academic" overture, Tschaiikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode," and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," the viola part being played by Mr A. Fevir, a new member of the orchestra.

The delightfully jolly "Academic" overture is always a welcome number, for Brahms has caught the "student" spirit so cleverly and expressed universality "life" so vividly that the potpourri may well be considered a classic in its special field. The orchestra played in a manner which quickly dispelled the feelings of disappointment aroused by the absence of Mme Melba and the comical bassoon and cello passages put every one in good humor almost immediately. The overture has been given here so many times that the performance needs only commendation in general terms and not in detail, for Mr Gerlicke's men entered into the spirit of the work most heartily and played the piece with a verve and sympathy which evoked the heartiest applause from the auditors.

Tschaiikowsky's gloomy ballad "The Voyvode," tells a tragic story in an effective way. Splendidly orchestrated, with characteristically harsh progressions, lightened for a brief interval by delicate love passages on the harp and violins and closing with a musical tumult, the work is very impressive. The interpretation was thoroughly good, the harp playing by Mr Schuecker being particularly enjoyable, and the fortissimo work by the whole force was as vigorous as one cares to hear. The ballad was played for the first time at these concerts.

The beautiful descriptive symphony by Berlioz went admirably. Mr Fevir played the viola part with skill, his intonation being very sweet throughout the varying arrangements of the Harold theme. In the "Pilgrims' March" the elusive changes in key and contrasting subjects of the movement showed the perfection of divided ensemble work by the orchestra. The quaint measures of the serenade of the mountaineer were deliciously sung by the woodwinds in the third part of the symphony, and the closing movement, with its groans, lamentations and other boisterous moments, received the necessary setting forth by the bass instruments. This last part was really diabolical in its suggestiveness of an orgy.

The next concerts will be given Dec 18 and 19, with Miss Maud MacCarthy as soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto. The orchestra selections will be Haydn's ninth symphony, Prof J. K. Paine's ballet music from the opera, "Azara," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. Gluba

The management regrets to announce that Madame Melba is unable to sing this week, owing to a slight cold.

To avoid disappointing the Symphony audiences, Madame Melba will postpone her departure for Europe, and will positively sing in later concerts.

MME. MELBA WILL ADD TO SYMPHONY

She Is Down on Program for Two Numbers, One a Mozart, the Other in "Hamlet."

BOTH OFFER OPPORTUNITIES

Prima Donna's Appearance Will Enhance Public Interest in Week's Concerts.

The Symphony program of this week will derive eclat and attractiveness from the participation in it of Mme. Melba, whose appearance on Wednesday evening was calculated to enhance the interest with which her present engagement has been anticipated. She will sing two important scenes, one from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," and the other the "mad" scene of Ophelia from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas, these offering opportunities for "bel canto," coloratura and dramatic expression.

There will be for the orchestra one work as yet unknown to Boston in Tschalkowsky's symphonic ballad, "Le Voyvode." This is intended to illustrate Pushkin's tragically romantic poem of that name, of which the story is easily recalled. A Russian prince, desperately jealous of his wife, has reason to believe that she is abroad in the castle grounds with the lover whom she has been forced to resign for her husband.

The voyvode plans with a vassal to discover and kill them both, each taking one victim, the serf shooting the lover, while himself follows with the death of the princess. But the serf is so touched by what he overhears of the sorrowful, compulsory life of the princess, that when the order to fire is given him, he slays his master and sets the lovers free.

The overture will be the "Academic" of Brahms, and the symphony—this being a Berlioz commemoration week—will be the "Harold in Italy" of that master.

MELBA'S ABSENCE IS DISAPPOINTING

Slight Cold Keeps Her From Taking Part in the Symphony Program.

NEW TSCHAIKOWSKY BALLAD

Its Rendition Was Tender and Expressive, and Author's Genius Shines Throughtout.

Journal Dec. 6, 1903

There was an element of humor blended with the general disappointment because "a slight cold" had impressed Mme. Melba that she could not do justice to herself, her music or her audiences by retaining her place in the seventh Symphony program yesterday at Symphony Hall. An opportunity that was largely availed of was offered to two regretful women for asking of their friends, "Was it not knowing you, dear, that gave Melba the chill which prevents her singing for us?"

However, while sparing herself now, Mme. Melba did her best to make up for any temporary loss by promising to postpone her departure for Europe long enough to take part in a later concert.

The withdrawal of the vocal numbers left the audience free to turn its chief attention to the tragically romantic Tschalkowsky ballad, "The Voyvode," presented for its first real hearing, Sousa's previous brass band performance counting only as a perverted transcription. The composition, suggested by the poetic legend of Mickiewicz, is illuminating, powerful and impressive. But it is illustrative of moods, and wastes no time or effort on attempted picturesqueness of detail.

It begins, to be sure, with the continuous flight of horses' feet, and there is a crash just at the close. But more potential is the gloomy mood which envelops this figure and stirs the imagination to think of a somber, bitter, determined, implacable man forcing his hurried course through a nocturnal environment as cold, black, resolute and harsh as his own spirit.

Tender and Beautiful.

The episode of the lovers whose confidence is watched and seized is enriched with tender and beautiful passionateness, as delicate as it is deep, and as sadly as softly expressed. Just before the fatal shot is heard the original sense, temper and manner sweep down again, perhaps implying the fatal fixity of the voyvode's purpose, unswayed by the tale of hopeless and guiltless love that he has overheard or by the timid, trembling protests of his pitiful vassal. The story is one to arouse Tschalkowsky's sympathy for the pathetic and ill-fated, and his genius shines in it, although he is said to have undervalued and scorned his music. It may have seemed mean to him, as being less than the opera he desired to write upon the story; but its preservation was fortunate.

Symphony Well Rendered.

The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which has often been played in Boston, and always heard with delight. It depends much, as the reader will remember, upon the viola obbligato that appears in the various movements and is apparently intended to represent not the set disposition of an individual holding aloof from what he witnesses, but rather the changeable attitude and mood of what Young Marlow calls "an observer upon life," who retains his individuality, but allows his feeling and expression to be molded as the episodes about him succeed each other.

The symphony was well read throughout and Mr. Ferir was much approved for his assumption of the solo viola part, which he played with sweet tone and sensitive phrasing, if with less volume and more reserve than was Mr. Kniesel's wont. But Harold was a dreamer, rather than a man of action, and there is no esthetic inconsistency if his representative withdraws toward the background sometimes and comments meditatively. A well colored, animated performance of Brahms' "Academic" overture was the first thing.

A fortnight hence the program is intended to contain the "Tannhauser" overture, a Haydn symphony, the ballet music from Paine's opera, "Azara," and the Brahms violin concerto, with Miss Maud MacCarthy for the soloist.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Orchestral Ballad by Tschalkowsky the Novelty.

Herald — Dec. 6, 1903.
Mr. Gericke's Effort to Celebrate the Centenary of Berlioz Comes to Naught—Mme. Melba Has a Cold and Is Unable to Sing—Berlioz Symphony Is Played.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Academic overture.....Brahms
"The Voyvode," orchestral ballad.....Tschalkowsky
(First time at these concerts.)

Wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
"Harold in Italy," symphony.....Berlioz

Mr. Gericke had bad luck with the programme of this concert. The programme, as originally planned, was in commemoration of the centenary of Berlioz, which could not be celebrated on Dec. 11—the birthday of Berlioz (1803)—for this week the orchestra will be giving concerts out of town. The original programme included the Symphony performed last night, the overture to "King Lear" and orchestral excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." For certain reasons beyond his control, Mr. Gericke was obliged to change the programme, and therefore the centenary of the birth of the great Frenchman, the creator of modern orchestration, the creator who has not been surpassed by any of his disciples or imitators, will not be celebrated at these concerts, in which his name has been honored since the beginning. It is interesting to note in connection with this the Berlioz anniversary programme prepared by Theodore Thomas for the concerts of the Chicago orchestra Dec. 11-12.

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; recitative and aria from "Les Troyens" (Miss Marguerite Hall); symphonie fantastique; ball scene and love scene from "Romeo and Juliet"; invocation, minuet, "Dance of the Sylphs"; romance, "My Heart with Grief Is Heavy" (Miss Hall); Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

And then Mme. Melba took cold and was unable to sing the airs from "La Clemenza di Tito" and "Hamlet" to the keen disappointment of all, and not merely those who go to Symphony concerts for the sake of the soloists, male and female after their kind. The justly celebrated climate of Boston delights in sport with golden-voiced sopranos. Mme. Melba, however, will delay her departure and sing later at a Symphony concert.

The concert, then, was purely orchestral: The symphony by Berlioz remained; there was the Academic overture of Brahms, in which the composer was less academic than was his wont; "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad by Tschalkowsky, which was produced here in the form of a transcription for brass band at a Sousa concert, Dec. 9, 1902; and the Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," which was introduced unexpectedly in honor of the day, which was to Maj. Henry L. Higginson a wedding anniversary.

It is said that Tschalkowsky was so disgusted with his ballad "The Voyvode," when it was rehearsed or first performed under his direction at Moscow in 1891, that he pronounced it rubbish and tore up the score; and that Alexander Siloti, his pupil, saved the orchestral parts, and after the death of Tschalkowsky put together the score, which was published in 1897. What injury these fanatical admirers, these rummagers in waste baskets and pigeonholes, these editors of "hitherto unpublished" essays, letters, romances, music, do to established reputations! There is a long line of victims, sufferers from indiscriminate enthusiasm. Within a few years Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Rossetti, Carlyle, De Maupassant have thus been injured cruelly.

Tschalkowsky was often dissatisfied with his public works, and what man of genius does not at times loathe the very sight of the children of his brain? They are so inferior to what he would have them; they limp, they bear a hump, they stammer, they squint; yet in the eyes of the world they are fair to look upon or they are heroic figures. When Tschalkowsky destroyed the ballad, it was not through caprice, nor did he secretly hope for a saviour. He knew that the ballad was on the whole unworthy of him. The best of this music is merely pictorial and the pictures are not of large dimensions, nor are they framed for all time. They are startling, as well as a few beautiful, orchestral effects, for it was hard for Tschalkowsky writing for an orchestra to be persistently commonplace; but the love music in the garden is sentimental rather than passionate, and the sentiment has no true distinction. The man that imagined the love music of "Romeo and Juliet," that composed certain songs as well as love themes in orchestral works, was right in refusing life to "The Voyvode." The poem of Mickiewicz even in a doubly strained translation is far more romantic and impressive than the music suggested, but not inspired.

Perhaps "Harold in Italy" was originally chosen for the Berlioz anniversary as a means of introducing Mr. Ferir, the new viola player. He displayed a rich and beautiful tone and he played with taste. The work itself is curiously characteristic of Berlioz, but it is inferior in imaginative force and intensity of musical grip to either the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony or the "Symphonie Fantastique." Yet, it is a marvellous composition when we remember the year that gave it birth. "Harold in Italy" is 69 years old. Wagner in 1834 was uniting his opera, "Das Liebesverbot," at Magdeburg; Verdi had not written his first opera; Schumann at the age of 24 was founding his music journal; Tschalkowsky was not born; Brahms was a year old. For its time, Berlioz's symphony was a marvel of orchestral imagination, and imagination, as Jacob Boehme says, is the first emanation of the divinity.

This is a gross and material age and it is hard for us to realize the sincerity of the old-fashioned romanticists. It is hard for us to understand the once enormous popularity of "Childe Harold." Who reads the poem today? Yet it entered into the thought of Europe; certain phrases, lines are a part of the English language wherever it is spoken; and, without reference to the descriptive force shown by the poet, it may be said without fear of contradiction that "Childe Harold" contains the noblest apostrophe to liberty to be found in the whole range of English literature. It would be as impossible today to compose the symphony as it would be to write the poem.

Gone are those days of revolt against tyranny in thought as well as in government, the revolt that idolized the disorderly, turned pirates, cutthroats, as well as all defiers of conventionality into heroes, the revolt which might have been amusing had it not been so bitterly honest. Berlioz, delighted in the horrors of romanticism as he would have found supreme joy in the splendid extravagance and madness of Marlowe, Tourneur and other raging Elizabethans, in the tragic intensity of John Webster's Italian villains and lawless women had he been able to read the plays. And he thought romantically of romantic subjects. It is as though he wrote "Harold in Italy," in a long cloak and a bandit's hat, with a dagger dipped in red ink. The melancholy wanderer over the mountains, the muttering pilgrims, the mountaineer with his serenade, the orgy of brigands—these were all as real to him as the strollers and scenes on the boulevard. And this music should be played in this wild, fantastic spirit, otherwise it is impossible. This is no symphony for the lecturer and the analyst and the learned professor in front of the blackboard.

Regarded as a symphony with themes and development and sections and codas, it is impossible. When the music is bizarre or ugly the interpretation should bring out these qualities; they should not be softened for genteel ears. Let the composer fume and rave or wax sentimental and melancholy; let him be fantastical. Otherwise we are reminded of the fact that there once lived a man with wild ideas and a singular faculty for instrumentation; for we all are inclined to forget that the truly great, the men who have done mighty deeds, have been suspected of madness by the eminently respectable and by those at the time successful and envied.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Melba Will Sing Two Selections and the Orchestra Will Play Some Noteworthy Compositions This Week.

Mme. Melba will sing at the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon. Her selections are the aria, "Parto, parto," with clarinet obbligato, from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," which was sung at a Symphony concert by Rosa Olitzka some years ago, and Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet," which has been sung here by several, among them Christine Nilsson, Clara Louise Kellogg, Sembrich, Calve and Melba herself, who have shone in the air while lesser lights have twinkled. Sembrich created the part of Ophelia in the opera itself, so far as Boston is concerned. The opera has never been popular in this country. Yet the last scene is entertaining, for Hamlet is crowned king; Laertes and Polonius, very much alive, cheer, and Gertrude talks of going to a nunnery.

The orchestral pieces will be Brahms' "Academic" overture, with its introduction of German student songs; Tchaikowsky's "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad (first time) and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo by Mr. Ferir.

Sousa produced a transcription of "The Voyvode" at a concert in Tremont Temple last season. The piece is a posthumous work, and there is a story that when it was first played at Moscow, in 1891, the composer did not like it, swore at was rubbish, and tore up the score; but Siloti, the pianist, saved the parts and reconstructed the score after Tchaikowsky was dead and could not object. The ballad, which was played at New York and Chicago in 1897, has nothing to do with the plot of Tchaikowsky's first opera, "The Voyvode," which he also destroyed. The story, a grim one, is a poem by a Polish poet. "Voyvode" is a general, a commander, or the governor of a province. In this poem the Voyvode suspects his wife's fidelity and surprises her in a garden at night with a young man who, reproaching her, is about to leave her forever. The Voyvode orders his valet to shoot the woman while he will attend to the lover. The servant's hand trembles—is he in sympathy with the pair?—his aim is not sure, and the bullet pierces the forehead of the Voyvode.

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the eighth concert will include Haydn's symphony, No. 9, in C minor, Paine's ballet music to "Azara" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Miss Maud MacCarthy will play Brahms' violin concerto. She played it last season.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventh Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was an occasion of surprises, little happening as had been planned. Mme. Melba being suddenly "indisposed," there was no soloist, and the programme finally stood thus:

Brahms: Academic Overture, Op. 80. Tchaikowsky: Orchestral Ballad, "Le Voyvode," Op. 78. (Posthumous.) (First time at these concerts.) Berlioz: Symphony in four movements, with Viola Solo, Op. 16. "Harold in Italy." (Viola solo by Mr. A. Ferir.)

The Brahms Academic Overture, which we now hear with perhaps undue frequency, went brilliantly, as did the posthumous ballad by Tchaikowsky, "Le Voyvode." With this work, the story runs, its composer was so ill-content that he forbade its performance, even going to the length of tearing the score in bits. His devotee Siloti, however, retained the orchestral parts of the ballad, thereby making possible public hearings of a composition its creator did not deem worthy of a single production; a striking instance of "save me from my friends." Tchaikowsky, after all, was the best judge of his own genius, and, if the man desired an inferior work of his to be destroyed, it seems irreverent not to respect his wishes. The ballad, of course, like everything Tchaikowsky wrote for orchestra, is interesting from its skilful instrumentation, but, in admiration of its intrinsic musical worth, little can be said. A performance of the ballad may well be left to Sousa and his band.

After the Russian piece, people began to bustle about for the intermission. It appearing directly, however, that there would be no pause, the listeners settled themselves once more, for the Berlioz Symphony, when, to their astonishment, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" began. Then came the intermission, when it was murmured that the march was played in honor of Major and Mrs. Higginson's wedding anniversary.

The one hundredth anniversary of Berlioz's birth was celebrated by a performance of the great French composer's symphony "Harold in Italy," a work that likewise served the purpose of affording Mr. A. Ferir, the new viola-player, an opportunity to show his skill here. This the artist did successfully, displaying a very beautiful tone and fine musical taste. The symphony itself, written under the inspiration of Lord Byron's "Childe Harold," is, like Victor Hugo's dramas, of an order of genius that now seems to us extravagant and romantic to the pitch of absurdity. Works of this kind can be effectively performed only by the French, and, furthermore, by those Frenchmen only who have been brought up and trained in the traditions governing the interpretation of such works, till they are quite at home and at their ease in their old-time and peculiar garb and mode of speech. To twentieth century Americans, artistic products of this romantic period, musical, poetic, or dramatic, appear too unreal to prove moving. No listener, however, could fail to admire many pages of the symphony by Berlioz who, the writer of "The Art of Instrumentation," well knew how to put his theories into practice; Berlioz the poet was constantly in evidence.

There will be no symphony concert this week. At the next concert, Miss Maud MacCarthy is to play, and this will be the programme: Haydn, Symphony No. 9, in C minor; Brahms, Concerto for Violin; Paine, Ballet Music from "Azara"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhaeuser." R. R. G.

et Station. MANCH tall. BRISTOL—Railway
ON-TYNE—Central Station
letoria and Midland Station ary, 75 Champs Elysées; the Fatherland, éra; H. Gautier, 11 Rue World that his apuelnes; 3 Avenue Vieto piano, by Huss,

t is a procedure

37 Leipzigerstrasse; Alha to state that it —Railway Bookstall. MUMr. Gericke that Seasons Hotel). DRESDE defiled with an zehe, Buchhandlung, Rail of the obstinacy

umpff, Jr., Muszlekhanderlist. Bad taste en, Corso Vittorio Eman ne Gericke view-
he work of seri-
oulevard du Théâtre. of the Germans
and it holds that

umpff, Jr., Muszlekhanderlist. Bad taste
en, Corso Vittorio Eman ne Gericke view-
he work of seri-
oulevard du Théâtre. of the Germans
and it holds that

SUBSCRIPTIONS: and it holds that ly in advance, including ospel hymns and Single Copies, Ten Cents. DISSENTER.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Orchestral Ballad, "Le Voyvode".....Tchaikowsky
"Childe Harold" Symphony.....Berlioz

Thus far the programme; but there was a pleasant interpolation in the shape of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," played as a tribute to the wedding anniversary of the founder of the orchestra,—a very pretty surprise.

Mr. Gericke was at his very best in the first part of the concert, and at his weakest in the finale. We have never heard the "Academic Overture" so well played. It is a work that wears well, and its ingenious development of "Was kommt dort von der Hoes?" with its delightful bassoon passages, is as attractive as when it was first heard. The audience recognized the superb performance with very spontaneous applause. What a repertoire of songs the German students have! If an American composer wanted to write a college overture he would only find "Upidee," and "The Lone Fish-ball," as universal and original material, for "Billy McGee" is taken from a French sailor "santy," and "Fair Harvard" is an Irish tune, and many other university melodies are taken from foreign sources.

The "Voyvode" is a Russian general who returns from the war only to find his wife unfaithful. Planning to kill her and her lover, he is himself shot down by a servant. This work is not the true Tchaikowsky; let us forgive and forget. It has its graphic moments and Tchaikowsky is always master of his orchestra. The Voyvode comes riding home with a rush that reminds of the galloping of the Don Cossacks. Once arrived, however, he becomes rather inconsequential, and even the young lovers seem conventional in their love-making. Muted horns are a very good thing to portray evil with, but to hear them continually becomes rather tiresome, and the horn-players were called upon to play stopped tones almost continuously.

The only very original part of this work was when the bullet intended for his wife hit the Voyvode; then that official went out and growled himself to death.

"Oh God, it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing"
but it becomes doubly frightful when it wings off on trombones and bass tubas, as it did on this occasion.

Now came the interpolated Wedding March, which might have been taken (by those who did not know the compliment conveyed) to mean that after the death of the Russian functionary the young lovers were married and lived happily ever afterward.

The "Childe Harold" symphony was not the best work to celebrate the memory of the composer with; the "Symphonie Fantastique" would have been better. The once fashionable melancholy of Byron's hero has in modern days given place to a wild despair, a virtriotic pessimism. Nevertheless, it was interesting to watch the tone-color of the viola, the instrument of dreamy sadness and of brooding, and to trace Childe Harold as portrayed upon the instrument. Mr. A. Ferir played exquisitely and proved that another good artist has been added to our orchestra. The delicacy with which he gave the chief theme (as much of a guiding motive as any round in Wagner) was sufficient to arouse enthusiasm.

The second movement—the March of the Pilgrims—presents one of Berlioz's remarkable bits of tone-coloring. To produce the tone of the Cathedral bell he employs harp and horn in combination, as effective a touch as ever was made in instrumentation. The horn at first spoiled the effect by playing too loudly, but at the end made amends by perfect shading. Mr. Ferir played the passages for viola,—"sull' ponticello" (bridge tones),—charmingly.

In the third movement much praise should be given to the excellence of the English horn and also to the shading of the Harold theme upon the flute. The second and third movements were splendidly interpreted.

Not so the finale. It was not a Summer convention of the Y. M. C. A. upon the Abruzzi mountains that Berlioz intended, but a fierce orgie such as would have caused Judge Emmons to have ejected the participants from any street or railway car in his dominions. In the interpretation there was pomp and bombast rather than fury,—a set of gentlemanly and lady-like brigands out for a holiday. Nevertheless Childe Harold died among them, which made the second death in this short programme.

Melba was to have sung and did not,—because of illness. The audience, however, seemed quite contented with a purely orchestral programme, judging by the applause, which was even more pronounced than usual. Louis C. Elson.

SEEKING CONTROL OF SYMPHONY

Musical Union Has Issued
Notices to Score of the Players Affiliated with
New York Local.

TRANSFER TO UNION
IN BOSTON ORDERED

The orchestral pieces will be Brahms' "Academic" overture, with its introduction of German student songs; Tschalkowsky's "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad (first time) and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo by Mr. Ferir.

Sousa produced a transcription of "The Voyvode" at a concert in Tremont Temple last season. The piece is a posthumous work, and there is a story that when it was first played at Moscow, in 1891, the composer did not like it, swore at was rubbish, and tore up the score; but Siloti, the pianist, saved the parts and reconstructed the score after Tschalkowsky was dead and could not object. The ballad, which was played at New York and Chicago in 1897, has nothing to do with the plot of Tschalkowsky's first opera, "The Voyvode," which he also destroyed. The story, a grim one, is a poem by a Polish poet. "Voyvode" is a general, a commander, or the governor of a province. In this poem the Voyvode suspects his wife's fidelity and surprises her in a garden at night with a young man who, reproaching her, is about to leave her forever. The Voyvode orders his valet to shoot the woman while he will attend to the lover. The servant's hand trembles—is he in sympathy with the pair?—his aim is not sure, and the bullet pierces the forehead of the Voyvode.

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the eighth concert will include Haydn's symphony, No. 9, in C minor, Paine's ballet music to "Azara," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Miss Maud MacCarthy will play Brahms' violin concerto. She played it last season.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventh Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, was an occasion of surprises, little happening as had been planned. Mme. Melba being suddenly "indisposed," there was no soloist, and the programme finally stood thus:

Brahms: Academic Overture, Op. 80. Transcript
Tschalkowsky: Orchestral Ballad, "Le Voyvode," Op. 78. (Posthumous.) (First time at these concerts.)

Berlioz: Symphony in four
Viola Solo, Op. 16. "Harold" (Viola solo by Mr. A.

The Brahms Academic Overture now hear with perhaps a new went brilliantly, as did the ballad by Tschalkowsky, "Le Voyvode," this work, the story runs, is so ill-content that he forbade, even going to the length of score in bits. His devotees retained the orchestral part thereby making possible put composition its creator did of a single production; a of "save me from my friend sky, after all, was the best; genius, and, if the man do work of his to be destroy reverent not to respect his ballad, of course, like Tschalkowsky wrote for orchestra from its skilful instrumental miration of its intrinsic value can be said. A performance may well be left to Sousa.

After the Russian piece, people began to bustle about for the intermission. It appearing directly, however, that there would be no pause, the listeners settled themselves once more, for the Berlioz Symphony, when, to their astonishment, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" began. Then came the intermission, when it was murmured that the march was played in honor of Major and Mrs. Higginson's wedding anniversary.

The one hundredth anniversary of Berlioz's birth was celebrated by a performance of the great French composer's symphony "Harold in Italy," a work that likewise served the purpose of affording Mr. A. Ferir, the new viola-player, an opportunity to show his skill here. This the artist did successfully, displaying a very beautiful tone and fine musical taste. The symphony itself, written under the inspiration of Lord Byron's "Childe Harold," is, like Victor Hugo's dramas, of an order of genius that now seems to us extravagant and romantic to the pitch of absurdity. Works of this kind can be effectively performed only by the French, and, furthermore, by those Frenchmen only who have been brought up and trained in the traditions governing the interpretation of such works, till they are quite at home and at their ease in their old-time and peculiar garb and mode of speech. To twentieth century Americans, artistic products of this romantic period, musical, poetic, or dramatic, appear too unreal to prove moving. No listener, however, could fail to admire many pages of the symphony by Berlioz who, the writer of "The Art of Instrumentation," well knew how to put his theories into practice; Berlioz the poet was constantly in evidence.

There will be no symphony concert this week. At the next concert, Miss Maud MacCarthy is to play, and this will be the programme: Haydn, Symphony No. 9, in C minor; Brahms, Concerto for Violin; Paine, Ballet Music from "Azara"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhaeuser." R. R. G.

Gericke Plays an American Composition.

To the Musical Courier:

MR. GERICKE has confined himself so exclusively to the compositions which he learned in the Fatherland, before taking up his residence in the New World that his production of the Concerto in B major for piano, by Huss, at the fourth Symphony concert last night is a procedure requiring some explanation. And I hasten to state that it was not in accordance with the wishes of Mr. Gericke that his sacred and classic programs should be defiled with an American composition, but rather because of the obstinacy of Miss Aus der Ohe, the assisting piano artist. Bad taste this Miss Aus der Ohe must have, from the Gericke viewpoint; for the Gericke viewpoint regards the work of serious composition the exclusive function of the Germans and one or two other Continental races, and it holds that American creative genius is fit only for gospel hymns and ragtime.

DISSENTER.

Boston, Mass., November 15, 1903.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Orchestral Ballad, "Le Voyvode".....Tschalkowsky
"Childe Harold" Symphony.....Berlioz

Thus far the programme; but there was a pleasant interpolation in the shape of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," played as a tribute to the wedding anniversary of the founder of the orchestra,—a very pretty surprise.

Mr. Gericke was at his very best in the first part of the concert, and at his weakest in the finale. We have never heard the "Academic Overture" so well played. It is a work that wears well, and its ingenious development of "Was kommt dort von der Hoes?" with its delightful bassoon passages, is as attractive as when it was first heard. The audience recognized the superb performance with very spontaneous applause. What a repertoire of songs the German students have! If an American composer wanted to write a college overture he would only find "Upidee," and "The Lone Fish-bell," as universal and original material, for "Billy McGee" is taken from a French sailor "santy," and "Fair Harvard" is an Irish tune, and many other university melodies are taken from foreign sources.

The "Voyvode" is a Russian general who returns from the war only to find his wife unfaithful. Planning to kill her and her lover, he is himself shot down by a servant. This work is not the true Tschalkowsky; let us forgive and forget. It has its graphic moments and Tschalkowsky is always master of his orchestra. The Voyvode comes riding home with a rush that reminds of the galloping of the Don Cossacks. Once arrived, however, he becomes rather inconsequential, and even the young lovers seem conventional in their love-making. Muted horns are a very good thing to portray evil with, but to hear them continually becomes rather tiresome, and the horn-players were called upon to play stopped tones almost continuously.

The only very original part of this work was when the bullet intended for his wife hit the Voyvode; then that official went out and growled himself to death.

"Oh God, it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing"
but it becomes doubly frightful when it wings off on trombones and bass tubas, as it did on this occasion.

Now came the interpolated Wedding March, which might have been taken (by those who did not know the compliment conveyed) to mean that after the death of the Russian functionary the young lovers were married and lived happily ever afterward.

The "Childe Harold" symphony was not the best work to celebrate the memory of the composer with; the "Symphonie Fantastique" would have been better. The once fashionable melancholy of Byron's hero has in modern days given place to a wild despair, a virgolate pessimism. Nevertheless, it was interesting to watch the tone-color of the viola, the instrument of dreamy sadness and of brooding, and to trace Childe Harold as portrayed upon the instrument. Mr. A. Ferir played exquisitely and proved that another good artist has been added to our orchestra. The delicacy with which he gave the chief theme (as much of a guiding motive as any round in Wagner) was sufficient to arouse enthusiasm.

The second movement—the March of the Pilgrims—presents one of Berlioz's remarkable bits of tone-coloring. To produce the tone of the Cathedral bell he employs harp and horn in combination, as effective a touch as ever was made in instrumentation. The horn at first spoiled the effect by playing too loudly, but at the end made amends by perfect shading. Mr. Ferir played the passages for viola,—"sull' ponticello" (bridge tones),—charmingly.

In the third movement much praise should be given to the excellence of the English horn and also to the shading of the Harold theme upon the flute. The second and third movements were splendidly interpreted.

Not so the finale. It was not a Summer convention of the Y. M. C. A. upon the Abruzzi mountains that Berlioz intended, but a fierce orgie such as would have caused Judge Emmons to have ejected the participants from any street or railway car in his dominions. In the interpretation there was pomp and bombast rather than fury,—a set of gentlemanly and lady-like brigands out for a holiday. Nevertheless Childe Harold died among them, which made the second death in this short programme.

Melba was to have sung and did not,—because of illness. The audience, however, seemed quite contented with a purely orchestral programme, judging by the applause, which was even more pronounced than usual. Louis C. Elson.

SEEKING CONTROL OF SYMPHONY

Musical Union Has Issued
Notices to Score of the Players Affiliated with
New York Local.

TRANSFER TO UNION
IN BOSTON ORDERED

Given the Alternative of Leaving the Orchestra—To Pay No Attention to the Mandate.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 11, 1903. Turning from the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra, the Musical Union is now directing its attention to the Boston Symphony Society, with the idea of obtaining control of this body of 44 players. Twenty of the Boston men belong to the Musical Union and are members of the New York local. The other players never have affiliated themselves with that body. It is only comparatively recently that the Boston union has been active. It recently issued cards to the 20 Symphony players, notifying them that they must obtain transfers to the Boston union. The alternative was said to be that they must leave the orchestra.

The Boston orchestra tonight gave a concert in Brooklyn. William Gericke, on being questioned, said he had heard of no notice received by any of the players. From members of the orchestra, however, it was learned that 20 had received the cards. It was said no attention would be paid to the action of the Boston union. The 20 union members say they are not amenable to union rules, as they all receive more than the union scale of wages.

NO GRIEVANCE OF PLAYERS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is in No Real Danger.

Herald — Dec. 13, 1903

Maj. Higginson Expects No Trouble with the Union—He Says That His Musicians Are Well Paid and That They Understand Him and He Understands Them.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who has made possible the Symphony orchestra in Boston, when told by a reporter for The Herald yesterday that the Musical Union had ordered 20 of the Boston Symphony players to join the Boston union or stop playing, said:

"I had heard nothing about it. It seems, however, that unionizing is being carried a bit far when musicians enter this business. I think the less said about this the better. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players, and they know what they can and cannot do. I expect no trouble from them. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players, and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir up complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players are subsidized, and others that are not so favored find they do not get along so well.

"All there is about it," said Maj. Higginson, "is that if this takes 10 minutes extra from my time, the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well, and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it. I do not know what the Symphony players think of this matter. They are in New York on a tour."

DECEMBER 13, 1903

SYMPHONY MEN WILL STAND BY
MAJ. HIGGINSON

Players Say They Will Not Desert Him
For Union.

STICK TO ORCHESTRA

Boston Branch of M. M. P. U. Wants Great Artists in Its Ranks.

Special to The Boston Journal.

New York, Dec. 12.—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing here said tonight that no matter what any union wanted they were determined to stand by Maj. Henry L. Higginson and refuse to desert his company.

Director Gericke was seen tonight and asked to make a statement as to his position resultant upon the labor war against his company.

He replied that the whole thing was yet an enigma to him, and until something more definite had shaped itself he would not care to discuss the matter.

Judging from what various members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said, however, when asked about the rumored troubles with the Musical Mutual Protective Union, the members of the union who are in the orchestra will not forsake the latter in any event, even though their staying will mean their expulsion from the union. The ones who are with the orchestra are, of course, very efficient musicians and get large pay.

To give up a job in such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra just to please a union would mean robbing themselves of much money, and the musicians are not prepared to do this.

Bread and Butter.

"It's our bread and butter," said one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, "and we will stick to it. I hope we will not have any great trouble with the union, for I am a member of it and believe in it as long as it stays within the province, but I don't intend to leave the Boston Symphony, no matter what happens."

Though one or two of the union men who are in the orchestra have admitted that they had been served with papers by the union, President Smith of the M. M. P. U., when seen today at the old homestead, denied any knowledge of the matter. He said that so far as he knew there had been and would be no trouble between his body and its members who are with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The manager of the Boston organization when he was in the Metropolitan Opera House last night said he knew nothing about the affairs of the men who belonged to the union. The fact that he had heard nothing from them makes it practically certain that even if they did get any notification from their union they will stay where they are. Mr. Higginson, who runs the orchestra, will give it up the minute any unions begin to interfere with him.

Much Mistaken.

"The Musical Mutual Protective Union is very much mistaken if it thinks it can make trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra or separate the players from their allegiance to Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who has done so much for us," said C. Hampe, a prominent violinist of the orchestra, when asked today about the attitude that body would take on the threat of the union that all the Symphony members must join if the company is not to be broken up.

"Men like Otto Rothe," he added, "are not going to desert our patron for any union on the face of the earth."

"The union has notified that the matter must be settled by the first of January or there will be trouble. We are all with Mr. Higginson. We get our salary by the year. The men in the union will drop out if necessary. The union is not able to guarantee them half the salary given by the orchestra. We won't leave Mr. Higginson and he won't give us up. He pays out about $220,000 a year for us and he is not going to ruin his band with any band players' organization."

LABOR UNION SEEKS POWER OVER SYMPHONY

Members of the Boston Musicians' Union are making an attempt to bring the ninety and more members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into their union. If they do not succeed they threaten trouble.

The trouble has only just begun, but there is promise of much trouble during the time the members of the small Boston musical union try to bring Beethoven, Listz, Mendelssohn, Wagner and other classical and grand opera music down to a union scale.

The members of the local musical union hopes to enlarge and make important its body by taking in the famous Symphony Orchestra members, because about twenty of the Symphony players are members of the New York union, known as the Musical Protective Association. These twenty musicians, sometimes a few more and sometimes less, have summer engagements in New York. The plan of the Boston union, which is young and far from being strong, is to make a demand to have the Symphony members who belong to the New York union transferred to their local union here.

Make a Demand.

With that once done the next move would be to demand that all the members of the Symphony join the union or else they would, under the rules of the union, demand that the twenty odd members of the Symphony who are union men withdraw.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, chief financial backer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had received no official notification of this move, while talking with a Boston Journal reporter yesterday, but he would not deny that he had heard of it.

At present members of the Boston union have done no more than to notify many of the union musicians to make the change. The musicians admit this, it is claimed. If that plan fails it is claimed the Boston union will demand a wholesale transfer from the New York union as its right under union regulations.

A member of the Symphony Orchestra who knows the inside history of the threatened trouble said yesterday that he did not believe the Boston union could make trouble, because he felt certain the members of the New York union would withdraw before they would be transferred, in view of the trouble that would later result.

Line Drawn Here.

The players feel that there must be a line drawn somewhere. The majority feel that there is a vast difference between the average orchestra and one of musicians of national, and in some instances international repute. While an orchestra of ordinary musicians who play at dances and anywhere that ordinary music is wanted might form a union in order to fix prices for playing at dances, regulating the prices to fit the hours played, practically all the members of the Symphony feel that they should not be placed quite in that class and that it would be just as practical to attempt to unionize sculptors and artists.

It is said that the majority of the Symphony players who belong to the New York union are men who, while avowedly connected with the Symphony, are not regular players, but are called upon to play when needed and are paid for such service instead of being strict members. At the same time the leaders are not looking forward to the threatened trouble without some misgivings, for they fear the Boston union may cause some bother.

WILL STAND BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY PLAYERS NOT LIKELY TO OBEY UNIONS

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Dec. 12—The impression among the men is that if any pressure comes from the unions, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would leave the union rather than the orchestra, but the Boston union is not expected to apply pressure unless the New York union puts on the screws, which also is not very likely. The men in the orchestra understand the attitude of Higginson, the management and Gerlicke toward any union interference and regard it more than they do the union, as they have no wish to lose life positions.

The orchestra may have trouble with the Boston Musicians' Union. The orchestra contains more than ninety musicians. Of this number about twenty, it is said, are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Association of this city, which has been at loggerheads with Mr. Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House for some time over the refusal of two members of the Metropolitan Orchestra to swear allegiance to the union. The Boston Musicians' Union, which was organized very recently, has made a demand on the members of the New York union in the Symphony Orchestra that they get transfer cards from the New York union to the Boston union. The Boston union, like the New York union, refuses to allow its members to play with non-union musicians.

It is the purpose of the Boston organization, it is said, to get the New York union men in the orchestra to make the change and then enforce the rule against their playing with musicians who are not affiliated with a union. As yet the Boston union has done nothing further than to notify many of the musicians to make the change. The New York union, it is said, has not taken any steps in the matter. There are a few members of the Boston union in the orchestra, but they are figures of minor importance and are engaged only as the occasion demands. One of the New York union men who joined the orchestra three years ago, said that he knew many of the union members had received notices from the Boston organization, but that nothing had been done by the New York union, and until something was done by the organization to which they belonged he doubted, he said, whether any of the members would heed the notice from Boston.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOME

Members Seem to Think That the Trouble with the Musicians' Union Will Be Settled Transcript Dec. 14, 1903.

The question uppermost in the minds of many of the members of the Symphony Orchestra, when they arrived home yesterday from their New York tour, was as to what action will be taken on the first of January by the Musicians' Union in its attempt to unionize the Symphony Orchestra. The Musical Mutual Protective Union, of which about twenty Symphony players are members, has issued orders that after January first none of its members shall play with non-union men. The union has tried hard to secure members from the Symphony Orchestra, but has not had great success, and those men who have joined the union are hoping that the matter can be adjusted in some way without a serious break. If it did come to a case of choosing between the union and the orchestra it is thought that most of the men would stand by the orchestra.

Major Henry L. Higginson, when asked about the matter, said that the musicians understand very well the position of the management concerning unions. The management will have nothing to do with the matter. He said further that he thought it not improbable that the musicians themselves would be able to make some satisfactory arrangement with the union.

TROUBLE MINIMIZED IN NEW YORK

Officers of Musicians' Union Not Inclined to Force the Issue in the Boston Organization

A special despatch to the Transcript from New York today reiterates what was stated on Saturday, that "there is next to no likelihood that the Musical Mutual Protective Union of that city will attempt to force an issue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, either through the branch of the union that has lately been established in Boston, or when the orchestra is giving its monthly pair of concerts in New York. The officers of the union seem to know a great deal less of the whole matter than do the gossips of the press-room at the Metropolitan Opera House, where it was born. The president of the union, for example, said today that there had been no dispute between the union and the members or the managers of the Boston orchestra, and that there will be none. Other officers were equally disposed to minimize the whole incident. They admitted a little secretfully that a score of members of the New York union were playing in the Boston orchestra side by side with non-union musicians. To do so, indeed, violated the union rules, but, with a knowing nod, "There are some things that every union has to overlook."

"The truth is that the officers of the New York union know well that the union members of the orchestra in Boston will quit the union rather than the orchestra. Of the Boston union and its intentions they professed no knowledge. One even suggested, with the amiable feeling that the "brethren" of the unions often show toward one another, that it was seeking to gain prestige by "raising a row" with so noted an orchestra as that in Boston."

"It is safe to say that the episode has been unduly magnified in New York, and that those interested in musical affairs in Boston are likely to take a juster view of its proportions. The managers of large orchestras in New York, some of the members of them, conductors, the new régime at the opera, and various observers of things musical, are eager to have someone do battle with the union and break its power. There is no doubt of its mastery of the orchestral situation there. Long ago Mr. Damrosch tried to fight it and was beaten. The Philharmonic is too much under these very union influences to force a contest. Mr. Conried at the opera house and his representative in such things, Mr. Franko, talk—and prudently submit. "Colonel" Higginson, as some of the New York newspapers still call him when they are good enough to advise him, is in the New York view, the right man to make the fight, and the musical interests that now suffer at the hands of the union, would gladly see him making and winning it. For their own sake they are not averse to egging it on—with discretion."

"Besides, in certain quarters there is still a petty jealousy of the Boston orchestra, its superiority to any band in New York, and the prestige it enjoys there over all the local organizations. There are those that, with troubles of their own, somehow resent the fashion in which the Boston orchestra goes its independent, artistic and successful way. Mr. Walter Damrosch, for reasons best known to himself, chooses to become the spokesman of this point of view: "So long as the Musical Union is to be recognized at all," he is quoted as saying, "there is no reason at all why the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not be compelled to join, just as all other musicians are. I never brought a musician to this country in my life that he was not compelled to join the union, and merely because Colonel (sic) Higginson happens to be a millionaire, there is no reason why an exception should be made to favor his orchestra." Of the pettiness, motives and the wisdom of this deliverance "Colonel" Higginson's fellow citizens can best judge for themselves."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in C minor, (B. & H. No. 9.)

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante cantabile.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Finale: Vivace.

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 77.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro giocoso; ma non troppo vivace.

PAINE,

BALLET MUSIC from the Opera "Azara;" three Moorish Dances.

- I. Allegretto animato.
- II. Poco meno mosso.
- III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi andante. Allegretto con moto e grazioso.

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

Soloist:

Miss MAUD MacCARTHY.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOME

Members Seem to Think That the Trouble with the Musicians' Union Will Be Settled Transcript Dec. 14, 1903.

The question uppermost in the minds of many of the members of the Symphony Orchestra, when they arrived home yesterday from their New York tour, was as to what action will be taken on the first of January by the Musicians' Union in its attempt to unionize the Symphony Orchestra. The Musical Mutual Protective Union, of which about twenty Symphony players are members, has issued orders that after January first none of its members shall play with non-union men. The union has tried hard to secure members from the Symphony Orchestra, but has not had great success, and those men who have joined the union are hoping that the matter can be adjusted in some way without a serious break. If it did come to a case of choosing between the union and the orchestra it is thought that most of the men would stand by the orchestra.

Major Henry L. Higginson, when asked about the matter, said that the musicians understand very well the position of the management concerning unions. The management will have nothing to do with the matter. He said further that he thought it not improbable that the musicians themselves would be able to make some satisfactory arrangement with the union.

TROUBLE MINIMIZED IN NEW YORK

Officers of Musicians' Union Not Inclined to Force the Issue in the Boston Organization

A special despatch to the Transcript from New York today reiterates what was stated on Saturday, that "there is next to no likelihood that the Musical Mutual Protective Union of that city will attempt to force an issue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, either through the branch of the union that has lately been established in Boston, or when the orchestra is giving its monthly pair of concerts in New York. The officers of the union seem to know a great deal less of the whole matter than do the gossips of the press-room at the Metropolitan Opera House, where it was born. The president of the union, for example, said today that there had been no dispute between the union and the members or the managers of the Boston orchestra, and that there will be none. Other officers were equally disposed to minimize the whole incident. They admitted a little regretfully that a score of members of the New York union were playing in the Boston orchestra side by side with non-union musicians. To do so, indeed, violated the union rules, but, with a knowing nod, "There are some things that every union has to overlook."

"The truth is that the officers of the New York union know well that the union members of the orchestra in Boston will quit the union rather than the orchestra. Of the Boston union and its intentions they professed no knowledge. One even suggested, with the amiable feeling that the "brethren" of the unions often show toward one another, that it was seeking to gain prestige by "raising a row" with so noted an orchestra as that in Boston."

"It is safe to say that the episode has been unduly magnified in New York, and that those interested in musical affairs in Boston are likely to take a juster view of its proportions. The managers of large orchestras in New York, some of the members of them, conductors, the new régime at the opera, and various observers of things musical, are eager to have someone do battle with the union and break its power. There is no doubt of its mastery of the orchestral situation there. Long ago Mr. Damrosch tried to fight it and was beaten. The Philharmonic is too much under these very union influences to force a contest. Mr. Conried at the opera house and his representative in such things, Mr. Franko, talk—and prudently submit. "Colonel" Higginson, as some of the New York newspapers still call him when they are good enough to advise him, is in the New York view, the right man to make the fight, and the musical interests that now suffer at the hands of the union, would gladly see him making and winning it. For their own sake they are not averse to egging it on—with discretion."

"Besides, in certain quarters there is still a petty jealousy of the Boston orchestra, its superiority to any band in New York, and the prestige it enjoys there over all the local organizations. There are those that, with troubles of their own, somehow resent the fashion in which the Boston orchestra goes its independent, artistic and successful way. Mr. Walter Damrosch, for reasons best known to himself, chooses to become the spokesman of this point of view: "So long as the Musical Union is to be recognized at all," he is quoted as saying, "there is no reason at all why the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not be compelled to join, just as all other musicians are. I never brought a musician to this country in my life that he was not compelled to join the union, and merely because Colonel (sic) Higginson happens to be a millionaire, there is no reason why an exception should be made to favor his orchestra." Of the pettiness, motives and the wisdom of this deliverance "Colonel" Higginson's fellow citizens can best judge for themselves."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 8. P. M.

Programme.

- |         |  |
|---------|--|
| HAYDN,  | SYMPHONY in C minor, (B. & H. No. 9),I. Allegro.II. Andante cantabile.III. Menuetto: Trio.IV. Finale: Vivace.  |
| BRAHMS, | CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 77.I. Allegro non troppo.II. Adagio.III. Allegro giocoso; ma non troppo vivace.   |
| PAINE,  | BALLET MUSIC from the Opera "Azara;" three Moorish Dances.I. Allegretto animato.II. Poco meno mosso.III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi andante. Allegretto con moto e grazioso. |
| WAGNER, | OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."  |

Soloist:

Miss MAUD MacCARTHY.

MAUD MacCARTHY, Irish Violinist.

Photograph by Gessford, New York.

MAUD M'CARTHY IN A SOLO NUMBER

Young Irish Violinist Will Play
Brahms' Concerto as Part of Symphony Program.

AZARA'S BALLET MUSIC

Three Characteristic Moorish Dances
From Prof. Paine's Opera
Will Also Be Given.

Professor Paine's "Azara" is like to obtain a hearing piecemeal, even if no one will give the opera a chance as a whole. Most of its vocal numbers have been presented by the Cecilia and by E. Cutter, Jr., at a special concert which he gave for the purpose, and now Mr. Gericke places on this week's Symphony program the ballet music, consisting of three characteristic Moorish dances, which enters into the festivities of the last act.

The program begins with Haydn's Symphony No. 9, in C minor, which adds to the master's gaiety and buoyancy a more sturdy and martial mood than he often manifests. This appears in the opening allegro, and is offset by the great gentleness and sweetness of the slow movement, which has much of the feeling of "In Verdure Clad."

The overture, put as the last number, will be the "Tannhauser," of which nothing need be said at this late day.

The program is to be completed by a solo number, which will reintroduce, after an absence of about a year, Mr. Arbos' pupil, Miss Maud MacCarthy, the young Irish violinist, who will return to the Brahms concerto, which has been played in Boston by others, including four performances by Mr. Kneisel, and which she used at the time of her debut. This concerto, which now seems firmly established, had a difficult way to make at first between distant extremes of criticism. On the one hand it was derided as unattractive, "distinctly dull," and not likely ever to be approved unless for its learning and its faithful adherence to standard forms, while on the other it was lauded as "fervent and sublime," and as "fervidly admired."

Its favor will be apt to depend always upon the interest which fine playing will obtain for it and upon admiration for its finely developed workmanship.

CONTRACT HOLD

Symphony Players All
Signed When Engaged.

Maj Higginson Says If They Don't Live Up to It They Must Go.

Globe Dec. 13, 1903.

Maj Henry L. Higginson, financial backer of the Boston symphony orchestra, said at his State-st office yesterday that he had heard nothing of the reported efforts of the New York musical mutual protective union to create trouble in the ranks of the Boston organization.

"I know nothing of the matter beyond what I have seen in this morning's papers," said he.

When asked if the statement attributed to him to the effect that on the first sign of trouble he would dissolve the whole orchestra, he answered:

"That was made nearly 20 years ago. I have contracts with every player in the orchestra, and when they refuse to live up to their contracts they will go out. If enough of them break their contracts to render it unwise to continue the organization, the latter will be disbanded."

"The orchestra is not run for a mere whim, for in the past few years there has been a deficit. I cannot stand for interference in the matter, and if contracts are broken, then those who break them will have to get out. That is all there is about it."

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prof. Paine's Ballet Music from
"Azara."

Melodious Themes and Sumptuous
Orchestration—Miss Maud Mac-Carthy Plays Brahms' Concerto for Violin and Wins Many Recalls.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C minor (B. & H. 9).....Haydn
Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Moorish dances from "Azara".....Paine
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Prof. Paine's ballet music from
"Azara" was played at a Symphony concert for the second time. Prof. Mac-of Columbia honors his university by writing Celtic sonatas and New England idyls for the piano; Prof. Parker of Yale is addicted to the oratorio habit; but Prof. Paine writes an opera with a ballet of Moorish dancers, and thus bears witness to the fact that Harvard University encourages the cultivation of the more humanizing arts. The dances gave much pleasure. All of the themes are melodious and some are characteristic; the orchestration is now piquant, now sumptuous. The music is decorative and picturesque, as well as for the steps of dancing girls. It suggests the opera house with its peculiar atmosphere, the set scene, the entrance and the evolutions of the ballet. The dances were heartily applauded, and Prof. Paine rose from his seat on the floor and bowed his acknowledgments to audience and conductor and orchestra.

Here is a grand, romantic opera of which the vocal and piano score has been published. It is the work of an American musician whose compositions have won the respect of men of authority in this country and in Europe. There are two operatic companies in the United States that could produce "Azara": Mr. Conried's and Mr. Savage's. The former manager has gone to the trouble and the expense of preparing an English version of an opera by Smetana, a Czech, and he purposes to revive certain operas that have had only a short-lived popularity in the United States. Mr. Savage does not hesitate to produce with his company "Othello" and "Tosca" and he will bring out an English version of Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly." Neither manager is considering the production of "Azara," so far as we are informed, and Prof. Paine is looking forward to a production in Germany, for which a German text is already provided. It seems a pity that a serious opera by an American composer of established reputation should not first see the footlights in the land of his birth. Mr. Walter Damrosch was luckier with his "Scarlet Letter;" he had his own opera company; but it is not every composer that can afford this luxury.

Miss Maud MacCarthy played Brahms' concerto for the violin. She played it when she appeared for the first time in this city (Nov. 15, 1902). Again she displayed a small, but pure and agreeable, tone, well grounded technique, an accent that would have won the applause of Polonius, and a maidenly discretion. To borrow Chaucer's phrase, she played "full fair," and she deserved the many recalls. But why Brahms' concerto again? Do we find in the Musician's Almanac for November and December: "About this time expect the violin concerto by Brahms"? An orator once made a brilliant speech, and he is now remembered as "Single-Speech Hamilton." Even a young player cannot afford to be characterized as a single-concerto violinist. No doubt Miss MacCarthy's repertoire is not so limited; and again we ask in a spirit of love, when a young woman plays as well as Miss MacCarthy does, why Brahms? Toujours Brahms as well as perdrix!

It is said of the late Joseph Gabriel Rheinberger, who thought in counterpoint and conversed in fugue that the music of Liszt gave him inward uneasiness, and wherever a piece by the Hungarian Abbe was on a programme, the eminent teacher of the Royal Music School at Munich withdrew from the hall during the performance to show publicly his disapproval and detestation. His conduct was thus somewhat ostentatious, and it disturbed the audience unless he happened to be in an end seat near a friendly door. It is said of Mr. H. T. Finck, the music critic of the New York Evening Post, that he tries to forget Brahms and all his works by reading some book by Hegel or Schopenhauer during the performance of music by his heart's abhorrence.

Mr. Finck's course is by far the more philosophical; he disturbs no one, and however abstruse the page, there is nothing in the music to divert his attention. To place red lights near certain doors of Symphony Hall with a legend on the wall: "This way out in case of Brahms," might offend some in the audience. It is much better to allow the discontented the liberty of self-improvement by reading. Not a newspaper that may flap or crackle; not a magazine the pages of which must be cut; but some discreetly-sized book that may be drawn from the pocket and easily held. "Molinos the Quietist," or the famous treatise "De Consolatione," or "The Gentle Life" would admirably suit the purpose; or a pocket chessboard with card chessmen might wile away the hour. Still better would be the importation of the drug described in "Real-mah," which enabled the swallower to enjoy deep sleep with open eyes and a facial expression of intelligence.

The performance of the orchestra was of a high order of merit. The symphony and the overture themselves do not call for comment. It is not necessary to characterize the composer of the symphony as "Father Haydn," and allusions to "the well known geniality and sunny disposition of the father of the symphony" may well be spared.

MISS M'CARTHY VIOLIN SOLOIST

Makes Her Re-Entree at Symphony Concert and Gives Selections
From Brahms.

PAINE'S "AZARA" BALLET

A Haydn Symphony and "Tannhauser" Overture Fill Out
the Program.

It is an honorable distinction for a girl no older in life and art than Miss Maud MacCarthy to be taken for the second time in the course of a year as the violin soloist at a Symphony concert, when abroad in the world and at home in this country, too, there are so many violinists of established eminence who have never yet been heard there, and when secondary orchestras and minor cities can enlist the co-operation of Thibaud, who is at least a man of the hour, whatever his absolute value in art may be. But as her reappearance was clearly welcome and her performance gratified, all question as to the cause of her choice may be waived. What is peculiar and open to criticism is that she should have been put forward in the same work which served for her debut—the concerto of Brahms.

Versatility Is Needed.

We are warned to beware of the man with one book; should we distrust the musician with one concerto? It is true that Mr. Kneisel has played this concerto several times; but his catholicity is known, and there has always appeared a special reason in the work itself or in the occasion for his repetitions. A young artist, with the way to power and celebrity yet to conquer, should demonstrate versatility, unless he means to restrict himself to virtuosity or to a single composer.

Under certain conditions the repetition of a work might supply a gauge for the growth and progress of a player; but not if such repetition were deferred over a twelvemonth. Only the most studious, analytic and specific criticism could fairly compass two performances of a year apart, although some general impressions might be derived from a confronting of memory and the moment.

Miss MacCarthy, then, appears to have strengthened and ripened; but whether this be the result of study, purpose and effort, or only the normal growth of the accreted year, some more expert and minute critic of the violinist's art may undertake to decide and to illustrate by citation.

Deft Technique.

She newly presents the same pleasant, sweet, sufficient tone, the same graceful and deft technique, still implying some effort in arduous passages, the same definite mentality and the same sympathetic feeling. It should be said for her, however, that Brahms has here given small chance for sentiment to deepen toward passion, while he has required great skill for many devices of technique, but has asked it for legitimate purpose and not for show.

Miss MacCarthy, apparently depending somewhat upon the tacit encouragement of her master, Mr. Arbos, played in confident concentration upon her task, meeting her difficulties without obvious struggle and taking her success modestly. She put hearty spirit into the long, formal cadenzas of the first movement, rendered purity and tenderness to the romantic second, and had firm command over the trials and obstacles of the last. She certainly pleased and was approved, being several times recalled.

The Other Numbers.

The ballet music from Professor

Paine's "Azara," which was heard with pleasure and some provocation to restlessness, intimates the dramatic fancy that moved him to write the poem and the music, and continue the action of the opera itself. It is not merely melodious, variably colored and characteristic in rhythms and instrumentation, but is so suggestive that an expert choreographer should have no difficulty in adapting to it not only the pas and "variations" of chief dancers, but also the work of coryphees and figurantes.

It was gaily played and people who only know Professor Paine's Greek tragic choruses and symphonies made the usual remark that they should not have thought he had it in him.

When it is added that the band played quite as they should, the C minor symphony (No. 9) of Haydn and the "Tannhauser" overture, there is no more to say except that the program was overlong.

Next time Mme. Melba will make good her promise and sing Handel's "Sweet Bird," with its flute-bird contest and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The orchestra will play a new set of variations upon an original theme by Elgar, Beethoven's 8th symphony and Bargiel's "Medea" overture.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There were no novelties among the selections played at the eighth of the season's Symphony concerts, but the program was enjoyable and the appearance of Miss Maud MacCarthy as soloist was very welcome. The young violinist was given an exceedingly cordial reception and her performance was applauded with greater warmth than commonly marks bestowal of approval by symphony audiences.

Miss MacCarthy made her first public appearance in Boston with this orchestra a year ago and played Brahms' D major concerto for violin. She played the same composition last evening and her interpretation of the exacting work showed that she has made material advance in her art during the past 12 months.

Brahms' concerto does not offer exceptional opportunities for display of virtuosity but it requires for satisfactory interpretation scholarly musical attainments, depth of feeling and power of expression rarely possessed by a young artist. Miss MacCarthy is wonderfully gifted, and considering that she is less than 20 years of age, the most sanguine expectations regarding her future seem justified. Her tone is of rarely beautiful quality, her command of technique is equal to every demand and her playing is marked by intelligence of expression, refinement of sentiment and sincerity of purpose that can but command admiration. There was much greater power evident yesterday in her delivery of the broad and forceful passages of the first movement of the concerto than was shown when she played it here a year ago, and there was even more brilliancy in her performance of the cadenza and greater facility in her execution of the difficult and florid ornamentations of the finale.

Perhaps no one in the hall yesterday was more pleased with her success than the concert master of the orchestra, Mr. E. Fernandez-Arbos. He was her teacher in London, and the ingenuous deference she paid him before and after her performance was noted with pleasure by the audience.

The other numbers composing Mr

Gericke's program were Haydn's ninth symphony, ballet music from Prof Paine's opera, "Azara," and the "Tannhauser" overture. This was the fourth time that Haydn's beautiful symphony had been given by this orchestra and it has surely never received a more gratifying performance. The fortissimo phrases of the first movement were given with smoothness and vigor and the intermediate themes and slower passages were played with a tenderness and delicacy of expression thoroughly in harmony with the requirements of the score. The cello solo in the trio was gracefully and agreeably played by Mr Krasselt.

The three Moorish dances from Prof Paine's opera were heard again with great pleasure and were played with the same skill, correctness of tempo and grace of rhythm that marked the performance of this music when first played under Mr Gericke's direction two years since. The "Tannhauser" overture was given a magnificent performance and compelled from the audience an enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation.

Because of the Christmas holiday the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this week will be given Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. Mme Melba will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; "Sweet Bird," Handel; variations on an original theme, Edward Elgar; mad scene from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; symphony 8, in F major, Beethoven. Gloucester, Dec. 20, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, gave its eighth concert of the season Saturday night, Miss Maud MacCarthy, violinist, assisting. This was the programme in full:

Haydn: Symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9).
Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D major, op. 77.
Paine: Ballet Music from the opera "Azara"; three Moorish Dances.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

While the rather forbidding programme set down for Saturday night made little promise of an interesting musical occasion, the concert proved, surprisingly enough, one of the liveliest and most brilliant of the present season. Superb playing did it, both Mr. Gericke and the orchestra, in their very best form, doing the work before them with a vigor and animation not always clearly in evidence. Even the Haydn symphony, the announcement of which is usually sufficient to make people come late or else to settle down to a comfortable perusal of the interesting programme books, held the attention of the audience, yea, even through the slow movement and the finale. This symphony in C-minor, by the way, less naive and "playful" than most symphonies by Haydn, sets forth much that is beautiful and, in its own way, big; particularly charming is the trio of the minuet, a delightful solo for 'cello. The orchestra played the work seriously, thereby doing justice to what Haydn had of greatness, and they were also successful in playing lightly and gracefully without becoming unduly skittish in their interpretation. The symphony was received, not with the usual polite apathy, but with warm applause. Then Miss Maud MacCarthy made her second appearance here with the orchestra in a year's time, again playing the Brahms concerto, that work of noble worth and beauty—if only the solo part could be omitted. According to the programme book, Miss MacCarthy is now just nineteen years of age. A young girl of attractive presence and of pleasing address, of well-developed technique and of unquestioned musical talent, she is still too young and inexperienced to appear as soloist at a symphony concert, where she takes her place in line with the accomplished violinists of the orchestra, with Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Kneisel, and with such visiting violinists as Camilla Urso, Gregorowitsch, Hallr, César Thomson and Ysaye. An invitation to perform at a great orchestral concert should be regarded as a compliment to be paid only artists of high repute, and, with all her promise for the future, as yet Miss MacCarthy can hardly be called that. In showing such despatch in bringing her thus prominently before the public, her friends do her no kindness. And, furthermore, if Miss MacCarthy were to play at all at a symphony concert, she was ill advised to choose the Brahms concerto, for this composition is so technically difficult and so technically ungrateful that only a violinist of long experience and of great musical breadth can make it effective in concert. While often turning a phrase with surprising beauty, Miss MacCarthy on the whole shows in her playing her youthful immaturity, and her tone, unfortunately, as small and tight. In justice must it be said, however, that her performance was greeted with tremendous applause.

After the concerto came some ballet music from Mr. Paine's opera, "Azara"; three charming Moorish dances, very modern, fascinatingly melodious, with a wide variety of piquant rhythms, the whole clothed in orchestral dress now delicate, now resplendent with color. The dances are not Moorish in name only; they seem steeped in the very atmosphere of Andalusia. It is inexplicable that two operatic managers like Mr. Conried and Mr. Savage, both inclined to vary their repertoires considerably from those of their predecessors, should neglect an opera by Mr. Paine, who, till someone writes better music than he has written for his "Oedipus," is still the foremost American composer. The ballet music was enthusiastically received, and when the musician acknowledged the applause from his seat, he was given an ovation.

This admirable concert was brought to its close by a remarkably brilliant performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture, which went with a warmth of passion that roused the house to a high pitch of enthusiasm. At the next concert Mme. Melba is to sing, and this will be the programme: Bargiel, overture to "Medea"; Handel, scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly"; Edward Elgar, variations on an original theme (first time); A. Thomas, Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet"; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in F major. R. R. G.

THREAT BY MAJOR HIGGINSON.

Sun
IF BOTHERED BY THE UNION, SYMPHONY WILL STOP.
1903

He Will Disband Orchestra if Any Dictation
Is Attempted—Union Action Justified, Says Walter Damrosch—The Musicians
Are Standing by Major Higginson.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 12.—Major Henry L. Higginson was greatly disturbed to-day when he learned that twenty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Association of New York, had been ordered to get transfer cards to the Boston Musicians' Union by Jan. 1 and that there was a possibility of there being some trouble. It is said that the twenty men have refused to obey the order, and if any effort at dictation is made Major Higginson says that he will disband the orchestra.

When asked about the matter, Major Higginson said:

"It seems that unionizing is being carried a bit too far when musicians enter this business. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players and they know what they can and cannot do. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievances. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players.

"I have given them good salaries and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"The Symphony players are subsidized and others that are not so favored find they do not get along so well.

"All there is about it is that if this takes ten minutes extra from my time the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.' "There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it."

Walter Damrosch said yesterday to a SUN reporter that the action of the union in regard to the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was entirely justified. "So long as the Musical Union is to be recognized at all," he said, "there is no reason at all why the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not be compelled to join just as all other musicians are. I never brought a musician to this country in my life that he was not compelled to join the union, and merely because Col. Higginson happens to be a millionaire that is no reason why an exception should be made to favor his orchestra.

"The tyranny of the union to-day in some circles is due to the activity of a certain member who rivals Sam Parks in his method of dealing with the musicians and with the men whom he has to employ."

What was said by the union men in the orchestra after the news of the Boston organization's demand become known was entirely favorable to the management of the orchestra. Several union men made no bones of saying that if the matter came to an issue where they would either have to leave the union or the orchestra, they would quit the union.

Officers of the Musical Mutual Protective Union had a good deal to say about the action of the Boston union. Their organization, they asserted, had not been officially notified as yet of the Boston union's demands, and they were inclined to regard the affair as the act of some person without authority who is seeking to promote unduly the interests of the Boston union. The only reason they could assign for the Boston union's desire to enroll the twenty New York union men on its membership list was that the presence of the Symphony orchestra musicians in the union would at once give it a standing.

Officers of the local union did not hesitate to say that the union members of the Symphony organization were violating the rules of the union in playing with non-union men. But they hardly thought the New York union would do anything toward enforcing its rule while the Symphony Orchestra is in the city.

C. Hampe, a violinist in the orchestra and a non-union man, when asked about the probability of the orchestra becoming unionized, said expressively: "We are not brickbats." Then he added:

"Men like Otto Rothe are not going to desert our patron for any union on the face of the earth. We are all with Mr. Higginson."

Other members of the orchestra, some of them union men, expressed the same opinion.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn.....Symphony No. 9 in C minor
Brahms.....Concerto for Violin
Miss Maud MacCarthy, Soloist.
Paine.....Ballet Music from "Azara"
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhauser"

It may have been personal mood or it may have been the intrinsic style of the music, but Haydn's Symphony seemed puerile and tiresome. The violoncello solo in the Trio of the Minuet (finely played) afforded a little languid interest, but as a whole the work seemed stale, flat and unprofitable. Some of Haydn's symphonies wear better than the most of Mozart's—always excepting the G minor and the "Jupiter"—but the symphonic works of both masters belong to the age of the "Clarissa Harlowe" novel, and can interest here and there, but not as a whole. "Autre temps, autres mœurs!"

From the extreme of simplicity the programme swept to the extreme of subtlety. We trust that Miss MacCarthy is not going to make Brahms' violin concerto an annual proceeding at our symphony concerts. She has proved that she can play the long work marvellously—for a young lady—and last Saturday she proved it again, which ought to be enough. There are not very many great violin concertos, but there are enough to avoid being restricted to a permanent Brahms diet.

It may be added, however, that the work gains on acquaintance. It may be a case of "first endure, then pity, then embrace," but we doubt if we shall ever embrace that prolix Adagio.

Miss MacCarthy played with astonishing surety, and in the cadenza and in the final movement exhibited much breadth in difficult double-stopped passages. She was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. Brahms' orchestration suffers by comparison with the modern colorists. Great as this master was, his greatness did not lie in the domain of brilliant scoring.

But the next works made ample amends for the neutral tints of the concerto. Paine's Moorish Dances glow with an Orientalism that is comparable with Rubinstein's "Feramors." Seductive, languishing and melodic, the three excerpts from "Azara" won sufficient applause to force the composer to bow his thanks to the audience. The interpretation was excellent and especial praise must be given to the English horn obbligato which was most eloquently performed.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture won the greatest success of the evening. It was wonderfully shaded—perhaps a little too carefully, for some of the "abandon" was lost. But the conflict of the two chief themes was finely brought out. The whole overture is a struggle (to alter Swinburne) between

"The trombones and viols of Virtue,
And the woodwind and cymbals of Vice."
And the violins and trombones get much the best of it in the last round. That is about as great as anything in the

...it is a repetition, and when Wagner put it out to make room for a very dull transition into the first scene of the opera (the "Paris version"), he made a sacrifice to his theories that was nearly as great as the one that Abraham intended. But an angel stopped Abraham. We wish that some angel had stopped Wagner.
Louis C. Elson.

Mme. Melba in "Lucia."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BARGIEL,	OVERTURE to "Medea." op. 22.
HANDEL,	SCENA, "Sweet Bird that shun'st the noise of folly." from "L'Allegro il penseroso ed il moderato." (Flute obbligato, Mr. ANDRE MAQUARRE.)
EDWARD ELGAR,	VARIATIONS on an original Theme. op. 36. (First time.)
A. THOMAS,	OPHELIA'S MAD-SCENE from "Hamlet." (Act IV., Scene 2.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando, III. Tempo di menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MADAME MELBA.

MUSICAL MATTERS Dec 21 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn.....Symphony No. 9 in C minor
Brahms.....Concerto for Violin
Miss Maud MacCarthy, Soloist.

Paine.....Ballet Music from "Azara"
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhauser"

It may have been personal mood or it may have been the intrinsic style of the music, but Haydn's Symphony seemed puerile and tiresome. The violoncello solo in the Trio of the Minuet (finely played) afforded a little languid interest, but as a whole the work seemed stale, flat and unprofitable. Some of Haydn's symphonies wear better than the most of Mozart's—always excepting the G minor and the "Jupiter"—but the symphonic works of both masters belong to the age of the "Clarissa Harlowe" novel, and can interest here and there, but not as a whole. "Autre temps, autres mœurs!"

From the extreme of simplicity the programme swept to the extreme of subtlety. We trust that Miss MacCarthy is not going to make Brahms' violin concerto an annual preceeding at our symphony concerts. She has proved that she can play the long work marvellously—for a young lady—and last Saturday she proved it again, which ought to be enough. There are not very many great violin concertos, but there are enough to avoid being restricted to a permanent Brahms diet.

It may be added, however, that the work gains on acquaintance. It may be a case of "first endure, then pity, then embrace," but we doubt if we shall ever embrace that prolix Adagio.

Miss MacCarthy played with astonishing surety, and in the cadenza and in the final movement exhibited much breadth in difficult double-stopped passages. She was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. Brahms' orchestration suffers by comparison with the modern colorists. Great as this master was, his greatness did not lie in the domain of brilliant scoring.

But the next works made ample amends for the neutral tints of the concerto. Paine's Moorish Dances glow with an Orientalism that is comparable with Rubinstein's "Feramors." Seductive, languishing and melodic, the three excerpts from "Azara" won sufficient applause to force the composer to bow his thanks to the audience. The interpretation was excellent and especial praise must be given to the English horn obbligato which was most eloquently performed.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture won the greatest success of the evening. It was wonderfully shaded—perhaps a little too carefully, for some of the "abandon" was lost. But the conflict of the two chief themes was finely brought out. The whole overture is a struggle (to alter Swinburne) between

"The trombones and viols of Virtue,
And the woodwind and cymbals of Vice."
And the violins and trombones get much the best of it in the last round. That coda is about as great as anything in the overture repertoire, and when Wagner cut it out to make room for a very dull transition into the first scene of the opera (the "Paris version"), he made a sacrifice to his theories that was nearly as great as the one that Abraham intended! But an angel stopped Abraham. We wish that some angel had stopped Wagner.

Louis C. Elson.

Mme. Melba in "Lucia."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8, P. M

Programme.

BARGIEL,	OVERTURE to "Medea." op. 22.
HANDEL,	SCENA, "Sweet Bird that shun'st the noise of folly." from "L'Allegro il penseroso ed il moderato." (Flute obbligato, Mr. ANDRE MAQUARRE.)
EDWARD ELGAR,	VARIATIONS on an original Theme. op. 36. (First time.)
A. THOMAS,	OPHELIA'S MAD-SCENE from "Hamlet." (Act IV., Scene 2.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio II. Allegretto scherzando, III. Tempo di menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MADAME MELBA.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Elgar's Variations the New Feature of Programme.

First Performance Here of This Interesting and Brilliant Work—
 Mme. Melba Sings Arias by Handel and Ambrose Thomas—Bargiel's "Medea."

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

- Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
- Scene, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
- Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
 (First time here.)
- Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
- Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the 19th century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas. This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipzig, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland were the happiest of his life. He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in Berlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began. There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and inferior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently. He grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by some one of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture. The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no programme. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit. There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood. Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable Fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did the Chevallier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea; but his music is French music for a French "Medea." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea." Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight. The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much-lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, a work of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine the idiosyncrasies of 14 of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme "Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of Uncle Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jeremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncrasies is a question that does not concern us, although the first variations might lead

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kerdel — P. Hale
Elgar's Variations the New Feature of Programme.

First Performance Here of This Interesting and Brilliant Work—
Mme. Melba Sings Arias by Handel and Ambrose Thomas—Bargiel's "Medea."

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scene, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)

Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet".....
A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the 19th century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas.
This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipzig, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland were the happiest of his life.
He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in Berlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began.
There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and inferior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently. He grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech
—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by some one of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture.
The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no programme. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit.
There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood.
Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable Fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did the Chevallier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea;
but his music is French music for a French "Medee." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea."
Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight.
The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much-lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, a work of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine
the idiosyncrasies of 14 of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme
"Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of Uncle
Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jeremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncrasies is a question that does not concern us, although the first variations might lead s to infer that some of the friends were dull persons, or idle chatterers, or mere dealers in saws and maxims; for composers as well as others may have queer tastes in the matter of friendship. But the music grows more and more delightful. "Dorabella" is the one friend we should like to know; the others of the later variations are pleasant companions, and they might improve still more on acquaintance, but "Dorabella," with her coquetry, her grace, her rippling laugh and sly smile, her pouting lips and suggestion of subtle fragrantcy lead us to her, Mr. Elgar! Never mind about "C. A. E." and the others tagged with letters of the alphabet.

There is often in this work a display of genuine fancy in thought and expression, and there is an occasional flash of imagination. The brilliance and the beauty of certain variations make one suspect that Mr. Elgar at the start was deliberately dull, either to work out a crescendo of interest or from the belief that certain pages in a set of variations must be dull in obedience to long established custom. The finale is, on the whole, effective, although it contains formulas of commonplace and routine. The work made an unusually favorable impression on the audience, and the applause was honest as well as hearty.

Mme. Melba sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" for the third time at these concerts. The flute obligato was played by Mr. Andre Maquarre. The air itself belongs to a class that is made tolerable only by the consummate art of a great virtuoso in perfect condition. The bravura passages must, like the cataract in Ternyson's song, leap in glory. Mme. Melba's upper tones in this air were not so clear and of such exquisite quality as on former occasions, nor was her coloratura so spontaneous. No doubt her late indisposition had something to do with this. The fact remains that the middle and lower registers of her voice were last night the most effective.

In the old story used by the poets Ford and Crashaw, it was the bird with warbling throat that failed to imitate the lute and at last dropped and "broke her heart." No such fate befell Mme. Melba, although Mr. Maquarre set her a brave example for vocal emulation, but the voice in this air was not the incomparable organ that moved and thrilled by power of golden beauty in the late performance of "The Damnation of Faust," when Mme. Melba's performance was memorable, unforgettable. In the familiar scene of Ophelia's madness she sang with greater brilliance and with more confident bravura. Here there was no thought of technical difficulties and anxious labor. The applause and the recalls were richly merited.

Elgar's variations and the overture by Bargiel were played with a care that was not too evident, with a finish that was never finical, with all the qualities demanded by the music and in sympathy with the composer's intentions. Beethoven's 8th symphony, agreeable as it is, seemed here unnecessary. The concert was long enough without it.

MELBA'S SINGING ADDS MUCH LIGHT

Journal ———— Ticket
Elgar's "Enigma" in Theme and Variations Novelty of the Symphony.

SOME UNNAMED FRIEND

Somber "Medea" Overture and Beethoven's Lightsome Eighth Symphony Played.

In her large share of the ninth Symphony program, Mme. Melba newly showed—as she has often shown before, and will doubtless show again in her part of the pension fund program, this evening—that she is a superlatively exquisite and almost peerless vocalist.

Yet as even the great and unrivalled have their imperfections, and as her position is too firmly established to be even shaken by criticism, one may note, even at this late day, that error of her scale, derived from non-equalization of vowels, which causes her E and her A to be often narrow, thin and incisive, too much early attention having been given to individualizing them as letters, instead of molding them slightly into tonal symmetry with the broader vowels.

But against this, one sets the elastic facility of her scales, her coruscant floritura, and the incomparable justice equality, decision and splendor of her trill. Still, she does not pass beyond vocalism into artistic song. Her range is narrow, her repertory is limited to extracted operatic scenes, bravura waltzes, and such like things wherein neither mentality nor sympathy has need to penetrate beneath the surface.

Antique Gems.

For this Symphony audience she chose two of these antique gems, viz.: Handel's "Sweet Bird," wherein (as also in her familiar "mad" scene from "Lucia") there is such close rivalry and such elegant association between the voice and the flute, played by Mr. Maquarre, and Ophelia's death scene from the "Hamlet" of Ambrose Thomas, who therein demonstrates the incomprehensibility by the Gothic mind of Shakespeare's tragedy and its personages.

Possibly, if Mme. Melba could enter imaginatively into Ophelia's agony and distraction, she might impart to those "wild and whirling words" and measures a gravity of despair that would make them poignant and terrible.

But their emotion is beyond her ken, and she can only vocalize and wander on through the empty scene.

One Novelty.

Elgar's "Enigma" theme and variations constituted the novelty of the occasion, came almost unchallenged, and passed undisturbed. Inasmuch as the composer has frankly said that their mutual relation was tenuous and illogical, even in a technical sense, only the expert would attempt to make anything of them, especially as it is said that their connection is rather in another theme which is far from obvious, although it is declared to overhang them all.

The theme itself, so far as it can be held and examined, is of an unsatisfied, longing, interrogative character, as if seeking it knows not what. The variations are said to be suggestive each of some unnamed friend; and hence that the notion springs up that each variation in turn asks what is the mystery in that human notion which it typifies, or what is the problem which it seeks to solve. But as no clue, however faint, is supplied, the listener must be content with the dexterity, speed and resourcefulness with which all are shaped and the vitality that is infused into them. The nominal theme—for one may fancy the really inspiring subject to be spiritual rather than artistic—is in the minor mode, and the fourteen variations are fairly divided between that and the major.

Romantic Melody.

There are to be found in them soft, lingering, plaintive, romantic melody, and also a spirit of bustle, pomp, heroism and martial motion. The work gives enough fresh pleasure to be accepted for that alone, without bothering to guess what it means and why it was made.

The Bargiel "Medea" overture began the program sadly and somberly, for the moral keynote is set more to woe than awe and rises to passionateness in the finale. At the end of the rather too protracted program was given in a finely shaded and bright-hearted reading Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bargiel—Overture to "Medea," op. 22.
Handel—Scene, "Sweet Bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro il penseroso ed il moderato." (Flute obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)..... Madame Melba
Edward Elgar—Variations on an original Theme, op. 36. (First time.)
A. Thomas—Ophelia's Mad-Scene from "Hamlet." (Act IV., Scene 2)..... Madame Melba
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

Bargiel is not quite as successful as Cherubini in his overture to "Medea," for while the latter keeps definitely to the old, conservative school, the former is neither quite classical nor quite modern. From the music of both we gather that Me. rather an unpleasant lady; not the that one would enjoy taking in to dinner, one would be almost sure to find Amanitas among the mushrooms and ptomaines in the lobster salad. One was astonished to find Wagner's motif of Cunning (which is so prominent in the Trilogy) playing a prominent part in this overture. The work was well interpreted and is more effective, in its contrasts and its full harmonies, than many a modern composition that is more frequently heard in our concerts.

Handel is stronger than Bach in his vocal solos, but for all that we could not thrill greatly at the "Sweet Bird"; possibly we have had a surfeit of poultry at this season. The old, formal Da Capo Aria is always more or less trying, with its enforced repetition of the first part. Nor was Melba at her very best. There was effort in the highest register and untrue intonation in the trill. The floriture in the middle register was, however, very fluent. Mr. Maquarre played the flute obligato very finely and was accorded an ovation with Mme. Melba at the end. But the singer did much better in her second number. Her "bel canto" in the Swedish folk-song, which forms the cavatina of the scene, was beautiful, and, with the exception of insecure intonation at the very end, the number was one of the most effective vocal performances recently heard in Boston. Mme. Melba was recalled times without number, and in the Mad Scene she surely deserved her great triumph.

But, from the artistic standpoint, how absurd these vocal mad-scenes are! Some scientist ought to write a monograph upon "Vocalism and Insanity." There is an epidemic of craziness among operatic heroines. Dinorah, Lucia, Linda di Chamounix, and a host of others go crazy. Some tenors also go mad, as for example, Lionel in "Martha" and the hero of Wagner's "Fairies." The crazier they become the better they sing! This points to some occult connection between the brain and the vocal chords. The first symptoms of this operatic mental alienation is a tendency to trill, to give brilliant scale passages, and to sing high staccato phrases.

We confess to great enthusiasm regarding Elgar's orchestral variations, heard here for the first time. This and Cowen's "Scandinavian Symphony" seem to us the two best orchestral works ever sent out from England, and the former is far more original than the latter. It may be a question as to whether the boundaries of instrumental music are not being extended too far. Beethoven started the orchestra to portraying definite events and surroundings in his "Pastoral Symphony"; Richard Strauss set it to giving lectures on metaphysics; Weingartner and Huber caused it to represent a picture gallery; and now Elgar gives a set of photographs of some of his friends by a set of orchestral variations.

It may be pleaded that Schumann did something like this in some piano works, but that composer was less definite in the matter, and besides it is quite fair to imitate the style of a well-known composer, as Schumann did that of Paganini, Chopin, Mendelssohn, etc.; in Elgar's case the parties indicated by initials not all of them

mer musicians or celebrities. It is said that Elgar was recently met by a journalist, who said: "I never met any people like that!" "Certainly not," replied the composer, "they are ladies and gentlemen!"

One shudders to think of what might happen if some Boston composer (we have composers in Boston!) should begin such musical sketching. He would give "B. J. L." with a touch of "Parsifal" modified by Handel; "C. M. L." would be depicted by 150 dissonances and a viol d' amour solo; "Wm. G." would be a symphonic movement in the strictest classical style; "J. K. P." might be represented by "Fair Harvard" turned into a Moorish Dance; the possibilities are endless.

But one need not judge of these sketches by their individual meaning. Indeed they need not be spoken of as variations, for they are of the freest character. Taken purely as music (and thus the composer wishes them to be judged), they form one of the best contributions to the modern repertoire. They are unforced and do not strain after fierce dissonance or thorny and novel progressions, but they give beauty as well as originality, and present most effective contrasts. Good, intelligible music is here, and a climax that is full of power. Elgar has the good fortune to live in a nation of prosaic contrapuntists and his work shines forth the more brilliantly by contrast with the hard-boiled cantatas and wooden fugues of his contemporaries.

Beethoven's sprightly little 8th symphony closed the concert merrily. It is the most humorous of all the set of symphonies. What comic play is made with the clown of the orchestra—the bassoon! The duet of bassoon and kettle-drums is the acme of quaintness. The pretty figure of 3 notes, suddenly bitten off by the gruff contrabasses, is a bit of practical joking, and so is the abrupt and wofully conventional end of the Allegretto. The dialogue between violins and deep strings (cellos and contrabasses) in the second movement is as fresh as the day it was written, and as attractive. Beethoven loved to play with the bassoon, and this might almost be called a bassoon symphony; that instrument was excellently performed on this occasion and the contrabasses and the horn also deserve a word of praise for especial unity and steadiness.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The assistance of Mme. Melba on Saturday night lent distinction to the ninth symphony concert. This was the programme:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

The occasion being eminently Mme. Melba's, it will be proper to speak of the singer first. For her solo numbers she chose Handel's "Sweet Bird," and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," both of which selections she has sung before at symphony concerts; to the "Sweet Bird," indeed, she seems as devoted as Mr. Ben Davies is to "Waft Her, Angels." Of Mme. Melba's art there is little new to say. The singer has a voice of exquisite purity, and one quality she has in common with Mme. Sembrich; both ladies sing so freely and easily that, while listening to them, one constantly wonders how lesser vocalists contrive to make singing seem so difficult and laborious. Of warm or tender feeling, of elegance of phrasing or diction, of intelligent musicianliness, Mme. Melba gave few indications Saturday night. Merely to listen to her tones, however, is a satisfaction. After each song she was recalled four or five times with frantic enthusiasm. A beautiful feature of "Sweet Bird," by the way, was Mr. Maquarre's exquisite playing of the flute obligato.

There is also little to be said concerning the orchestral part of the concert. Although carefully and brilliantly played, the Beethoven symphony was heard too late at night to make the effect that belongs to it, and the Bargiel overture, likewise admirably performed, was heard too late in its life to arouse interest. Even in the days when its dissonances and other departures from the conventional disturbed listeners at Leipzig, the work could have been but an inadequate commentary on the life and fate of the barbaric but unhappy Medea, who was abandoned for Creusa of Corinth.

The single novelty of the evening was one worth hearing: a Theme and Variations by Elgar. If only from curiosity, one must welcome any work of this composer, who has been hailed in England with an acclaim that is hard to understand when one knows only his "Sea Songs" and the "Cockaigne" overture. Of the variations, Mr. Elgar has said: "It is true that I have sketched, for their amusement and mine, the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The Variations should stand simply as a piece of music. The Enigma I will not explain.... its dark saying must be left unguessed, and I warn you that the apparent connection between the Variations and the Theme is often of the slightest texture; further, through and over the whole set another and larger theme goes but is not played.... So the principal theme never appears, even as in some late dramas—e. g., Maeterlinck's 'L'Intruse' and 'Les Sept Princesses'; the chief character is never on the stage."

From these rather mystical remarks one point stands out clearly: the composition in question is to be treated musically and not psychologically. Considered as a "piece" of music, then, the theme and some seven or eight of the variations are exceedingly dull music indeed, unimaginative, prosaic, harsh-sounding, unmelodious. If they are musical sketches of Mr. Elgar's friends, his circle must form a colorless company. The latter portion of the work, however, is more interesting. One variation in particular, probably the ninth, is vigorous and attention-compelling, and it is followed by a charmingly graceful movement which a study of the programme-book would lead one to think must be entitled "Dorabella." The remainder of the composition holds the interest straight through the animated and really exciting finale, offering on its way many moments agreeable in the style of Mendelssohn, or, more accurately, of Sir Arthur Sullivan in a serious vein. Although the most noteworthy example of his talent we have yet heard here, the theme and variations still fail to make manifest why Mr. Elgar should be regarded quite so highly as he is in England. However, there is still the "Dream of Gerontius" to get acquainted with.

At Saturday's concert Mr. Gilbert is to sing two arias. The orchestral programme contains d'Albert's overture "Improvisatore," for the first time Mr. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," and, by request, Glazounow's fourth symphony. R. R. G.

Trans. Globe, Dec. 28, 1903.

NINTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Mme Melba was the feature of the ninth Symphony program last week, the celebrated soprano contributing the aria, "Sweet Bird," from Handel's "L'Allegro," and Ophelia's mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera, "Hamlet." The orchestral numbers comprised the overture from Bargiel's "Medea," variations on an original theme, Elgar and Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr Maquarre played the flute obligato in the Handel aria. The qualities of Mme Melba's voice have been described so often that it is difficult to say anything new about it. The great singer's vocalizing is as beautiful and her art as perfect as ever, the mechanism is seemingly faultless and the voice is as opulent, pure and as wonderfully flexible as of yore. She sang the Handel aria gloriously, the phrasing was exquisite and the bravura passages duplicated in sweetness of tone and facility in execution the musical embroideries of the accompanying flute. It was a brilliant performance, which set the audience wild with delight, and Mr Maquarre came in for his share of the honors, for his part of the aria was skilfully played.

In the more dramatic Ophelia music Melba was equally satisfactory, although the scena lacks the brilliancy of the Handel excerpt and does not permit those dazzling pyrotechnical feats which are the startling features of the prima donna's art. It was very artistic singing, though, and the audience showed by tumultuous applause its appreciation of the performance. Mme Melba returned to the stage innumerable times after each number in response to the somewhat unusual demonstrations from a symphony audience.

The orchestra acquitted itself admirably in these two selections. The Elgar variations, 14 in number, were played here for the first time, and they proved to be very interesting, partly by reason of the variety in the scoring, but chiefly because of their merits as compositions. The pieces are portraits of friends of Mr Elgar, and judging by some of the bits, the characteristics of those indicated, must have been quite marked. The second "picture" was an odd piece of staccato work. No. 3 evidently was a gruff individual, and the heavier instruments told the story capitally. In No. 6 there is a chumannesque touch, like unto his "Carnival," which is admirably scored, and which the orchestra set forth brilliantly.

The 10th, "Dorabella," is a charming intermezzo with muted strings giving forth a fetching waltz rhythm and which was the gem of the lot. The cellos are worthy of special praise for their harmonious work in the 11th number, which were beautiful legato passages for that instrument. The last portrait is a brilliant martial figure, with fortissimo trimmings for the organ and the whole orchestra, and evidently was a personage of importance. The whole suite was interpreted in a way to win much applause.

The proper pomposity of treatment and fortissimo in modulations were shown in the "Medea" overture. Clever writing, no doubt, but rather harsh to the ear. The Beethoven symphony received a sympathetic interpretation, as usual.

This week's soloist will be Mr Charles Gilbert, the French baritone. The orchestral selections will be the overture, "Improvisatore," d'Albert; Loeffler's symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Glazounow's fourth symphony. Globe Dec. 27, 1903

Symphony Tickets TO RENT
CONNELLY'S, Adams House
2t(A) d 17

SYMPHONY TICKETS WANTED—One Friday and two Saturday tickets for balance or part of season. State lowest price.
Address N. J. A., Boston Transcript.
(A):

No. 4.
rest.)

ist:

BERT.

120

121

-1903-

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Evening, December 27

AT EIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

THIRD CONCERT

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

SOLOISTS

Mme. MELBA

Signorina ADA SASSOLI

(Who have kindly volunteered for this concert)

..PROGRAM..

OVERTURE. "Mignon" . . . . . A. Thomas

ARIA from "Traviata" . . . . . Verdi

Mme. MELBA.

NOCTURNE and SCHERZO from "Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . . . Mendelssohn

CHORALE and VARIATIONS . . . . . Widor

(For Harp.)

Signorina SASSOLI.

SUITE No. 1. "Peer Gynt" . . . . . Grieg

WALTZ. "Romeo and Juliet" . . . . . Gounod

Mme. MELBA.

VARIATIONS, Suite 3 . . . . . Tschaikowsky

LARGO, for Violins, Five Harps, and Organ . . . . . Handel

HARPISTS

Signorina ADA SASSOLI. Miss FLORENCE NICKERSON.

Miss RAYMAH DOWSE. Miss FANNY HAMILTON.

Mr. HEINRICH SCHUECKER.

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH, Organist.

THIRD PENSION FUND CONCERT

Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall—A Large Audience Present.

Bill Herald P Hall Dec 28/1903

The third concert in aid of its pension fund was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. Mme. Melba and Miss Sassoli most generously gave their services. Appreciation of the orchestra, which is one of the chief ornaments of this city, and the fame of Mme. Melba crowded the house. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata".....Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and variations.....Widor
(For harp.)
Miss Sassoli.

Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet".....Gounod
Mme. Melba.

Variations, suite 3.....Tschalkowsky
Largo, for violins, five harps and organ.....Handel
Harpists—Miss Ada Sassoli, Miss Florence Nickerson, Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist.

The programme was changed from that originally announced; Grieg's characteristic and picturesque "Peer Gynt" suite took the place of the variations from Delibes' ballet "Coppelia." Mr. Gericke no doubt thought that variations by Widor and Tschalkowsky were enough. The programme was of a popular nature, popular in the best sense, although the purist might object to the official sanction given to the so-called "Largo," a swollen arrangement and a singular perversion of a simple air in Handel's opera "Xerxes."

The melodious and brilliant overture and the selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Grieg and Tschalkowsky were all well adapted to the purpose of the concert—to draw an audience from all classes of music lovers and to give them pleasure. The hearty and spontaneous applause showed that this pleasure was real.

Mme. Melba was in better voice than at the Symphony concert the night before. She sang the second portion of Verdi's air with great dash and spirit, and the beauty of her voice was displayed fully in the familiar "Serenata" which she sang after the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet." In this simple song with the harp accompaniment of Miss Sassoli, her golden notes were without alloy, nor did the added embellishments toward the end seem incongruous, for there was no arrogance of bravura. The singer was applauded enthuslastically and recalled again and again after each aria, and flowers and a wreath were given to her.

Miss Sassoli's art and attractive personal simplicity were shown in the chorale by Widor, which was introduced here by Mr. Schuecker at a Symphony concert. She, too, was warmly applauded.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, gave its third concert in aid of its pension fund. The players had the valuable assistance of Mme. Melba and of Miss Ada Sassoli, the harp player who made so great a success here a few weeks ago, both ladies kindly volunteering their services. This was the programme: Dec. 28, 1903

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata," "Ah, fors' è lui"....Verdi
Mme. Melba.

Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and Variations.....Widor
(For harp)
Signorina Sassoli.

Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet".....Gounod
Mme. Melba.

Variations, Suite 3.....Tchaikovsky
Largo, for Violins, Five Harps and Organ.....Handel
Harpists—Signorina Ada Sassoli, Miss Florence Nickerson, Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.
Organist—Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

Of all the concerts given in Boston this winter, none afforded more pleasure than that of last night. The programme was chosen with rare judgment, every number being bright and attractive, with just the proper amount of seriousness, as in the wonderful "Aasentod" of Grieg, to furnish the necessary contrast. The playing, too, was spirited and brilliant to an exciting degree. It was a great night for soloists. Mme. Melba was received after both arias with tumultuous applause, so long-protracted after the waltz that she sang as an encore Tosti's "Serenata," to an accompaniment by Miss Sassoli on the harp. Miss Sassoli, too, is to be congratulated on finding a composition for harp and orchestra that did not bore people. Widor's Chorale and Variations are written so skilfully for harp, requiring the instrument to do only what it can do well, that the piece, brilliantly performed by Miss Sassoli, gave keen delight to everybody. As soloists the Messrs. Maquarre may also be mentioned, for their fine playing at the end of the Mendelssohn scherzo assumed the character of solo work, and was recognized as such by Mr. Gericke and by the audience. All told, the concert was an occasion of great playing of a fascinating programme. It was enjoyed by an audience that packed the hall, every seat and most of the standing room being occupied. R. R. G.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The concert of last night, given in aid of the Symphony Pension Fund, although it gave a long and important programme, does not call for detailed criticism, since all the playeds from Mme. Melba, Signorina Sassoli and Mr. Gericke, down to the drummer, gave their services in aid of a noble cause. The programme took on a more popular cast than one finds on Saturday nights, and was enjoyed from first to last. A tremendous audience, of high degree, was present.

Mme. Melba was on her native heath with two operatic arias—"Ah, fors' è lui," from "Traviata," and the waltz from "Romeo and Juliet,"—and, as the prohibitive rule relative to encore did not apply here as it does in the symphony concerts, the "horny-handed" had their opportunity and used it, forcing an encore, which was Mattei's "Serenata," with a cadenza written expressly for Mme. Melba. She sang this beautifully and was charmingly accompanied, on the harp, by Signorina Sassoli. Madame Melba was at her best in this concert.

A harp solo is rather at a disadvantage in Symphony Hall, yet Signorina Sassoli made an excellent impression with Widor's variations on a chorale theme. The final number of the programme, Handel's "Largo," introduced 5 harpers—Signorina Sassoli, Misses Raymah Dowse, Florence Nickerson and Fanny Hamilton and Mr. Schuecker. The stage looked as if a Welsh Elstedfodd were taking place.

The orchestra gave chiefly popular music, or rather the lightest works of some of the famous composers. Thomas's "Mignon" overture, Mendelssohn's "Nocturne and Scherzo" from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Tschalkowsky variations, and best of all the "Peer Gynt" Suite (No. 1) by Grieg. That all this was greatly enjoyed goes without saying. But back of it all was the excellent object of the concert. There are orchestras at present in almost every city of America, but among all of these there are but 6 that can by any stretch of the imagination be called permanent. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia, the Pittsburg, the Cincinnati, the Chicago and the New York Philharmonic. The "permanency" of at least 3 of these may be doubted. It means very much therefore to build an extra buttress, such as this pension fund, around our own band.

Speaking of the Philadelphia Orchestra (which, by the way, is coming to Boston in February) leads us to make mention of a commendable new departure inaugurated in connection with symphonic work by Mrs. E. I. Keffer and a number of other Philadelphia ladies. Symphony concerts are given in that city to the general public, the masses, at 10 cents admission! With such a beneficence in Philadelphia, and Arens' Cooper Institute Symphony concerts for the wage-earners in New York, is it not time to do something more than the Friday 25-cent gallery rush for the music-lovers with lean purses, in Boston? Louis C. Elson.

Hall.

BO1-02

Y ORCHESTRA.

KE, Conductor.

ERT

19, AT 8, P. M.

me.

VERTURE, op. So.

VIOLONCELLO, in D minor.

- Allegro maestoso.

antino con moto. — Allegro presto.
dante. — Allegro vivace.

POEM, No. 7, "Fest Klänge."

No. 7, in A major, op. 92.

- Vivace.

meno assai.

t:

ERARDY.

minutes before the Symphony.

124

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY. JANUARY 2. AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'ALBERT.

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Improvisatore."
(First time.)

AIRS.

a) AMBROISE THOMAS, ARIOSO from "Hamlet."

b) BIZET,

"QUAND LA FLAMME DE L'AMOUR," from "The Fair Maid of Perth."

LOEFFLER,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Death of Maurice Tin-tagiles," after the Drama of Maeterlinck.
(The viole d'amour is played by the Composer.)

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

a) MASSENET,

"TWILIGHT."

b) PERILHON,

"THE VIRGIN AT THE MANGER."

c) POISE,

SONG OF GILLES.

GLAZOUNOW,

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.

I. Andante: Allegro moderato.

II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.

III. Andante: Allegro.

(By request.)

Soloist:

Mr. CHARLES GILIBERT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

125

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Overture. "Improvvisatore".....D'Albert
Ralph's Air, from "The Fair Maid of Perth".....Bizet
"The Death of Tintagiles".....Loeffler
Songs with piano accompaniment.
Symphony No. 4, E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff
Soloist, M. Charles Gilibert.

D'Albert's overture began with a couple of startling explosions and then settled down into a deliberate attempt to be insouciant and rollicking. Humor of this sort is not contagious, and one could listen unmoved to the manufactured hilarity of the overture. We fancy that the operatic works of D'Albert and of Rubenstein will not greatly trouble the next generation.

As if in line with this jollity that was not jolly, there came a doleful bacchanalian song by Bizet, finely given by M. Gilibert. But this song—"Quand la Flamme de l'Amour"—was a work of genius, since its contradiction of emotions was intentional and intensely pathetic. It is the picture of a man, hopelessly in love, disdained by her whom he idolizes, seeking merriment in drink.

It was one of the most powerful temperance sermons ever heard in Symphony Hall. The strange "tra-la-las," half dejected, half ferocious, were perfectly interpreted by M. Gilibert, although the song seemed to lie a trifle too low for the best vocal effect. The recalls were many and well deserved.

The songs with piano accompaniment were also finely given. It is remarkable to find so heavy a voice as that of M. Gilibert, so excellently used in pianissimo passages and in light runs; the man is an artist to the finger tips.

Massenet's "Twilight" did not seem to say very much, nor did we find Perihon's "Virgin at the Manger" anything remarkable. Both seemed to be of that affected variety of Chanson that Grossmith used to parody so effectively. But the joyous song of Gilles, from Poise's opera, "Joli Gilles," was like a breath of pure country air.

"Here is the morning, the thrush is singing,"
A beautiful summer day 'tis bringing,
Here is the morning, the thrush is singing."

Simple words and simple mirth and joy of living! And these emotions M. Gilibert brought out so finely that the audience spent the ten minutes of intermission in trying to force an encore. But the laws of the symphonic Medes and Persians are immutable, and after half a dozen reappearances, M. Gilibert came out three times more, with many explanatory gestures. Finally the orchestra came back and the concert went on.

It was a delight to see Mr. Loeffler once more in his seat in the orchestra. He came to play the viol d'amour part in his symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." In this work the orchestral master has individualized the viol d'amour as Berlioz has made a personality out of the viola, in his "Childe Harold" symphony. If we once grant the school of morbidity and of extreme radicalism in progressions we must grant that M. Loeffler is a master.

Not Berlioz, not Richard Strauss, have done more with the orchestra in the matter of tone-colors, than this resident composer. And the representation of the two contending forces of Evil and Innocence, which is so prominent in this work, becomes more and more dignified with repeated hearing. Certain it is that Mr. Loeffler's compositions do not lose by familiarity.

The composer, who is known and appreciated by all Boston music-lovers, was called upon to bow his acknowledgements from the platform, at the end of the piece.

A touch of Russian symphony came at the end of the programme. We gladly concede to Russia many triumphs in the musical field. She may yet wrest the sceptre of tonal supremacy from Germany. May her victories of the future be confined to this field, where they help human progress. The work has been so recently played (last October) that we need only record the fact that a second hearing emphasizes the impressions of the first. It is a Muscovite Pastorale. Its second movement is a gem. It is a melodic work and proves that one need not leave tune in order to write advanced music.

Louis C. Elson

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seldom So Many Vacant Seats
as Seen Last Night.

B Herald — Jan 3 1904
The Overture to D'Albert's Opera,
"The Improvisatore," a Symphony by Glazounoff and a Symphonic Poem by Loeffler, "The Death of Tintagiles," Are Given.

The programme of the 10th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore" (first time).....D'Albert
Air, "Quand la Flamme," from "The Fair Maid of Perth".....Bizet poem, "The Death of Tintagiles".....Loeffler

 "Twilight".....Massenet
 "The Virgin at the Manger".....Perilhou
 Song of Gilles from "Joli Gilles".....Poise
 Symphony No. 4 in E flat (by request).....Glazounoff

The fury of the storm kept many at home. Seldom have there been so many vacant seats at a Symphony concert.

The overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore," was played here for the first time. It has been performed at Symphony concerts in Chicago and Cincinnati. The music is purposely carnivalesque. It is ostensibly light and gay, but these qualities are superficial. The music is not shot through with merriment and recklessness. The themes of a sparkling overture should have distinction; otherwise the overture will not sparkle. Nor is there in this music the imperious reminder of popular chatter and turmoil. A would-be profound composer here would fain scintillate.

The first theme is effectively announced, but the second theme is comic opera, and not of the first class. The best part of the work is its orchestral dress, and the variegated costume covers a naturally phlegmatic body. Auber did this sort of thing much better. Some years ago D'Albert gave a memorable performance of Beethoven's G major concerto at a Symphony concert—it was his second visit to Boston. The wonder is that a man who had such an uncommon gift of interpretation should itch like any young Frenchman for stage reputation. He has written seven operas within 10 years. These operas have seen the footlights; they have been reviewed solemnly and at length, and they live in music lexicons.

Glazounoff's symphony played last October gave many so much pleasure that they asked for a repetition. The music is melodious, fluent, brilliant, and not without elegance. There are symphonies which are said to be great and do not give pleasure. It is a good thing to have occasionally a symphony that has not this singular attribute of greatness. Mr. Loeffler's symphony poem was played for the fourth time; the second performance of the revised version.

The characteristics of this highly imaginative work have been discussed here more than once, and at length, and it is not necessary to catalogue again the many beauties. It is a unique composition, not on account of its subject, for Leon Dubois has written music for the same little tragedy for marionettes; not because of the viol d'armour, which was played in a masterly manner by the composer; but by reason of the invention and the treatment. The day has gone by when Maeterlinck can be dismissed contemptuously as a "decadent," especially by those who have never read his plays; and with that day has gone the idea that a composer who finds suggestion in the dramas must necessarily be "morbid." "The Death of Tintagiles" is no more morbid than death itself; and "decadent," in the true meaning of the word, may be applied to Marlowe, Shakespeare, Sir Thomas Browne, DeQuincey, Keats, Pater, Yeats—a highly respectable list, one that might be recommended by the most prudent professor of composition and rhetoric in a young ladies' seminary.

Mr. Loeffler has caught the spirit of various Maeterlinckian moods, and expressed them in peculiarly original music. He does not try to retell the tragedy in music; he puts into music his impressions of the story of the boy Tintagiles, his sisters, and their fearful and vain struggle against the old queen in the tower of the dark castle. His symbolism, as that of Maeterlinck, is human. Nor is it necessary to know the tragedy in order to be moved by the music. Such imaginative music is rare. While the composer is alive, it is characterized as odd, strange, and by some it is called "wonderful, no doubt, but unintelligible"; the composer at last dies; the next generation decides that he was a genius; it ridicules the dull ears that did not appreciate the power and beauty of his music, and it also neglects, or does not recognize, the imaginative of its own period.

Mr. Gilbert sang with rare skill. A comedian of the first order, he distinguished between the concert and the operatic stage, and did not overstep the boundary line. By his flawless diction, by vocal proficiency, by his knowledge of the value of tonal color, by personal authority and magnetism, he turned trifles into consummate works of art. The audience called and recalled him, but the traditions were respected, and Mr. Gilbert could only bow repeatedly his thanks. P Hale

B Globe Jan 3 1904

The popular French baritone, Charles Gilbert, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, his contributions comprising an aria from Bizet's opera, "The Fair Maid of Perth," and songs by Massenet, Perilhou and Poise. The orchestral numbers were d'Albert's overture to "The Improvisatore," Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" and Glazounoff's fourth symphony. Mr Loeffler played the viol d'amour in his own work, and Mr Zach was the piano accompanist for Mr Gilbert's group of songs. D'Albert's overture, which was played for the first time at these concerts, proved to be a delightful novelty, brilliantly and elaborately orchestrated and full of the carnival spirit. It has a swing and dash and tonal coloring which is a splendid reflex of holiday jollity, the percussion episodes are very cleverly introduced, the themes are catchy bits of melody and the work is scored in a masterly way and without undue stress given to dissonant and inharmonious modulations. It is a right down merry composition, pleasing to the ear, and it was played in the happiest mood by the orchestra.

Mr Gilbert's vocal work deserves high praise, although doubtless a song or two more in the lighter vein would not have been taken amiss by the audience. Few baritones there are whose tones are as sweet or whose phrasing and coloring are more artistic, and in each of his songs the sentiments were expressed with a skill in contrasts which were marked examples of vocal art of a high quality. The abandon in the Bizet aria, with its devil-may-care "tra la la"; the beautiful and restful "Twilight" of Massenet, the sweet sanctity of the Perilhou hymnal and the rollicking "Joli Gilles" of Poise were voiced in delightful cadences, and after each aria the singer was greeted with hearty applause.

Mr Loeffler was received with great favor after the close of the performance of his work. His symphonic poem is a composition which from its elaborate nature and complexity of scoring appeals largely to the advanced student or professional musician, and its great merits find proper recognition mainly in the ranks of those who might be called musical experts. The orchestra performed the piece in a thoroughly sympathetic manner. In the first part of the Glazounoff overture the thematic bits were juggled deftly by the different contingents; the second movement showed harmonious ensemble work by the strings, and the closing part, the most difficult of the three, was given with proper fortissimo effect.

Mr E. Busoni will be this week's soloist, playing Henselt's F minor concerto for piano. The other selections will be the overture "Les Barbares," Saint-Saens; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

GILBERT SINGS IN GOOD VOICE

Symphony Novelty Was "Improvisatore" Light Overture by D'Albert.

GLAZOUNOFF SECOND TIME

Loeffler's Tragic "Tintagiles" Poem Repeated and Played by the Author.

The "Improvisatore" music of D'Albert, which began last evening's Symphony program, would not be accepted as an overture in the usual operatic sense, but rather as a preparatory introduction, not drawing hints and themes from forthcoming scenes, but rather outlining the environment and suggesting the atmosphere in which they would pass—making the mind ready for these conditions, so to speak, so that the action might come as a surprise.

The story is romantic, passionate and touches tragedy, but its chief events transpire during the lively, noisy, cheery carnival time, when disguise, intrigue and counterplot are so common and so expected that they may hide treachery and danger as easily as they mask love and chivalry.

This short introduction is therefore all gay, tripping, light of emphasis, careless of mood and preludes the general merrymaking through which are to glide the personages whose fates, inclusive of happy possibilities, shall yet come close to the verge of deathly peril. For encouraging a disposition of easy yet eager attention, in unison with the most buoyant epoch of the year, these pages are capitally contrived and they were turned off smartly by the orchestra.

Deeply Influenced.

Mr. Loeffler's orchestral poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," again carried an attent and deeply influenced the assembly through the dreadful episodes of Maeterlinck's tragedy, the horrors and cruelties of which seem so needless to relate, since they point to no possible parallel that might be averted by a knowledge of them.

They wring the heart to no purpose, unless it be to contrast against them the tender beauty of such love as that of Ygraine for her delicate little brother. As heretofore, Mr. Loeffler's ideality and his power of symbolizing it in the form of melody and the colors of instrumentation were potent from the beginning of the poem to the end—in the early threats of violent power in the rumorous drums and trumpets, in the dull darkness and the bitter storm that rises to fury in its rage; in the soft, gentle conference of the girl and the child, and the wail and woe of their dark and savage separation; in the crash of the fatal doorway, and in the peace, relief and benediction that follows after the catastrophe.

These are spiritually and morally, rather than intellectually and specifically, expressed in the score, and the intensity with which the progress of the tragedy is enforced was heightened by Mr. Loeffler's presence in the orchestra to play the viola d'amour part, which expresses the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, victim of a power he cannot comprehend in a fate that is all mystery.

Composition of Fancies.

The Glazounoff symphony (in E flat, No. 4) was again much enjoyed on this second hearing and showed itself more clearly for what it is—a composition more of fancies and psychical states than of thought, reflection and calculation. The three parts appear to express in a general scope, languorous, amatory, tranquillizing happiness; busy, animated, active, restless mirthfulness; and high-spirited, positive, vigorous, wilful vitality, emphatic in assertion, ready and fertile in motion, ardent, full and high-pulsed in temper.

In the first movement long-drawn, pensive, sentimental melody prevails, which in the second becomes fluent, swift and sparkling, while in the third the obvious theme which opens it mildly soon gives way to large, varied and rich-colored development, full of technical skill and strength. Thoughtful feeling, lively resolution and energetic execution seem to make the sequence.

Mr. Gilbert's contributions brought great pleasure and elicited from one forced itself upon his neighbors, was largely of his foreign experiences and advantages, this lofty commendation: "Do you know, now, that fellow's really a very creditable singer?"

Took Wide Range.

Mr. Gilbert's four selections took a wide range. He began with the cynical, forced, hollow merriment and the actual, bitter despair of Ralph's hopeless soliloquy in Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth," and ended with the bubbling bucolic delight of Gilles' "Vofel le Matin, la Grive a Chante," including between these Massenet's "Twilight" and Perillou's "Virgin by the Manger," sung in fine mezza-voice, with perfect and tranquil sostenuto and quiet delicacy, the comedian spirit and the big voice yielding primacy to the sensitive, reserved artist. Mr. Zach accompanied the three chansons altogether well.

At the next concert Mr. Busoni will make his reëntree in the Henselt F minor piano concerto. Saint Saens' "Barbarians" overture will have its first hearing; and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Franck's "Chasseur Maudit" poem will also be played.

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra 1903-04

Owing to the severity of the storm, there was an unfortunately small audience at the last Symphony concert—unfortunately, because it was one of the most agreeable of the season. This was the programme, Mr. Charles Gilbert being the soloist:

D'Albert: Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore."

(First time.)

Bizet: "Quand la Flamme de L'Amour," from "The Fair Maid of Perth."

Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Maurice Tintagiles," after the drama of Maeterlinck.

(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)

Songs with Pianoforte—

Massenet: "Twilight."

Perillou: "The Virgin at the Manger."

Poise: Song of Gilles.

Glazounow: Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.

(By request.)

The new work produced was D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," first brought out in Berlin in February, 1902. With little melody of distinction or of charm, this composition is yet so delightfully rhythmical, so skilfully orchestrated, and so lively in spirit that its hearing was truly a pleasure. Its performance, indeed, pleased the audience so well that it would seem to be a wise plan to bring forward other overtures of the opéra comique order: some by Auber, two or three by Rossini. The overture to "Semiramide" would be interesting to hear from a fine orchestra, and that to Nicolai's "Merry Wives" has not been heard here in a long while.

Another excellent move of Mr. Gericke's is to repeat in the same season works that, on their first production, were enthusiastically received. At this concert, for instance, he played again Glazounow's fourth symphony, which was first brought out here only last October, and it is safe to say that at the second hearing the work sounded even more brilliant and charming, if not of intrinsically greater worth, than it did at its first. It is much to be wished that Mr. Gericke would adopt this plan oftener, particularly in connection with works that are at first difficult of comprehension, like the "Heldenleben," "Barbarossa," etc.

Of most consequence Saturday was the second performance here in its final arrangement of Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama by Maeterlinck, a composition that aroused tremendous enthusiasm in 1901. To appreciate the many beauties of this score of Mr. Loeffler's, its richness of picturesque suggestion, its flashes and gleams of lovely color, its tenderness, its passion and its climax of horribleness, no fervid admiration of Maeterlinck is needful; and yet it seems as though Mr. Loeffler's musical illustration of the drama must fully satisfy the most rabid devotees of the Belgian poet. Now that Maeterlinck himself, however is turning from the unreal to the real, abandoning "Dramas for Marionettes," for plays of flesh and blood, like "Monna Vanna," would it not be well for Mr. Loeffler to follow his illustrious example? Despite its musical beauties, now more clearly in evidence than ever before, "The Death of Tintagiles" made a much less profound impression last week than it did three years ago. At present a healthy interest in the doings of live human beings is pushing into outer darkness the curiosity men felt a few years ago concerning the movements and repeated ejaculations of the pale puppets of mystic symbolism. The orchestra played this composition grandly, as, indeed, it played the entire programme.

Mr. Gilbert, as always, entranced everybody by the exquisite quality of his art. Again it can only be said of him that now, since Victor Maurel has retired from the stage, there is no man singer before the public with so perfect a legato, so absolute a control of breath, such fine feeling in phrasing, so keen a feeling for tonal color, such admiral diction, and so remarkable power of projecting his meaning on the minds (and hearts) of his hearers, as Mr. Gilbert. On Saturday he was received with applause that threatened to turn the symphony concert into a song recital. France may be proud of him.

At this week's concert Mr. Ferruccio Busoni is to reappear in Boston, his former home. The programme will be as follows: Overture to "Les Barbares" (first time), Saint-Saëns; Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Henselt; Poème Symphonique, "Le Chasseur Maudit," César Franck; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

R. R. G.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

TRAGIC OVERTURE.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Ideale."

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT.

gentleman whose conversation, as it forced itself upon his neighbors, was largely of his foreign experiences and advantages, this lofty commendation: "Do you know, now, that fellow's really a very creditable singer?"

Took Wide Range.

Mr. Gilbert's four selections took a wide range. He began with the cynical, forced, hollow merriment and the actual, bitter despair of Ralph's hopeless soliloquy in Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth," and ended with the bubbling bucolic delight of Gilles' "Viel le Matin, la Grive a Chante," including between these Massenet's "Twilight" and Perillou's "Virgin by the Manger," sung in fine mezza-voce, with perfect and tranquil sostenuto and quiet delicacy, the comedian spirit and the big voice yielding primacy to the sensitive, reserved artist.

Mr. Zach accompanied the three chansons altogether well.

At the next concert Mr. Busoni will make his rentree in the Henselt F minor piano concerto. Saint Saens' "Barbarians" overture will have its first hearing, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Franck's "Chasseur Maudit" poem will also be played.

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

Owing to the severity of the storm, there was an unfortunately small audience at the last Symphony concert—unfortunately, because it was one of the most agreeable of the season. This was the programme, Mr. Charles Gilbert being the soloist:

D'Albert: Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore."

(First time.)

Bizet: "Quand la Flamme de L'Amour," from "The Fair Maid of Perth."

Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Maurice Tintagiles," after the drama of Maeterlinck.

(The violé d'amour is played by the composer.)

Songs with Pianoforte—

Massenet: "Twilight."

Perillou: "The Virgin at the Manger."

Poise: Song of Gilles.

Glazounow: Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.

(By request.)

The new work produced was D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," first brought out in Berlin in February, 1902. With little melody of distinction or of charm, this composition is yet so delightfully rhythmical, so skilfully orchestrated, and so lively in spirit that its hearing was truly a pleasure. Its performance, indeed, pleased the audience so well that it would seem to be a wise plan to bring forward other overtures of the opéra comique order: some by Auber, two or three by Rossini. The overture to "Semiramide" would be interesting to hear from a fine orchestra, and that to Nicolai's "Merry Wives" has not been heard here in a long while.

Another excellent move of Mr. Gericke's is to repeat in the same season works that, on their first production, were enthusiastically received. At this concert, for instance, he played again Glazounow's fourth symphony, which was first brought out here only last October, and it is safe to say that at the second hearing the work sounded even more brilliant and charming, if not of intrinsically greater worth, than it did at its first. It is much to be wished that Mr. Gericke would adopt this plan oftener, particularly in connection with works that are at first difficult of comprehension, like the "Heldenleben," "Barbarossa," etc.

Of most consequence Saturday was the second performance here in its final arrangement of Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama by Maeterlinck, a composition that aroused tremendous enthusiasm in 1901. To appreciate the many beauties of this score of Mr. Loeffler's, its richness of picturesque suggestion, its flashes and gleams of lovely color, its tenderness, its passion and its climax of horribleness, no fervid admiration of Maeterlinck is needful; and yet it seems as though Mr. Loeffler's musical illustration of the drama must fully satisfy the most rabid devotees of the Belgian poet. Now that Maeterlinck himself, however is turning from the unreal to the real, abandoning "Dramas for Marionettes," for plays of flesh and blood, like "Monna Vanna," would it not be well for Mr. Loeffler to follow his illustrious example? Despite its musical beauties, now more clearly in evidence than ever before, "The Death of Tintagiles" made a much less profound impression last week than it did three years ago. At present a healthy interest in the doings of live human beings is pushing into outer darkness the curiosity men felt a few years ago concerning the movements and repeated ejaculations of the pale puppets of mystic symbolism. The orchestra played this composition grandly, as, indeed, it played the entire programme.

Mr. Gilbert, as always, entranced everybody by the exquisite quality of his art. Again it can only be said of him that now, since Victor Maurel has retired from the stage, there is no man singer before the public with so perfect a legato, so absolute a control of breath, such fine feeling in phrasing, so keen a feeling for tonal color, such admiral diction, and so remarkable power of projecting his meaning on the minds (and hearts) of his hearers, as Mr. Gilbert. On Saturday he was received with applause that threatened to turn the symphony concert into a song recital. France may be proud of him.

At this week's concert Mr. Ferruccio Busoni is to reappear in Boston, his former home. The programme will be as follows: Overture to "Les Barbares" (first time), Saint-Saëns; Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Henselt; Poème Symphonique, "Le Chasseur Maudit," César Franck; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

R. R. G.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

TRAGIC OVERTURE.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Ideale."

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLF KRASSETT.

Miss Lillian Blauvelt.

Copyright, 1897, by Almé Dupont, New York.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAËNS,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Barbarians."
(First time.)

ROSSINI,

ARIA, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville."

CÆSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wild Huntsman."

a) CAMPRA,
b) DELIBES,
c) VERDI,

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

"CHARMANT PAPILLON."

"POURQUOI."

"SICILIAN VESPERES."

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56.

I. Andante con moto: Allegro un poco agitato,

II. Vivace non troppo.

III. Adagio.

IV. Allegro vivacissimo, Allegro maestoso assai.

Soloist:

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Miss Lillian Blauvelt.

Copyright, 1897, by Aimé Dupont, New York.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAËNS,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Barbarians."
(First time.)

ROSSINI,

ARIA, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville."

CÆSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wild Huntsman."

a) CAMPRA,
b) DELIBES,
c) VERDI,

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
"CHARMANT PAPILLON."
"POURQUOI."
"SICILIAN VESPERS."

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56.
I. Andante con moto: Allegro un poco agitato,
II. Vivace non troppo.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo, Allegro maestoso assai.

Soloist:

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Traveler Jan. 11 1904 THE SYMPHONY

Overture to the Opera "The Barbarians".... Saint-Saëns
(First time.)
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville"..... Rossini
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman"..... Cesar Franck
Songs with Pianoforte—
"Charmant Papillon"..... Campra
"Pourquoi"..... Delibes
"Sicilian Vespers"..... Verdi
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56..... Mendelssohn

Surely there was variety enough and to spare so far as the names of the composers who figured in the latest Symphony concert were concerned. On paper it looked like the promise of an evening of many moods and tenses; yet curiously enough there was a vein of sameness through all the works set forth. The beads were parti-colored, but the string was pretty nearly of one texture.

Take, for instance, Saint-Saëns' overture to "The Barbarians," his very recent opera. That it is the work of cool old age is patent enough; add to this Saint-Saëns' ever-besetting lack of real power and emotional stress, and we have a musical picture of barbarians who would have welcomed silk hats and boutonnières. The music is neat, melodious, beautifully scored and pleasing in every way. Had it been called "The Salonites" it would be accepted as, in a way, a work of genius.

Again, consider Cesar Franck's tone poem anent the blasphemous huntsman who was accursed most effectively for disturbing the Sunday morning devotions of the faithful. Beautiful as a portion of the work is, noble as is the religious sentiment it reveals, it falls short of greatness in that it fails to rise to the terror and weirdness of the ride of the condemned man. We are used to tremendous equine effects in music; Wagner, Bizet and Raff have given their respective horses such fiery gallops that the ambling of Franck's palfrey seems a bit lacking in interest. The work is broad and beautiful, at any rate, and it was played in an absolutely perfect way.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is familiar—too familiar. We lose sight of its many beauties by an almost yearly repetition of its somewhat cloying melodiousness. And yet, who ever depicted Gaelic music as well? The exquisitely dainty scherzo, the tender love song andante, the paean of joy at the finale—all are examples of music at its most refined and charming point. Played once in ten years this symphony would have its hearers spell-bound.

Mme. Blauvelt sang with her accustomed purity and taste; yet the "Barber" aria made little real effect. We are spoiled along these lines by one consummately great Rosina. In the songs with piano she was much more successful, giving each with a clean-cut brilliancy of style that was good to hear.

ITALIAN PIANIST WILL REAPPEAR AT SYMPHONY

Journal Jan. 8. 1904
Overture From "Barbarians" Will Be Given.

The Symphony concert and rehearsal of this week will have the advantage of the Boston rentree of Ferruccio Busoni, the Italian pianist, who is not only a master of resplendent, powerful and almost limitless technique, but is a man of inventive genius and independent judgment in regard to the literature he elects to present upon his instrument.

Born only a few miles from Florence, in 1866, he has become almost Germanized by marriage and association and has attained eminence by his devotion to Bach. He visited Boston about ten years ago, played with the Symphony Orchestra, which produced a curious and striking study of his in tone-colorings, held a chair of pianism at the New England Conservatory for a couple of years and then abruptly returned to Europe, where he has since played and taught, receiving particular honors from the court at Berlin.

He has chosen for this occasion the F-minor concerto of Henselt, which is not intrinsically too difficult for good players of the second rank to manage, but which still gives opportunity for one of original spirit and genius to do great things with its changeful spirituality. It has been played here by Joseffy, Mills, Fanny Bloomfield and Sauer and other distinguished artists, as also by some local pianists.

The overture will be Saint Saëns' recent "The Barbarians," introduced last season by Theodore Thomas, but entirely new here. The symphony will be Mendelssohn's ever delightful "Scotch," and for the central number will be repeated Cesar Franck's musical version of the "Wild Huntsman" legend—a work attributable rather to his religious sentiment than to any distinctly dramatic feeling, for his heart was clearly rather with the Sabbath services and their desecration by the courtly hunter than with the latter's curse and headlong, ceaseless haste to perdition.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni being delayed by the weather, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, at short notice, assumed the role of soloist at the eleventh symphony concert, held in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening. This was the programme: Jan. 15. 04
Saint-Saëns: Overture to the opera "The Barbarians."

(First time.)
Rossini: Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville."
Cesar Franck: Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman."
Songs with Pianoforte—
Campra: "Charmant Papillon."
Delibes: "Pourquoi."
Verdi: "Sicilian Vespers."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) Op. 56.

The concert opened with a new work by Saint-Saëns, the overture to his opera "Les Barbares," produced at the Opéra of Paris in October, 1901. The libretto, rehearsing the story of a horde of Teutonic barbarians who, in the first century of this era, invaded the Gallic town of Orange, setting forth their adventures of love and revenge, is vividly illustrated by the overture, which might well be called a symphonic poem. To judge from the music Saint-Saëns has imagined for this bloody tale, the inhabitants of Orange must have been a languorous and luxurious class of people, like unto those who lived in fair Capua or in Sybaris. And the "barbares!" They were, according to Saint-Saëns, barbarous in very truth, of the kind who would march against an enemy blowing on conch shells and bursting into warwhoops, trusting to subdue their foe by din rather than by prowess of fighting. The overture, in short, like all else Saint-Saëns has produced, is well written, with flowing and pleasant strains to suggest the invaded, with harsh and uncouth measures to typify the invaders. To find in it, however, a musical idea that has genuine value, would not be easy. The work was admirably played.

Of more moment than the overture, although it has been played here before, is Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," in which the composer of "Les Béatitudes" attempts a musical picture of the Wild Huntsman, who, for love of the chase, neglected to care for his soul, even winding his horn of a Sunday morning, in defiance of the church bells; his horse refused to carry him, his horn to sound; till, at last, deserted by all his followers, the hunter became the hunted, and that by a pack of demons from hell; and they hunt him to this day, through darkness and through light.

Despite its many passages of singular beauty, in particular, its peaceful, religious beginning, "Le Chasseur Maudit" is not one of this great master's strongest works. Cesar Franck, the mystic, who imagined music for a string quartet that uplifts and purifies the soul like a solemn high mass at the Cathedral of Amiens; who, in "The Beatitudes," found phrases worthy of the words of Christ; who, in the same work, depicted the sufferings of the Mater Dol-rosa with accents of acutest woe; Cesar Franck was not the man to portray the devil or any of his works. They were too foreign to his nature. Nor has he shown, in any composition performed here, the sympathy with the natural world, as Vincent d'Indy has done, that would enable him successfully to deal with a legend like the "Wild Huntsman." More interesting by far would it have been to revive his symphony, a work impossible to hear too often. The poem was beautifully played, far better than the Mendelssohn symphony, which received but a torpid performance. And yet this music of Mendelssohn's is hardly to be sniffed at; after what had come before, it seemed positively refreshing.

Mme. Blauvelt was unfortunate. With great lack of judgment, she chose to sing "Una Voce," a song effective only on the stage, with dramatic action and, furthermore, a song written for mezzo-soprano. A soprano attempting it must either dwell over much on tones unfavorable to her quality of voice, or else twist the melody out of all shape. Its accompaniment, too, was but languidly played. Still more unfortunate was Mme. Blauvelt with Verdi's brilliant bolero, which absolutely demands an orchestral accompaniment. She was, however, more successful in this piece, singing it glibly and smoothly, with an agreeable quality of voice.

This week there will be no symphony concert. The next programme, at which a soloist still unannounced will sing, is as follows: Overture to "Frithof" (first time), Dubois; Suite, "In Carnival Time" (first time), Schumann; Symphony in A minor, Rubinstein.
R. R. G.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Owing to the prevailing epidemic of belatedness among railroad trains, Mr. Busoni, who was announced as the soloist for the 11th concert in the Boston symphony's present season, was unable to appear, and Mme Lillian Blauvelt, who was opportunely in the vicinity, was the soloist in his place.

This was the Brooklyn singer's first Boston appearance since her recent successful concert tour in Great Britain, and must have left her without any doubt about her being in the house of her friends. In a very fetching fur-trimmed costume, with cocked hat to match, she made a pleasing picture against the background of somber-coated symphony players, and sang in a most dramatic manner the cavatina, "A Little Voice I Heard," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville."

Her vocal method seems to gain something with each hearing; and this time it is perhaps as much in the direction of coloratura as in any other one characteristic. While her delivery of the amusing lines of the wilful Rossini heroine was possibly better than the role has been sung in some grand opera seasons, it was in the fanciful "Why?" by Delibes and the more vivacious Verdi "Bolero," from the "Sicilian Vespers," that the most captivating phase of her undeniable art was reached.

Rarely has any American singer succeeded in so completely blending the sentiment and the melody.

The piano accompaniment to the "Butterfly" song by Campa, played by Mr Zach, proved to be too loud, and its judicious modulation in the two succeeding numbers made a great improvement.

The Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony was played delightfully, as it always is by this admirably trained organization. There were in it no traces of either blurring or slurring. From the andante introduction, born, as the composer himself has written, during his visit to Holyrood palace in 1829, to the allegro "Gathering of the Clans" with its wild skirling of Highland airs at its close, it is full of majestic power. The pastoral quietness of the vales of "sweet Afton," and the fierce war marching of Ettrick and Teviotdale clansmen is in its vivid picturing, and the orchestral interpretation was richly deserving of the repeated "bravas" it received.

The only "first time" number of the program was the opening one—the overture to the Saint-Saens opera of "The Barbarians," which was originally produced at a Paris concert in 1901. The themes are taken from the opera, and there is no attempt in it to follow the classic form of the overture.

The opera dealing with the time of the invasion of Gaul by Cimbrians and Teutons, 113 B C, the orchestration follows the ancient forms to a marked degree, yet in a singularly melodious manner. It was an ideal initial number for a symphony program, and the great audience appreciated its beauty in no uncertain way.

The Cesar Franck "symphonic poem," called "The Wild Huntsman," has been given but twice before in Boston, in 1898, and again in 1901, and its weirdness in this repetition was a savage contrast to the more harmonious charms of the other parts of the program.

The composition opens with the Sabbath chimes predominant, but this is soon disturbed by the sound of the wild hunter's sacrilegious horn. As far as it is possible the orchestration represents the conflict between the good and evil influences which seize the mad count, urging him to one or the other extreme, and ends in the suggestions of eternal punishment which such a scoffer is supposed to have visited upon him for his misdoing.

As in the other features of the program the players perfectly interpreted the conductor's reading, and the hearing was an instructive one, if not quite so popularly enjoyable as other parts prove to be.

There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. The special features of the program for the 12th concert Saturday evening, Jan 23, will be a "first time" performance of Dubois' overture from "Frithof," a "first time" suite, "In Carnival Time," by Georg Schumann; Rubenstein's A minor symphony, and two arias, the soloist to be announced later.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saint-Saens Overture Given
Here for First Time.

B. Handel. P. Hall Jan 10 1904
Music of "The Barbarians" Heard by Boston Music Lovers—Roman-

the Pieces by Franck and Mendelssohn Also on the Programme —Mme. Blauvelt the Soloist.

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke's conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "The Barbarians".....Saint-Saens
(First time.)
Rosina's cavatina from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman".....Franck
Songs, "Charming Butterfly".....Campa
"Why".....Delibes
Bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Symphony in A minor, "Scotch".....Mendelssohn

The overture to "The Barbarians" was played for the first time in Boston. It served originally as the prologue to the opera produced in Paris in 1901. After introductory music the stage curtains were drawn apart and the amphitheatre at Orange was disclosed. A Reciter, Delmas, the baritone, appeared and told how Germans invading Gaul before Christ's birth drove all before them; but Floria, the beautiful Vestal, found a way to stop them; and then the Goddess avenged in the blood of the conqueror the sacrilegious sacrifice of Floria's body. There was music in this scene. The curtains closed again, and there was orchestral music to the beginning of the first act. This prologue was arranged by the composer as a concert overture and played at a Colonne concert in Paris, Dec. 1, 1901. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1902.

When he was nearly 60 years old Saint-Saens went back to Grecian and Roman legends for sources of musical inspiration. Cynical, or rather ironical, in his treatment of "Phryne," that glory of a very old and once highly esteemed profession, he was appropriately tragic in the music to "Delanira." Then came "The Barbarians," and the next year the music to "Parysatis," and now his "Helen of Troy" is ready for Monte Carlo. May he be as fortunate with the story of the face "that launched a thousand ships" as was Offenbach. But Saint-Saens is now in his 69th year, and his music was never distinguished for sensuous quality or passionate intensity. Perhaps it would be well for him to treat Helen, as Phryne, with courteous irony.

The first opera librettists chose tales and legends of Greece and Rome as well as stories from these mythologies; and for years their example was piously followed. The French musicians, as well as painters, have clung to the classics, and the influence of Latin and Greek literature is observed today even among the symbolists and their disciples, as well as among such neo-pagans as Marcel Schwob and Pierre Louys. Saint-Saens has tried the historical, the romantic lyric drama, and now he is frankly classical. He has always displayed classic qualities in his operas as well as in his symphonies, symphonic poems, chamber music: simplicity of line, effects of outlines, an avoidance of encumbering detail, discretion in expression. He has now reached the age, alas, if we may judge by the latest works that have been played here, when his facility of expression is far more marked than his invention. "And desire shall fail," said the Preacher King in Jerusalem. Saint-Saens, we fear, has reached the evil days when ideas fail.

His qualities of expression are again revealed in this overture, but the ideas are few and unimportant. Where is the potent suggestion of tragedy? Where is the picture of wild invaders and despairing folk? This music is as cold as an ancient, half-effaced fresco. Compare with this music of an invading barbaric host, the overture to Chabonier's "Gwendoline," an opera with a like subject, for in each an invading hero is captivated by the beauty of a woman. In Saint-Saens' music there is no rush, no fury. The passion is that of a chess player who believes in his own system of moves. Nor is this music superbly decorative. Let us hope that the thought of Helen of Troy has warmed his blood or at least inspired him to a song of amorous regret.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem in illustration of Buerger's ballad "The Wild Huntsman" was played here for the third time. It grows in effect with each hearing, yet the opening episode of the Sunday scene and that of the chase still seem the more imaginative. The curse and the wild hunt are not so poignantly portrayed. Franck was first of all a mystic; his best and most characteristic music is that of contemplation, not of action, and least of all demoniac action. He knew how to express admirably the voices complaining of the count's mad chase that brought the curse; for his compassion and love embraced the universe; but what had that pure soul to do with the Wild Huntsman and his hellish attendants? His imagination had to stoop to such a scene. He could no more have written the music for the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" or the Evocation of the Nuns in "Robert the Devil," than he could have imagined the song of Charpentier's Louise to her lover, that song both of shy confession and womanly exultation, or the cafe scene in "La Boheme." For of Franck it might have been said: "He hath an angel," not "He hath a devil."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, like his overture, "Fingal's Cave," always gives a certain pleasure. Here we have revealed the talent of Mendelssohn, the talent of the landscapist in music. It is true that, although the composer visited Scotland, he still saw the land as from the top of Sinai. There is still the Jewish feeling that is so appropriate in the music to Racine's tragedy; and, if Mendelssohn had played a bagpipe, no doubt it would have sounded like a shofar. But there is, at all events, a landscape with atmosphere in this symphony; and there is the suggestion of ballads of the border, the thought of "old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago." The scherzo is today the freshest of the movements, and that is the one most characteristically Scottish.

Mme. Blauvelt, who took at short notice the place of the tempest tossed and delayed Eusebi, has a voice of fine quality, which is, however, without pronounced individuality, and makes no personal appeal. She sang fluently and with a certain degree of brilliance the familiar cavatina from "The Barber." Her production of low tones might be criticised, for the contrast in quality was strongly marked, and one thought of Wordsworth's line, "Two voices are there." This defect was naturally not so noticeable in the group of songs. The song by Campa she sang simply as a well trained singer. She did not suggest the melancholy of it all—the flight of years, the vanity of all things, the inevitable gray days and nights that follow a life of coquetry.

This song has a Watteau character; it has the same melancholy elegance, the same polished recognition of the inherent emptiness of desire. There was more of a personal note, more of emotional revelation in Delibes' song, but the bolero was again merely a study in bravura—and this bolero without orchestral accompaniment is like unto cold veal.

The euphony of the orchestra was as distinguished as ever, and the different compositions were read with the minute attention to detail and with the care for relative proportions that characterize Mr. Gericke as a conductor. Yet there was breadth, there was sympathy, and in "The Wild Huntsman" there was the fitting romantic expression.

MME. BLAUVELT SYMPHONY STAR

Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" Overture Proves to Be Program's Novelty.

There are in the story of "Les Barbares," upon which Saint-Saens built his opera of that name, and the overture to which received its first Boston placing in the eleventh Symphony program, some points that recall the disgusting and debasing play, "The Conquerors," tolerated at the Hollis Street Theater a few seasons ago.

Nearly 2000 years separate the epochs of the actions, but in each an invading horde of Teutons has overwhelmed the defensive French and the Romans who in the early actions would aid them. In each a victorious commander is seized with base desire for a pure and beautiful woman of the country, and offers to stay his devastating hand if she will yield herself to him. In the modern play he is shown as brutal enough to attempt such possession by violence; but in Sardou's old-time story the vestal virgin, patriotic and also fascinated, consents to the sacrifice, the people condoning her sin with difficulty.

Festivities in City.

Festivities and solemn processions are seen in the city, the chief of the latter being one in which the international lovers are glorified, and one in which is borne the corpse of the French consul, who had been killed in action. The widow shrewdly makes the doubly-conquering commander admit his deed, ys him with his own sword, she had torn from her husband's body. The overture is based upon themes and is presented in the opera, which has several distinct episodes. First, of lugubrious woe, a minor strain, lamenting over the roll of muffled drums; then an agitated and excited one; then one quite plaintive and passive; then a rush and sweep into gaiety, and finally a grave and gloomy period, with heavy, counterpointing basses, and then the hurry, crash and decisiveness of the coda and finale. In the original production, which was at the Paris Opera in October, 1901, these episodes were connected by comments narrated by the tragedian, Delmas, but are now united by short trumpet recitatives.

Besides this overture, which might have been delivered more melodramatically, the orchestra played Franck's musical version of the old "Wild Huntsman" legend, recalling the impious Sabbath hunting of the wicked count and his profanation of the holy rites; his desertion by his comrades and the refusal of his horse to follow and of his horn to be wound; the curse visited upon him, and his aimless, endless flight across the dreading and hating world.

In A Minor.

The Symphony was Mendelssohn in A minor, usually called the "Scotch," because during that visit to Scotland which influenced him so much he felt the impressions and found the fancies which made so many of his pages beautiful and touching. In it one feels the sadness associated with the tragedy of Mary of Scotland's life and its fatal power over the careless and luckless Rizzio; one breathes the quietude of hill, lake and heathery stretch, and notes his quickening pulse and thrilling nerve in the rhythm of song and the spring of dance.

Mr. Busoni, whose approach was somewhere delayed, caused a change of soloist for the second time this season, and Mme. Blauvelt was happily on hand to fill out the program.

Sang "Una Voce."

The song "Una Voce loco Fa," the "Butterfly" air from Campra's century-old "Fetes Venitiennes," Delibes' "Pourquoi," and the bolero from Verdi's "Vepres Siciliennes." Mme. Blauvelt was gladly received and flatteringly heard, for she is ever a favorite. Her singing was, as usual, competent, self-possessed, showy and "stylish." Yet it is singing which just falls short of perfect elegance and savors rather of study and determination to excel than of predisposition and spontaneity. Her execution has all the right to be called "agilita," but it lacks the elastic lightness of absolute "floritura." Her closest approach to the true union of song and singer was in the bolero, although she gave the Cambra air sweetly, equably and with reserve.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv- Programme. Jan 11 1904
Overture to the Opera "The Barbarians".... Saint-Saens
(First time.)
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville"..... Rossini
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman".... Caesar Franck
Songs with Pianoforte—
(a) "Charmant Papillon"..... Campra
(b) "Pourquoi"..... Delibes
(c) "Sicilian Vespers"..... Verdi
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56..... Mendelssohn

St. Saens is the best master of orchestration that the French have recently produced; but he is not a master of passion or emotional power. There is a lack of force in his very ingenious scores.

Better fifty bars of Bizet
Than a Cycle of St. Saens.

These barbarians seemed more gentle than the historian, Gibbons, has depicted them. They seemed addicted to hunting, and a few gentle fanfares spoke of this. The tender love-episodes were more frequently in the foreground. It was a musical representation of a species of Ingomar and Parthenia,—

Two flutes with but a single toot,
Two horns that blowed as one.

Mme. Blauvelt came as soloist, in answer to an emergency call. Busoni, who was to have played a Henselt concerto, is probably still engaged in sending contributions to the Atlantic, for his ship has not yet arrived.

It may not be fair to judge absolutely of the vocalist by a performance in response to such a sudden call. We found her work in "Una Voce" correct but uninspired—like an excellently acquired lesson.

Intonation was perfect, the runs and floriture were clear, and while criticism was mute, so was enthusiasm.

Far better was the impression made in the subsequent songs with piano accompaniment (the latter admirably done by Mr. Zach), for in these there was a degree of abandon and brilliancy that won instantaneous recognition.

Mme. Blauvelt's work in the last 3 numbers, the quaint delicacy of old Campra, the tenderness of Delibes and the dash and brilliancy of the final Bolero, was superlatively good. Neither Sembrich, nor any other of the world-famous prime donne, could have excelled the interpretation given.

The enthusiasm following them was naturally more spontaneous than the set recalls after "Una Voce."

Cesar Franck's "Wild Huntsman" gains by repeated hearing. Yet it does not achieve the "diablerie" with which a Berlioz would have invested the subject. Among the wild rides in music, Wagner's Walkure steeple chase, Raff's "Lenore" handicap, and Frau Holle sweepstakes, St. Saens' Phaeton (in harness) and Berlioz's broncho ride to Hades, Franck's is the least exciting.

Of course the dissonances and the muted horn calls are there to picture evil in the conventional way, but the beauty of the work is in the calmer passages, particularly in those that suggest the Sabbath calm which the sacrilegious huntsman roughly broke.

The moral of the work is—don't go hunting on Sunday during church hours. The wicked count who did this was subsequently hunted by an entire brass band, assisted by kettle-drums, and had no end of fortissimo trouble.

We do not think the work one of Franck's strongest, although it is as famous as any of the good master's compositions. The performance was excellent.

Mr. Gericke and his men won another triumph in the Scotch Symphony, which closed the concert. It was one of the finest performances of the work which we have ever heard. And it is a work worth doing well, for, in spite of some commonplaces and conventionalities, it contains beauties that our greatest moderns could not equal with all their extra instruments and liberties.

The weak parts are the "storm" coda of the first movement, the saccharine adagio (suited to the susceptibilities of a boarding-school miss), and the hymn of thanksgiving at the end.

The noble parts are the development of the first movement and the beautiful use of clarinettes in deep register in the introduction of this movement; the splendid contrasts of the finale, and particularly that passage of clarinette, taken from the second theme, which pictures a loneliness which those who have walked through the Trossachs in the gloaming will readily understand.

The Scherzo is imperishable. Its chief theme, given by the clarinette, is the only instance of a German composer having achieved something really Gaelic. And its lit and rollicking style is developed in a masterly manner, so that musician and non-musician may meet here upon common ground and both find much to admire.

All through the work Mendelssohn betrays partiality for the clarinettes, and these instruments were often in the foreground in this symphony and were played remarkably well.

There ought to be more great music built upon Scottish foundation. Russia and Scotland have mines of musical gold to be worked by the classical artificer. The former country is beginning to possess a race of composers who are using this valuable material, but Scotland has not yet had its musical Columbus.

The German composers have sensed the value of the Gaelic folk-repertoire, and Beethoven, Franz, Schumann, Bruch, Volkmann, and others have endeavored to build upon the foreign foundation. But only Mendelssohn has succeeded in any degree, and he chiefly because he lived in Scotland for a period,—however brief.

The true classical evolution of Scottish music must come from one to the manner born, from a native Scot. May Scotland yet find a musical son who having thorough equipment shall be imbued with Robble Burns's aspiration,—

"That I, for puir auld Scotland's sake,
Some usefu' plan or buke might make,
Or sing a sang at least."

Louis C. Elson.

NEW STATUE IN SYMPHONY HALL

One Just Placed in Position Completes Group of Heroic Figures

To complete the group of heroic statues in Symphony Hall, the last of these, numbering sixteen in all, has been installed in the niche set apart for it. For the past two years Pietro P. Caproni, who did the sculptural work, has been corresponding with the directors of the Naples Museum where the original statue is, and finally a model taken from the original statue was imported by Mr. Caproni. It is the first to be had in this country, and stands six feet high. It represents Faun carrying the infant Bacchus. The original statue is one of the great treasures of the Naples Museum, and it is thought probable that it was made as late as the time of

MME. BLAUVELT SOLOIST.

Programme for Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Herald This Afternoon, Jan. 8, 1904

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon includes the overture to Saint-Saens' opera, "The Barbarians"; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. The overture will be played here for the first time. When the opera is performed in Paris, the overture serves as a prologue and a reciter appears to tell how an invading host of Teutons swept the natives and the Roman legions before them, until at Orange, their chief fell in love with a vestal virgin, and he declares that Vesta punished the sacrilege. The action of the opera passes in the old amphitheatre of Orange, for which the first performance was planned, but Saint-Saens made reasonable objections and the production was at the Opera, Paris. Franck's symphonic poem is in illustration of the ballad by Buerger, which is familiar to English speaking persons through Sir Walter Scott's version. The composition was first played here by Theodore Thomas' orchestra, and it has been played here at a Symphony concert.

Mr. Busoni has been delayed, and Mme. Blauvelt will be the soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Rosina's cavatina from "The Barber of Seville" and with piano accompaniment the songs: Campra's "Charming Butterfly," Delibes' "Why?" and the bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers."

It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Gilbert, the eminent baritone, and Miss Sassoli, the harpist, will give a second concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 16. There will be a complete change of programme.

J. S. Svendsen

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SVENDSEN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat major, op. 15.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Intermezzo. Allegro giusto.
- IV. Andante. — Allegro con fuoco.

VOLKMANN,

SERENADE No. 3, in D minor, op. 69.
(Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT, Solo Violoncello.)

SCHUMANN,

SUITE for full ORCHESTRA, "In Carnival Time."
op. 22.
I. Allegro con fuoco. (In Waltz time.)
II. Andantino marcato.
III. Presto, (Humoreske.)
(First time.)

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Der Freischuetz."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat major, op. 15.....Svendsen
Serenade No. 3, in D minor, op. 69.....Volkman
(Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, Solo Violoncello)
Suite for full Orchestra, "In Carnival Time," op. 22.....Schumann
(First time)

Overture to the Opera "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

An entirely orchestral concert. We generally like these purely instrumental concerts best and feel that our great orchestra should be able to charm without the aid of an operatic prima donna or a marvellous virtuoso; but on this occasion none of the ideas presented seemed to reach high-water mark. The Svendsen symphony proved to be a well-constructed work, but by no means as individual as much of the music of this northern composer.

The present writer recalls a visit to Svendsen, in Copenhagen, when that composer seemed more enthusiastic about his "Zorahayde" than any other of his compositions. He spoke at that time of a visit that he had made to America, and hoped some day to turn his impressions of Niagara into music, but this he has never accomplished.

At one of these meetings Svendsen showed the reviewer a baton that was one of the earliest ever waved. One may remember that conducting with a baton is a very modern proceeding. The conductorial stick was not used prior to 1801. Weber was one of the very earliest of the great conductors to employ it, and he used a baton in Dresden in 1817.

This baton, with Weber's autograph upon it, is in the possession of Svendsen. It is a long stick, inlaid with ivory, and with a handle like a policeman's billy.

We return unwillingly to the Svendsen symphony. It is not a great work. It shows the skill of the trained composer, and each climax is worked up with consummate care, but it is not inspired or inspiring. The Scherzo—or rather "Intermezzo"—is the most popular part of it.

This movement reminds somewhat of Mendelssohn in his Scotch Symphony, but it is less spontaneous than that masterpiece. The finale alternates between joviality and despair. The two last movements are the best part of the work. The horn-playing and the oboe work in the second movement were worthy of record. Altogether a good and shapely, but not a phenomenal symphony.

Although there was no soloist, strictly speaking, upon the programme, the Volkman Serenade had a violoncello obbligato that gave abundant opportunities to Mr. Krasselt to show what a fine artist he is. The Serenade is largely the soliloquy of a very unhappy 'cello, with some brighter episodes in which the rest of the orchestra endeavor to cheer up the despondent instrument.

Mr. Krasselt played superbly and won a very emphatic ovation at the close of the piece. Our orchestra has evidently gained a strong artist in this young man. Some of the praise must also be extended to the orchestral violoncellos, for they gave some unison passages with wonderful fervor and ensemble.

Georg Schumann in his carnival scenes has not approached the treatment of the same subject by the greater Schumann, nor has he equalled the dance effects of Berlioz, or Weber, or Tchaikowsky.

One found in the work neither the grace and delicacy of a fashionable ball-room, on the one hand, nor the frank license of the Bal Bullier or a Montmartre festivity, upon the other. Parts of the work seemed close to the line of prosaic vulgarity.

The picture should have been better or worse than that to make an artistic success. The brigands in the finale of Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony are much more effective than a crowd of "bourgeoisie" dissipating could ever be.

The Gavotte (second movement) was very dainty, however, at the first, and in the true spirit of this dance, which is far removed from its peasant origin, but it was finally thundered out on the trombones as if the band were playing for a set of deaf dancers. In the finale there was a theme which would do finely for a topical song in "King Dodo," but was a little removed from the atmosphere of a symphony concert. One could sing some sentiment like to its inspiring notes, suggesting the Howard Athenaeum rather than Symphony Hall. There were plenty of bold, modern orchestral effects; rapid passages on muted horn, furious phrases on the kettledrums, etc., all well executed.

"You never miss the lager till the barrel has run dry"

"The Freischuetz" overture ended the concert with more dignity. It was in the main well played, although that little parody of the last two notes of Agathe's melody, first given upon the flutes and then scoffed at by the brass, might have been emphasized much more to advantage. But the general interpretation of the works of this programme was better than their artistic contents, always excepting the final number.

Louis C. Elson.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Last week's Symphony program contained one novelty, George Schumann's "In Carnival Time," a suite for orchestra, given for the first time here. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt played the principal cello part in Volkman's serenade in D minor, the opening concert selection was the Svendsen B flat major symphony, which has not been heard here in a score of years, and the Weber overture to "Der Freischuetz" closed the program. Mr. Svendsen's work sounds rather old-fashioned as a whole and only in part is it specially interesting. The second movement, which opens in a mournful mode, has some pleasing thematic movements and series of measures in staccato for the first violins, which are admirably scored, and in this instance gave this contingent a chance to show beautiful unanimity in its performance. In the third part the varying figures are of a simple, spirited nature, melodic and skillfully introduced for the different instruments, and the final movement is built up of rather vigorous themes which form a good contrast to the preceding part of the work. The prevailing tone of the composition is sober, and this idea was effectively suggested by the orchestra.

Mr. Krasselt played the solo part for cello in the Volkmann serenade with a tenderness and sweetness of tone which made his work one of the features of the program. In fact, the frequent strong combinations in this piece were given with beautiful accord and harmony and were about as close to perfection as one can expect to hear.

The Schumann "Carnival," which was performed here for the first time, is a thoroughly typical and enjoyable illustration of its title, jolly, full of waltz rhythms and quaint musical dialogues, and contains melodic material enough to supply a score for a light opera. It was interpreted in a delightful vein. The numerous episodes divided among the instruments brought out some queer combinations, and in the revel, in which all did good work, special praise is uncalled for. In the second part, an old-time gavotte, the clarinet, cello and bassoon parts were specially amusing to hear by this orchestra, for one or two of the themes were of the so-called "catchy" style of writing and sounded quite familiar. A very taking close in the second movement was the unison of the harp and triangle. In the last movement one could not help smiling at the musical revelry, which was charmingly set forth by Mr. Gericke's men.

The "Der Freischütz" overture, with its weird suggestion of the power of an evil spirit, made a good contrast to the humors of the "Carnival," and the interpretation was in the proper spirit and satisfactory withal.

Mr. George Proctor will be the soloist this week, playing the Liszt piano concerto in E flat. The remaining numbers of the program will be Rubinstein's A minor symphony, Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride."

Globe

Jan 24 1904

TWELFTH SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Georg Schumann's New Work Is on the Programme.

B Herald

Jan 24 1904

It is "In Carnival Time," but it is Not Very Festive or Rollicking—An Unfamiliar Symphony by Svendsen—Some Novelties of the Symphony Season.

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows: Symphony No. 2, B-flat major, op. 15. Svendsen Serenade No. 3 in D minor, op. 69. Volkmann "In Carnival Time," suite op. 22. . . . .

Georg Schumann

(First time.)

Overture to "Der Freischütz" . . . . . Weber
The symphony, by Svendsen is little known here; it was produced by Mr. Henschel in 1884. The suite by Schumann was played for the first time.

Mr. Gericke has brought out this season an entr'acte from Bruneau's "Mésidor," a symphony by Glazounoff, D'Indy's "La Forêt Enchantée," Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor, Tchaikowsky's "The Voyvode," Elgar's variations on an original theme, the overtures to d'Albert's "Improvisatore" and Saint-Saens' "Barbarians." Raff's overture, "Ein Feste Burg," was played here for the first time at these concerts—and why? It was well worth while to produce the symphony by Glazounoff and the pieces by Bruneau and D'Indy. The symphony gave so many pleasure that it was repeated, an unusual occurrence in the history of these concerts.

To some, perhaps to many, the posthumous symphonic poem by Tchaikowsky, and the overtures seemed inferior works, and some have asked "Why are such pieces played?" The answer is a simple one: It is a good thing to hear at least once the poorer works of leading composers; it is a part of one's musical education to be acquainted with the weakness as well as the strength of a composer; it is not only a good thing, it is necessary to know what contemporary musicians, as Saint-Saens, Elgar, D'Albert, Georg Schumann, Dohnanyi, are doing.

The overture to "The Improvisatore" had been played in Chicago and in Cincinnati before we heard it. The overture to "The Barbarians" had been played in Chicago before we found out for ourselves that it was barren of ideas. Our novelties come late. "The Dream of Gerontius" has already been performed in Germany and in Australia, at New York and at Chicago. Elgar's "Variations" were over four years old, and they had been performed in many European cities before we all learned from personal acquaintance that they are a curious mixture of originality and commonplace, nobility and rank, sentimentalism, abysmal dulness and extreme brilliance.

Masterpieces are not written every week and delivered promptly in a neatly tied parcel on Saturday night. It is too much to expect or to demand that each new composition should be an imperishable thing of beauty. What miracles of dulness may be found in the complete works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann!

Nor should true masterpieces be given so often that they become too familiar and run the risk of sharing the fate of Aristides. Suppose all the better symphonies of Beethoven were given each season, or that Cesar Franck's symphony, or Schubert's "Unfinished," or the second by Brahms, or the fifth by Tchaikowsky, was performed once a month during a season, would they not lose through such familiarity?

When 24 concerts are given in a season, there must inevitably be performances of works of the second rank. There are times when a novel by Mortimer Collins will give more pleasure than a novel by Balzac. An audience is not always prepared to associate with masterpieces. The symphony by Glazounoff produced this season is not a great work, but it is full of color, it has life, it is brilliant. The overture by d'Albert as a picture of the carnival is not to be named in the same breath with Berlioz's overture; but d'Albert is alive, he is a musician of parts, and the public of Boston should know what he has been doing of late. When 20 new pieces are brought out it is doubtful whether one hearer out of ten would care to hear a dozen of these pieces a second time; but has he not a right to ask for reasonable ground for his opinion? He cannot justly condemn or avoid the thing unheard.

Last night the symphony was new to nine-tenths of the audience, and probably no one was acquainted with the suite by Schumann. When the symphony was heard for the first time in Leipzig, there was much talk about its "national" character.

Music that is first of all "national" seldom, if ever, lives a long life outside its parish. The nationality of an individual enters into the expression of his thought, and into his thought itself, but his emotions must be of universal interest; he may be a Swede or a Bulgarian, an American or a Russian, but he must be, first of all, intensely human. The nationality must not be worn as a plausible garment. George Moore said in a bilious moment—and he is often bilious—that the reader of Thomas Hardy's novels is invited "to assist at a sheep-shearing scene, or at a harvest supper, because these scenes are not to be found in the works of George Eliot, because the reader is supposed to be interested in such things, because Mr. Hardy is anxious to show how jolly country he is." The reproach, unjust as applied to Hardy, might be brought against certain composers.

Svendsen's symphony is not unduly national. The good and substantial things in it may be enjoyed by the music lover of any country. The weak pages are not weak because they are "national"; they must seem weak to any Scandinavian composer or experienced listener. The first movement is still fresh and individual. Its frankness is engaging. In this pessimistic period the charge of "gloom" that was brought against the symphony as a whole when it first appeared seems preposterous. The second movement is often sentimental, and the simplicity of the song becomes affectation; the artlessness is suspicious. It is the weakest portion of the symphony. The intermezzo will always win the applause of the audience at large. A Scandinavian masquerades as Mendelssohn and pipes a scherzo near a mist-enshrouded burial mound. The finale has more of what we are accustomed to call Norwegian color; this color is here raw; there are none of the delicate nuances of Grieg. And when the symphony has been played, and after listening to other music, the hearer leaves the hall, the one impression made by the symphony is that made by the first movement.

Schumann's "In Carnival Time" was produced by Mr. Nikisch at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, Feb. 20, 1899. The work is in three movements and it is scored for full orchestra. The composer furnished his own programme for the Berlin concert, but the argument is not printed in the score. The first movement portrays ballroom scenes. The prevailing tempo is that of a waltz, but there are several relieving episodes, in which various characters are introduced. The music of the general gayety suggests that many of the dancers wear rubber boots. There is little lightness; there is no esprit. There is no sharply drawn characterization of couples. Here and there an episode is not without a graceful orchestral touch; but how far we are from the dash and brilliance of French pieces of like nature. The second movement is in gavotte form. The gavotte here is not the original peasants' dance; it has the pomp and ceremony of the court. This movement is by far the most characteristic of the three. The repetition of the chief motive by the brass, however, is out of character, and suggests a late ball of an outer boulevard. The third movement bears for a sub-title the word

"Humoreske"; and here there might be a discussion of humor as it is understood by the Germans, with digressions concerning Tile Eulenspiegel's pranks, Jean Paul Richter, and the Munich comic papers. The humor of this particular movement is not unlike that of a railroad accident. The music has little or no distinction, and there is not even delirious can-can jollity.

The revival of Volkmann's episodic serenade gave Mr. Krasselt the opportunity to display a fine tone and much taste. The work itself seems singularly old-fashioned. Hungarian strains are mingled with echoes from a synagogue. Yet every now and then there is a passage that makes one regret the bitterly melancholy life of the composer, who more than once seemed to be on the point of catching and holding Fame.

Trans

Jan 29 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of the twelfth symphony concert, which Mr. Gericke gave last Saturday evening in Symphony Hall:

Svendsen: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, op. 15.
Volkmann: Serenade No. 3, in D minor, op. 69.
Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, Solo Violoncello.
Schumann: Suite for full Orchestra, "In Carnival Time," op. 22.

(First time.)

Weber: Overture to the Opera "Der Freischütz."

It is to be deplored that the weather on Saturday was sufficiently untoward to keep many people at home, for the twelfth symphony concert was of a remarkably attractive nature. In addition to the constantly brilliant playing of the orchestra and the pleasant character of the music presented, Mr. Gericke's innovation of placing the symphony first on the programme is one that will tend toward the greater contentment of very many persons, if not, indeed, of the entire audience. In these days, when people are so distinctly in favor of short concerts that a brief enough programme is rarely found, it is comfortable to discover the final number of a programme to be a work so well known that one may leave the hall before it, if he chooses, without feeling that the best part of the evening may be lost. Overtures like those to "Der Freischütz" and "The Bartered Bride" are surely admirable compositions to end a concert with. Many listeners, furthermore, are in far better receptive mood for a great work of consequence, like a symphony, at eight o'clock in the evening than at nine or a quarter after.

The Svendsen symphony having been heard here only once before, and then in 1884, on Saturday it came to the audience practically as a new work. That this composition should have been so pointedly neglected these nineteen years seems odd, for it is a musical production full of charm; spontaneous, always natural, melodious, and with a wide variety of delightful rhythms. Strongest in the first movement, the sentiment (bred in the bone of Scandinavians and North Germans) of the andante is speedily relieved by the piquant gayety of the intermezzo, while the whole ends with an exhilarating exuberance of high spirits. It all sounds well, too; the orchestration is always that of a master.

Far less interesting was the suite "In Carnival Time," by Georg Schumann, now conductor of the Berlin Singacademie, although Mr. Arthur Nikisch approved of the composition sufficiently to play it at a Berlin Philharmonic Concert in 1899. Through this suite the composer attempts to suggest a carnival ball, which begins gently, as balls do, waxes gay, is interrupted by the performance of a stately gavotte, and then once more resumes its hilarious course to the pitch of becoming an orgy. From a disinclination, however, to a frank use of dance rhythms, which are absolutely necessary when one is trying to sketch a ball scene, Mr. Schumann has failed to make his festivity in the least festal. He has, on the contrary, made such liberal use of the "full" orchestra at his command that the composition suggests far less a carnival rout than the sacking of Rome by the Goths and Vandals; in the din one positively can fancy the shrieks of the dead and wounded. Even the none too graceful gavotte is thundered forth by the entire orchestra, including trombones and tuba. There are, of course, in the length and breadth of the piece hints and intimations of a merry disposition, some episodes, indeed, being charming. On the whole, however, the work shows little that is musically valuable and small feeling for the subject in hand. It is curious, too, that with the great orchestra called for there should be so little orchestral color. As is the case with many works which must be produced if we are to know what is going on in the world of music, one performance of "In Carnival Time" will probably answer every purpose.

Between the symphony and the suite came Volkmann's third serenade, a composition of stern, austere beauty that might more fittingly be called anything else than a serenade, as we commonly conceive the term. Mr. Krasselt played the solo part very beautifully. With strong, sweet tone he interpreted feelingly the doleful measures that fell to the violoncello, and withal refrained from making his instrument whine. The entire concert, as has already been said, was characterized by splendid playing.

Mr. George Proctor is to appear at Saturday's concert. This will be the programme: Symphony in A minor, Rubinstein; concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, Liszt; symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," Kaun (first time); overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Orchestra Will Play Svendsen's Symphony No. 2 at Today's Public Rehearsal.

The programme of the 12th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall this afternoon is not the one announced a fortnight ago. The concerto this week will begin with Svendsen's symphony in B flat major, No. 2, which has not been played here for many years. It was published in 1877, the year the more familiar "Carnival at Paris" was published, and it was performed for the first time at a Gewandhaus concert at Leipzig that year. The Leipzig critics insisted that it was too Scandinavian; extreme "nationality" in music was not then fashionable.

Volkmann's Serenade No. 3 in D minor will be the second piece, and Mr. Krasselt will play the solo violoncello part, first played here by Louis Lubeck with Theodore Thomas' orchestra. The piece, with its contrasted moods of gloom and gaiety and its antiphonal passages for cello and strings, is familiar here. Messrs. Glese, Hekking and Schroeder have in their turn been the solo cellists at Symphony concerts. "In Carnival Time," a suite by Georg Schumann of Berlin, will be played here for the first time. It was produced by Mr. Nikisch at Berlin, Feb. 20, 1899. The suite is in three movements. The first, in waltz tempo, portrays a ball room scene, and, from a short programme furnished by the composer, it seems there is an attempt to characterize sundry couples. The second movement is in the form of an old-fashioned gavotte, danced for the amusement of the crowd. The finale bears the sub-title, "Humoreske," and pictures the confusion at its height. The final piece is the overture to "Der Freischuetz."

THE SYMPHONY

Traveler. Jan 25, 1904

Symphony No. 2, in B flat major, op. 15. Svendsen
Serenade No. 3, in D minor, op. 69. Volkmann
(Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, Solo Violoncello.)
Suite for full orchestra, "In Carnival Time," op. 22. Schumann
(First time.)
Overture to the opera "Der Freischuetz," Weber

Of a truth, our revered and world-famous Symphony concerts seem to be losing something of that "big wow" element that has so distinguished them from the first. At least, one might be pardoned for thinking and saying so from a consideration of the most recent programmes. That of the concert of two weeks ago was decidedly what the scoffer might have called "light-waisted," while this one under present discussion has again the same general tone of—let us not say triviality, but elementary gladness. Now, elementary gladness has its charms, but it must be doubted if a too-long continued feast of it is desirable. The Symphony concert should almost always include some powerful, stirring, emotional piece of music that appeals to the finer parts of men's natures.

However, such as it was, the music was beautifully played throughout, and undoubtedly gave sincere pleasure. The Svendsen symphony, albeit not so Scandinavian as it was intended to be, is a neat piece of orchestral mosaic work, and sings itself into the heart by its charming simplicity. It narrowly escapes being of lasting value.

The Volkmann serenade was the one apparent exception to the elementary gladness spoken of, and yet its melancholy is of the tender sort that is often a pleasure rather than a pain. It served very well as a means of again showing the exquisite tone and true artistry of our new cellist, Mr. Krasselt.

Mr. Georg Schumann has attempted to be delicately gay in his carnival bit, but, like so many other composers who have been overcome by the idea of showing the world how debonaire they can be in music, he has wavered between vulgar noise and silly sentimentality. A well-made little thing, if you please, but without inspiration, without beauty, without any permanent worth.

The dear old "Freischuetz," how charming and full of dainty fancy it seemed, after the mediocrities that had gone before. If we are apt to complain sometimes that Weber's old war-horse is dragged from his stable a bit too often, let us now ask pardon of all concerned. When it comes like a benediction, its place is well-deserved.

TWELFTH CONCERT IS WELL GIVEN

So Evenly Balanced Is It That Absence of Soloist is Not Seriously Felt.

The twelfth Symphony program, analyzed in these columns yesterday morning, was perfectly performed at the afternoon's rehearsal, and will be repeated at the concert this evening. So well balanced and entertaining was it that the absence of any soloist was not disadvantageously felt.

The symphony, placed by way of exception at the head of the bill, was Svendsen's agreeably brief and compact second, in B flat, opus 15, first played in Boston almost exactly twenty years ago, under Mr. Henschel's direction. Its nervous, sturdy first movement; its sweetly sought second, and its buoyant, merry third, lead to the fitful finale, in which serious moods, contrasting with the gayer ones, are sometimes broken in upon almost violently by sudden dramatic chords, but which, as a whole, leaves an impression of wholesome decision and hearty action.

Various critics have fancied they found resemblances here between Svendsen and other composers, but without adducing much in support of their notions. As this symphony belongs to the period when its composer was greatly admiring, studying and cultivating Wagner, it would be natural to find in it more impress of his manner than of any other writer's. But while an occasional turn of expression may faintly suggest Wagner's phraseology, the thought, the spirit and the instrumental color are surely Svendsen's own, independent, vigorous, romantic and exhilarating.

A Lover's Serenade.

The third serenade of Volkmann made a delightful interlude, especially as Mr. Krasselt played the cello solos so beautifully and richly. The four phases of this work call up fancies of quite a little drama. The pensive, melancholy and half lugubrious initial recital seems to speak for a despondent, but still pettiary lover who pursues his fair one with sad beseechings; the second brims over with coquettish laughter and sport, as if she were tantalizing him from her latticed window, while he murmurs little sighing comments in an unobserved aside, but the third, which is in a more "coming on" spirit, hints at kind compliance and a happy tripping over the dewy morning grass. In the finale, however, something of the original gloom returns, but is backed by a firmer spirit, as if the youth had begun to feel surer in his hopes, in spite of the tantalizing tortures he had to suffer. It is a composition thoroughly in the serenade vein and it is as sparkingly played.

One New Thing.

After this was put the novelty—Georg Schumann's "Carnival Time" suite, which proved to be a fanciful, brilliant and picturesque affair. The first movement, cast into waltz rhythms and figures, brings to mind the festal evening at Leonato's palace in "Much Ado About Nothing," when one group after another separates itself from the throng of revelers for its own little merry episode. For here are hinted the gay, the moody, the social, the solitary, the strolling amorous pairs and the light-footed dancers, and the hall is full of commingling company. The second part is a gavotte, in which they of state dignity and courtly consequence parade themselves with pompous formality and lofty elegance before the clustering on-lookers, and the last part is a "Nimmerke," depicting the freaks, the impertinences, the rallies, the mock dignity and the occasional rough brusqueness of the popular conclusion of the general festivity. As music and as performance this piece was greatly enjoyed and much applauded.

The dramatically romantic and musically wise overture to "Der Freischuetz"—admirably played except for the almost invariably blurred attack in the horn quatnor—ended the program finely.

149

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RUBINSTEIN,

SYMPHONY No. 6, in A minor, op. 111.

I. Moderato con moto.

II. Moderato assai.

III. Allegro vivace.

IV. Moderato assai.—Presto.

LISZT,

CONCERTO No. 1, in E flat major, for PIANOFORTE
and ORCHESTRA.

HUGO KAUN,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Minnehaha." op. 43, No. 1.
(First time.)

SMETANA,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Sold Bride."

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

GEORGE PROCTOR.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RUBINSTEIN,

SYMPHONY No. 6, in A minor, op. III.

I. Moderato con moto.

II. Moderato assai.

III. Allegro vivace.

IV. Moderato assai.—Presto.

LISZT,

CONCERTO No. 1, in E flat major, for PIANOFORTE
and ORCHESTRA.

HUGO KAUN,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Minnehaha." op. 43, No. 1.
(First time.)

SMETANA,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Sold Bride."

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

13TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post. Jan. 31, 1904
Orchestral Numbers by Rubinstein,
Kaun and Smetana; Also Liszt's
Pianoforte Concerto in E Flat Presented Last Evening at
Symphony Hall

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 6, Op. 111.....Rubinstein
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Liszt
Symphonie Poem, "Minnehaha".....Kaun
Overture to "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana
George Proctor was the soloist.

This programme was somewhat a reversal of the usual order of things, for the symphony came first instead of last, the overture ending the concert.

The Rubinstein symphony was the composer's sixth and last, in A minor, Op. 111, written in 1896 for one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig. Previous to last evening the symphony has had only one performance in this city, being at a concert under Mr. Gericke's direction Nov. 12, 1887. So the work was absolutely new to a large portion of the audience.

It is in the customary four movements and fairly strict in form. The themes are many and interesting, but the development is commonplace; there is little that rises above routine composition, and the symphony shows both the strength and weakness of Rubinstein as a composer. He was possessed of amazing fertility in thematic material, but he constructed his works in a slipshod manner as if he wanted to begin a new composition before a previous one was finished. The third movement was the most pleasing portion of the symphony heard last evening, and the general performance was excellent.

Hugo Kaun's symphony poem, "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1, was heard in this city for the first time. The composer, although born in Berlin and living there at the present time, was a resident of Milwaukee, Wis., from 1887 to 1901, and it was during this time that he became interested in the "Hiawatha" poem.

Two symphony poems were the result of his reading of Longfellow's familiar story, and they are entitled "Minnehaha" and "Hiawatha." Theodore Thomas was the first to perform them, which he did at a Chicago symphony concert early in 1903.

"Minnehaha" is suggested by Canto 20, which describes the famine. The music is supposed to portray the dreary winter, the mad rush of Hiawatha through the forest to obtain food and the finding on his return that Minnehaha has died, as described by the poet. Whether or not Mr. Kaun has adequately pictured the text in music must be determined by the individual listener, according to his mood. The music suggests the imaginative faculty to a great degree and the instrumental coloring is exceedingly interesting and ingenious. It may not be a work of colossal genius, but on a first hearing the impressions were exceedingly favorable. It is as good, certainly, as any of the various "Hiawatha" musical creations heard here thus far, if not better, and that the audience was pleased was shown by the loud applause that the work received. This is the first of Mr. Kaun's works in larger forms to be heard here and it is hoped that an opportunity will be given in the near future of hearing others.

Between the symphony and the "Minnehaha" music the Liszt concerto in E flat was played by Mr. George Proctor.

TODAY'S SYMPHONY.

Hugo Kaun's Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," the Novelty of the Programme. Jan. 29, 1904

The programme of the 13th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall will include one novelty: Hugo Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha." Kaun was born in Berlin, where he studied the piano with Oskar Raip and composition with Kiel. He composed, and he conducted a choral society founded by him; but he grew restless and went to Milwaukee, where he lived until a few years ago. His home is now in Berlin. This symphonic poem has a companion, "Hiawatha." The two were produced in Berlin in 1901 at a concert of Kaun's works, and they were performed by the Chicago Orchestra last year. "Minnehaha" portrays in music the winter, the famine, Hiawatha's despair at the sickness of Minnehaha, his return from the forest, and her death.

The other pieces are Rubinstein's Symphony in A minor, No. 6, which is first on the programme; Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat for piano (Mr. Proctor, pianist), and the delightful overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride." The symphony was composed by Rubinstein for the Gewandhaus concerts, Leipzig, and it was performed there for the first time when the composer conducted. It has been played only once in this city, at a Symphony concert. The last movement is built on Russian folk-songs, it is said.

The programme of the concert Feb. 5 and 6 will be as follows: Dubois' overture, "Fritzhiel" (first time); Beethoven's concerto for violin (Miss Olive Mead); Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv: PROGRAMME. Jan. 1, 04

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 6, in A minor, op. III. Liszt Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, for piano-forte and orchestra.

Mr. George Proctor, Soloist.

Hugo Kaun—Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," op. 43, No. 1. (First time.)

Smetana—Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride."

For once the concert began with the symphony, as if Mr. Gericke wanted to have this task over as soon as possible. It was interesting to hear this Rubinstein work, if only on account of the diverse opinions expressed regarding it. It is bold from the outset, beginning with an augmented fifth chord that does not suggest any particular tonality. But the demon of development seizes upon the composer early in the work and stays by him until the end. It is spasmodic and vehement at times. Rubinstein is a most unequal composer in almost all of his orchestral compositions. The old rhyme can be modified for him,—

When he is good he is very, very good,
And when he is bad he is—conventional.

Of course there is skill in his weaving and intertwining of figures, but of the inspiration of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony there is not a trace. It is manufactured music. The faults are most pronounced in the second and third movements; opening movement and the finale being much more striking in treatment and in contents. The finale, in fact, has moments of great beauty, possibly because the composer has built upon the sure foundation of the Russian folk-song. But what is beautiful is not Rubinstein's, and even these points are marred by prolixity, by long-continued sequences, by extreme development. What the future may do with Rubinstein's works is problematical, but that he will be outstripped by Tschaiowsky seems certain; the latter was far more self-critical.

The symphony was to the advantage of Mr. George Proctor, who followed with Liszt's rhapsodical concerto. Even a respectable presentation of Liszt's fiery thoughts would have sounded well after the artificialities of the symphony, and the pianist gave more than this.

Mr. Proctor is certainly improving as a concert-pianist. There was a time, not so long ago, when it was impossible for him to interpret so free and dashing a work satisfactorily; yet on this occasion he made a success.

Not that he gave the abandon that Liszt demands, or brought out the wild Magyar element of the concerto; there was some water in the Tokay, that weakened the flavor; but the surety and clearness, the brilliant octave and choral playing (wrist and forearm action) and the careful attention to ensemble, were sufficient to win him a number of hearty recalls at the conclusion of the work.

We found Kaun's "Minnehaha" very beautiful, a presentation of the best type of modern music. The composer gives the pathetic picture of the Famine and the death of the heroine without pulling the harmonic structure down about his ears, and yet he portrays passion and deep emotion quite as graphically as those who think that Scrow can only be painted by 25 consecutive fifths.

The catastrophe was full of power and the wailing (it may have been accidental coincidence) seemed to call out the name—"Minnehaha! Minnehaha!"

The final funeral march, too, was full of dignity and pathos, the pizzicato figure on the deep strings,—almost amounting to a "basso ostinato,"—being very impressive. The performance was exquisite, and Mr. Gericke was recalled to bow his acknowledgments at its close.

Smetana was a genius and we are always glad to listen to his works. What a fugue (or rather fugato) the overture of "The Sold Bride" begins with! Musical amateurs imagine that the fugue is always a dry-as-dust composition, all skill and no emotion. To such we can say that Mendelssohn in the overture to "Elijah" pictures an agitated, famished multitude by this form, that Mozart gave the most chattering and light-hearted sketch by a fugate in his "Magic Flute" overture, and that here Smetana gives a most exciting touch by the same means.

The folk-song character of this overture makes us long for the entire opera. We understand that it is impossible for the New York opera company to give us "Parsifal" in Boston this spring, but they might at least let us have a representation of Smetana's master-work.

Louis C. Elson.

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY NIGHT

A Symphonic Poem Written by Kaun Is the Novelty.

It Is Not "Hiawatha," but "Minnehaha"—A Symphony in A Minor by Rubinstein Is Disinterested—Mr. Proctor and Liszt's Concerto No. 1—Overture of Smetana.

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night at Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 6.....Rubinstein
Concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Minnehaha".....Kaun
(First time.)
Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana

Mr. Gericke produced Rubinstein's symphony here in A minor in 1887, and since then it has been allowed to rest peacefully on the shelf. No doubt the composer took some pains with the work, for it was composed for that august tribunal, the Gewandhaus Society of Leipzig, and it was first played in Leipzig under the direction of the composer in 1880.

The editor of the programme book of these Symphony concerts compiled a list of works by Rubinstein that have been performed here since 1870 at concerts of the leading local societies and at concerts given here by Theodore Thomas. It is a formidable list, and it shows again how quickly the modernity of a composer passes, unless his foothold is mortised in granite, to use a phrase of Walt Whitman. There was a time when the talk was about Rubenstein; his larger works were in fashion; his chamber music was played continually; his songs were in the mouth of every singer. Today he is known in concert halls chiefly by his piano concerto in D minor; once in a while the "Ocean" symphony (first version) is performed and every one speaks approvingly of the first movement. His songs are seldom sung—the more the pity—and his "Thou Art Like Unto a Flower" is known to church congregations by association with the incongruous words "Jerusalem the golden."

This symphony is like many other works of Rubinstein; there is a promising start, there are ideas, and then the music is as though the composer had sketched hurriedly a movement or two, and, waxing impatient, with fresh thoughts for another composition, had completed the work in hand perfunctorily and with an Olympian indifference. His orchestration is almost always dry and scratchy; at times it suggests sandpaper, and it grates on the nerves. The symphony in A minor is no exception; one misses the vivifying breath of imagination. The themes themselves are of slight interest, and after the first movement the composer himself seems to have lost all affection for his task. No performance, however careful and admirable, as was that of last night, could breathe into this dead body the breath of life.

When Mr. Proctor appeared for the first time at a Symphony concert he was fresh from study at Vienna. He chose a brazen-faced, musk-scented thing, a concerto by Eduard Schuett. The pianist then had the hard, brittle, unemotional touch that distinguishes so many fresh from a certain school in the Austrian city, and his style was flamboyant and bumptious. In recitals soon after he played as though he had not taken the time for preparation. But of late years he has pondered, apparently, the value of tone and rhythm, especially tone. Last season he played pieces of inconsiderable importance in a truly artistic manner. He sang and did not pound the melody; he was emotional and imaginative, so far as the character of the pieces permitted. Last night he played one of the great concertos in the literature of the piano, a superb, defiant piece that is still fresh and heroic, with sentiment that still seems genuine, a piece that any pianist may well be proud to play. In his performance he showed many admirable qualities. First of all, even in the most virile passages, he did not force tone; and those who heard Liszt in his puissant years all agree that the great pianist's tone, even in the frenzy of bravura, was always beautiful. Mr. Proctor played with a fine rhythmic feeling, with a keen appreciation of the value of the phrase. Perhaps there were moments when the hearer would have liked an exhibition of more demonstrative spirit, a revelation of the virtuoso exulting in his strength; but, on the whole, the performance was interesting, musical and highly creditable to the player.

Hugo Kaun, whose name appeared for the first time on these programmes, is a Berliner who sojourned for a time at Milwaukee, and is now busied again in the city of Weiss beer. The argument printed in the score of "Minnehaha" tells us that he was inspired by Longfellow's poem and by "the glorious oil painting by the American artist, Dodge, depicting the death of Minnehaha." We have never seen this painting, but something in our heart tells us that the modern school would not be enthusiastic over it; that it would be dismissed with the pictorial representations by an Englishman of a railway station and the Derby day, and with the statue of the dreaming Iolanthe in butter that awakened the wonder and the approval of thousands at the Philadelphia exposition in 1876. Still we may be wrong, we may be wrong. "Oil painting": It reminds us of Artemus Ward's definition of sardeens: "Little fishes billed in ile." M. Kaun's symbolic poem—it has a companion piece "Hiawatha"—is pleasant music without any particular originality of thought or treatment. The instrumentation is sonorous, but there is not one poignant phrase, not one dramatic stroke. The poem is the work of a cultivated musician of routine.

Smetana's delightful overture brought the close. It is to be hoped that the opera will yet be included in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House; a translation into English has been made by Mr. Meltzer, but the opera is not yet in rehearsal, although there was promise earlier in the season of a production.

Globe

The 13th Symphony program introduced Mr. George Proctor as soloist in Liszt's E-flat major concerto for piano and orchestra. Hugo Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," was played for the first time here, and Rubinstein's sixth symphony and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," completed the selections. Mr. Proctor's interpretation of the concerto was admirable as a whole, although he was lacking in physical power in several fortissimo passages to cope with the orchestra, a fault not confined to this young artist by any means. His finger work in the lighter portions of the concerto was characterized by a smoothness of execution which displayed his technique in a favorable light, and although his pace in the third and fourth movements was rather moderate when compared with some of the more experienced pianists who have played the Liszt work at these concerts, yet his speed was not halting, and the rapid passages were given with generally brilliant effect.

The beautiful and unique scherzo, with its odd triangle accompaniment, was splendidly interpreted, the marked daintiness of touch and clarity of tone indicating that in compositions of a sentimental and bilious nature Mr. Proctor should find his greatest successes. The finale, which calls for almost lightning speed and phenomenal finger power, was less pleasing, an indistinctness in playing showing in the dashing, crashing double octave runs and chords. Possibly caution in performance caused some lack of contrasting color in his work, but his playing throughout was commendable and his auditors were quite liberal in applause at the close of his interpretation.

Kaun's "Minnehaha" music, based upon "The Famine" in Longfellow's poem of "Hiawatha," is in four parts and tells the musical story with considerable skill. There is nothing very harsh in the combinations of instruments, and the so-called "mournful atmosphere" of the original is preserved continuously by clever treatment of the different themes, all of which are sad in character. The wood winds, which are very prominent, performed their parts in beautiful and suggestive harmony, the dramatic crescendo in the third part was given in perfect unison, and the closing passages, by all the contingents, were sung with exquisite effect. The piece is a delightful descriptive moreau and the performance was in the best vein of the orchestra.

In the Rubinstein symphony, which opened the program, the orchestral work seemed flawless, for the men were fresh and evidently in a sympathetic mood. The jolly, grotesque third movement went with a vim and brilliancy of execution that were fairly inspiring, all the breaks being attacked with clock-like precision. In the last part the various suggestions of the folk-songs of Russia were effectively introduced, the themes being well balanced by the ever-changing background of the accompanying instruments. The Smetana overture calls for nothing more than general commendation, there being little in it which presents more than ephemeral difficulties for Mr. Gericke's men.

Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist this week, playing Beethoven's violin concerto. The other numbers comprise the overture "Fringhof," Dubois and Brahms' fourth symphony.

PROGRAM OPENS WITH RUBINSTEIN

Liszt's Famous E Flat Concerto by Proctor Follows at Fourteenth Symphony.

"MINNEHAHA" IS RENDERED

Revives in the Hearer's Fancy the Indian Scenes as Depicted by Longfellow.

B Journal — Jan 30 1904

153
Rubinstein's sixth symphony. In A minor, occupied bravely the first forty minutes of the fourteenth Symphony program. It is remembered how the cool, empty chords into which the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture begins so disconcerted many early players that they laid it aside, waiting correction.

So one can see why this symphony was prejudiced by its beginning and was put away by more conductors than one, who thought that no good could come from such a musical Nazareth as was threatened by the harsh, abnormal dissonances hurled out in the opening chords. Yet from them emerges gently the true tonality, and the several movements have variety, and much value. Its tranquil moments are bland and pacifying, its energy is tempered and its humor is grotesque rather than extravagant and its rude force is not without dignity and state.

Oddly as Mr. Grossmith shows how the trivial tune of "Dolly Grey" can be found in scores of serious things, so the persistent reiteration of the scherzo here will chatter out every time the rhythm of "Twinkle, twinkle, little star." The symphony of episodes, alternations, changes and digressions; and the one insufficiency of the generally admirable performance was that in many cases their contiguous edges touched but did not fuse.

Liszt's famous E flat concerto, another innovation in its day, now called a masterpiece, followed, with Mr. Proctor at the pianoforte, where he sits too low for firm and full control and indulges in too many frivolous mannerisms of hand and arm. This concerto needs more than a virtuoso. It ought to have an artist for its expositor.

It contains much material—some of it great—for the display of technical and personal resources; but to make the best use of this material, to compel it to take on by turns splendor, dignity, illumination, boldness and real, even if exaggerated, emotive coloring, is the task of the developed and authoritative artist. Such Mr. George Proctor at present is not.

To say this is not to disparage him or to depreciate what he has accomplished when his abilities were level to his duties; still less is it to discourage him from desiring and striving toward the best.

The concerto has been played in Boston by Mmes. Topp, Aus der Ohe, Margulies, Schiller and Rive-King; also by D'Albert, Mills, Rosenthal, Paderewski and Hambourg. With such pianists Mr. Proctor cannot be ranked, and he should not be urged into a position that he cannot fill. Like a young actor assuming a master's part, the interpretation of its depth, fulness, passion and might are beyond him, for all his clear delivery of the text. It will perhaps then be best to commend Mr. Proctor's executive ability and accuracy, and say no more.

Kaun's "Minnehaha" has imaginative poetry in it and revives in the hearer's fancy the long, cold, cruel, killing winters, Hiawatha's plaints, struggles and failures, his love's death, with the ghost glaring upon her, his despair and the approaching feet of the fates who have ready prepared his future. Though a German, Kaun was imbued with the American spirit when he wrote these really beautiful pages. Smetana's comedy overture to "The Bartered Bride" brought cheer and smiles in a gay rendering to the final piece.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

For the thirteenth symphony concert (Saturday, Jan. 30) Mr. Gericke arranged the following programme, Mr. George Proctor appearing as soloist:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 6, in A minor, Op. 111. Liszt: Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major, for Piano-forte and Orchestra.

Hugo Kaun: Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1. (First time.) Smetana: Overture to the Opera "The Sold Bride."

According to information set down in the programme-book, Rubinstein wrote the symphony in A minor for the Society of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig, which august body produced the work in 1886, the composer conducting. Despite the lustre of this occasion, however, and the favor it found at Hamburg and Paris, as well as at Leipzig, the conductors, Theodore Thomas, Seidl and Damrosch in this country, all declared the symphony not worth playing. Mr. Van der Stucken, therefore, on producing the composition at a New York concert, in 1887, was highly commended for his daring. Even his own orchestra he had to contend against, for many of the players were opposed to a performance of the symphony, "one impudent fellow actually" having "to be expelled from the orchestra."

Our Boston musicians are evidently less recalcitrant than those of New York. On Saturday, at all events, the full complement of players seemed to be present, and no spirit of discord was noticeable. Were they not so well-behaved, though, perhaps they would have liked to deport themselves after the New York manner, for they played the symphony perfunctorily, with little zeal. This attitude is not astonishing. Surely a more uninteresting work than the A minor symphony has never been brought out at a symphony concert, with the tumultuous uproar of its beginning, its poverty of ideas, its harsh, strident orchestration, and its total lack of grace, charm, or strength. It has not been heard in Boston since its single performance in 1887; heaven grant it be not heard again for another sixteen years. The wonder of it is that the composer of some exquisite pianoforte pieces and of at least half a dozen perfect songs could bring himself to allow the public performance of such rubbish as this symphony.

The novelty of Saturday evening was a symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," by Hugo Kaun, a Berlin composer and conductor who once left his home for a sojourn of several years in Milwaukee. There, and in the forests of northern Wisconsin, he wrote this symphonic poem, inspired, as he says by Longfellow's "The Song of Hiawatha," and by "the glorious oil painting by the American artist, Dodge, depicting the death of Minnehaha (Laughing Water)." In the orchestral result there is no very vivid suggestion of the terrible desolation of winter in Northern wilds, with its frozen lakes, its forests of gaunt, naked trees, the awful crushing silence of its death-like solitude. Nor all the dull despair of Minnehaha and Hiawatha's frantic grief dramatically portrayed. The visit to the forests, evidently, and strong feeling moved Mr. Kaun less powerfully than did Longfellow's poem and the artist's oil painting. He has, none the less, written a piece of music that is melodious, well made and sonorously orchestrated; in short, very pleasant to hear.

To turn to the solo part of the concert, Mr. Proctor did himself a grave injustice in choosing to play the Liszt concerto, which work was written by as cunning a hand at arranging concert effects as Sardou is at devising striking scenes for the stage. Frankly romantic, put together in a masterly way, based on musical ideas valuable in themselves, by turns delightful and dramatic, the E-flat concerto of Liszt is yet planned for effect, and to be effective in performance it must be swept along by a pianist of passionate temperament and of an overwhelming technique—a pianist who can make his tone glisten and sparkle, and who also can make it thunder and rage. For such a work Mr. Proctor has not sufficient physical strength. He cannot make his chords crash and his passages rip out above the orchestra. And it is greatly to his artistic credit that he did not try to increase his strength by pounding; his tone remained always beautiful. In compositions of a more lyrical character, as in the "Moonlight" sonata and the C minor concerto of Beethoven, Mr. Proctor has shown himself an artist of parts, a master of strong, beautiful tone, who makes his melodies sing, who phrases with elegant taste, and who has the rare gift of imagination. The Liszt concerto he played as though it belonged to his own especial genre, attempting no feats of virtuosity, but presenting Liszt's ideas with genuine appreciation of their innate worth. The result was a performance excellent in itself, and different from any other ever heard here, but as unlike the real thing as Mme. Sembrich's performance of Isolde would be if she were so ill-advised as to essay the role. But Mme. Sembrich would never be so injudicious.

Mr. Proctor was warmly applauded, being recalled three times. At the end of the concert came the most brilliant orchestral playing of the evening, that of the charming overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride."

At the next concert, of which this is to be the programme, Miss Olive Mead will appear: Overture to "Fritzhof," Dubois (first time); concerto for violin, Beethoven; Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms.

R. R. G.

GEORGE PROCTOR IS TO BE THE SOLOIST

Mr. Gericke Has Arranged Splendid
Symphony Program.

Journal Jan. 29, 1904

Mr. Gericke has placed upon this week's program two works which, when they were first heard, a score or so of years ago, caused much discussion and aroused much opposition, but which have long been accepted by the world as matters of course and considered tranquilly, with less regard for themselves than for the manner of their performance.

These are Rubinstein's sixth symphony and Liszt's first pianoforte concerto. Each is now looked upon as characteristic of its composer, as he has come to be known, and has its place in regular repertoires. The symphony is very long, for, although Rubinstein can be terse in a song or a study, he is prolix, unsettled and impatient of a conclusion in his greater works. It is full of sudden contrasts, unexpected turns, changes of movement, form and color, which only the contradictory Russian temperament and the insistent, moody personality of the man can account for. Many of the charges of harsh abruptness and rude assertion were fairly founded, yet, with all its eccentricity and obstinacy, it is interesting, often beautiful and remunerative.

When the concerto appeared, although some authoritative critics approved, there were not lacking those who cried, especially in England, "If this be music, deliver us from it!" But pianists have liked it, because it gives them an opportunity for displaying a virtuoso's technique and a dramatic player's strength and emotion, if they have all these, and has vigor and sweep enough to carry them on its own current if they are lacking. It has many phases, but the principal ones, constantly modified interiorly, are the original allegro maestoso, an andante that is almost an allegro, an allegretto vivace, a response to the second movement, and the striking finale. The first to play it in Boston, was Miss Alide Topp, and the present player will be Mr. George Proctor.

The overture will be the well-known, pleasant one to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," and the other number of the program will be a novelty, Hugo Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," introduced by Theodore Thomas to Chicago in February, 1903. Kaun is a Berliner, born in 1863, and he was directed in his choice of subjects (for there is a pendant to this poem in his "Hiawatha") by Longfellow's poem and Dodge's painting of Minnehaha's death. He has followed the sequence of "The Famine" and depicts Hiawatha's lamentation and distress, his fruitless quest through the forest, his memories of the days of love, his return, and his horror and anguish at finding Minnehaha dead, with the old Nokomis bending and wailing over her. Mr. Thomas played both, bracketed together, as was becoming; but Mr. Gericke will only give this one.

THE SYMPHONY

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 6, in A minor, op. 111.

Liszt Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, for pianoforte and orchestra.

Mr. George Proctor, Soloist.

Hugo Kaun—Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," op. 43, No. 1. (First time.)

Smetana—Overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride."

Poor Rubinstein! Imperishable fame is his as a pianist, but the thing he longed for—a certain and sure place in posterity as a composer—is becoming less and less well established as the years go by. Nothing that he wrote in the larger forms will probably outlive this century. This particular symphony has the merits and defects of its companions: audacity in tonal color and rhythm, some touching and beautiful melody, but also uncertain and bald orchestration, commonplaces fading into drivel and a general lack of the sure touch of the great musician.

Mr. George Proctor has appeared before Boston audiences on certain other occasions, and, save to the few biased by a certain "society" cord that pulled them Proctor-ward, his work has generally been little removed from the positively bad. Even now he shows no valid reason why he should be honored by a seat before the Symphony Orchestra, and yet he has grown in his art, there is no doubt of that. His playing was marked by care and accuracy, which he formerly seemed to despise, and his tone was very much more musical and lyric. He missed about all of the true Lisztian flavor and abandon of the work, but he was sane, and for that deserves some praise.

Kaun's "Minnehaha" music sounded very beautifully human and pathetic, although not so impressive in any way as the work of Coleridge-Taylor on the same subject. But the funeral march was a masterly thing in its particular form, and the splendid playing of the orchestra added to its mournful charm.

The "Sold Bride" overture was as full of life and fine fervor as ever, and it made a fit ending to a concert of more than the ordinary qualities of pleasure-giving.

Olive Mead - 1893

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

DUBOIS,

OVERTURE, "Frithjof."
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

Soloist:

Miss OLIVE MEAD.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dubois—Overture, "Frithjof" (first time).
Beethoven—Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61.

Soloist, Miss Olive Mead.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

We doubt whether any French composer can give a good musical portrayal of a Viking; that subject belongs to the German composer by inheritance. Frithjof, the Viking, as he appeared in Dubois' overture, was a Norseman in kid-gloves (No. 11s), a suave, polite, melodic sea-rover who occasionally grew loud-voiced upon the trombones. The work however ended in chromatics and excitement, as if Frithjof had become quite angry. Compare this work with Bruch's masterpiece on the same topic and its weakness becomes apparent. It is good music "per se," but does not picture its subject.

One might have thought that the Beethoven concerto for violin would have made amends, but it failed to do so. If anyone will recall the way in which Ysaye used to play this concerto they will have some idea of the irresistible might of the first movement and the genial abandon of the finale.

We do not demand that a talented young lady should achieve such an interpretation, but we do not care to hear this masterpiece in the guise of a carefully prepared lesson. It is not wise to allow young misses to interpret tremendous masterworks in our symphony concerts. The Beethoven Concerto was genteely and elegantly played. There was no flaw of execution; the intonation was beyond censure; the cadenzas were fine displays of technique.

Miss Mead was recalled three times after the finale. She would have been much greater in a lesser work. Then came the fourth symphony of Brahms. The symphonies of this master lose nothing by repeated hearing. Familiarity reveals ever new beauties, and the four works in this form promise to be a strong bulwark against the formlessness which many modern composers hold to be a necessity.

There is a surety of touch in the work that ought to compel recognition even from the "extreme left" of musical radicalism. The development of the two-noted figure,—an iambic,—through the first movement, is the acme of ingenuity. But it is the second movement, with its beautiful horn figure, its strange effects of harmonization, that is the most attractive to the reviewer.

The scale in which the beginning is written is an unusual one, the scale of G with the F natural and the E flatted; an odd combination of major and minor effects. The horns played well here, but less so in the finale. There have been a few lapses in this department lately.

The third movement with its audacious skips from the garret to the cellar, was interpreted with much dash and fire. In the finale Brahms has taken a leaf from the Beethoven book and uses variations which are nothing less than finely constructed developments,—"Durchfuehrungs-saetze."

A word of praise must be spoken for the excellent flute playing in this. The interpretation was a fine one, for which Mr. Gerlicke deserves unstinted commendation. For once it may be recorded that there was no exodus during the last two movements. It is possible that the Boston public is beginning to realize that Brahms is not so black as he has been painted.

Louis C. Elson.

MISS MEAD PROVES A CLEVER ARTISTE

Plays Nobly in the Symphony
Program, Which Includes
Frithjof's "Saga."

3 Journal 7 m T Feb 6 1904

The soloist for the fourteenth Symphony program was Miss Olive Mead, a young artist of whom Boston should be proud. Yet the program booklet had not one line to give her, although it could lavish pages upon extracted dictionary definitions of what kind of a dance the claconne was.

Miss Mead brings to her work the impress of the influence of her chief masters—of Mr. Eichberg in temperamental earnestness and fulness, of Mr. Kneisel in purity and refinement of school and style, both now rounding and warming with her maturing womanliness. She had chosen the Beethoven concerto, which lost at her hands no beauty of form or truth of spirit.

As Kneisel Treated It.

Stronger assertion here and there would not have hurt it, but reserve is better than vehemence always, and in giving the folk character of the rondo gaily rather than emphatically she was following the example of Mr. Kneisel, who has treated it so and avoided the roughness which it can be made to bear. The cadenzas were sure, swift and luminous, and her rendering of the concerto as a whole, in proportion, contrasted color and fine polish, might properly be set down as the noblest solo violin work of the season.

The Dubois overture, just come in its twenty-fifth year to Boston, was dramatically interesting, especially if considered imaginatively and not methodically. Poor Frithjof, although by name and nature a peacemaker, had rather a hard life of it. His father and the father his beloved Ingeborg wanted to betroth them, but her brother, King Helga, would not hear to it, and when Frithjof affronted him excited him. Ingeborg lamented and her lover mourned, and a chance of peace at home was sought by marrying her to old King Ring.

Following the Legends.

And here, as in other Scandinavian legends, notably that of Olaf and Sigrid, an annulet is involved. Frithjof had inherited an armlet from his father which he gave as a pledge to Ingeborg, from whom her brother tore it to bestow it upon the statue of the god Balder. Frithjof demanded it in the temple, the statue fell into the altar flames, the temple was consumed and Balder's dominion was over. The overture, which is not pictorial, suggests the moody melancholy of the banished youth, the gentle loveliness of Ingeborg, conflicts of arms and passions and the crashing climax of the conflagration. It has by turns sentiment and strength, dreamy romance and busy vigor. It is dramatic in a way, and suggests forcibly and distinctly the conditions and qualities of the central incidents of the legend.

A definite, well-seasoned and steadily sustained performance of Brahms' fourth symphony ended the program.

"FRITHJOF" THE NOVELTY.

Overture to Be Played at Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony

Orchestra. Feb. 5, 1904

The novelty of the programme of the 14th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, this afternoon, in Symphony Hall, will be an overture, "Frithjof," by Theodore Dubois, who is director of the Paris Conservatory. This overture is not a recent work, but it was published some years after the first performance. The argument is based on the well known poetical version by Bishop Tegner of the Icelandic saga of the Norwegian hero. The music portrays the love of Frithjof and Ingeborg, the rage of the hero at the refusal of the maiden's family to allow him to wed her, the lament of Ingeborg at Frithjof's exile, his return to find her married, and his setting fire to Balder's temple by attempting to snatch the armband which he had given his sweetheart from the statue of the god. The overture, however, is in classic, rather than ultra-romantic form.

Miss Olive Mead of this city will play Beethoven's violin concerto, and the symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4, the one with the passacaglia finale.

The programme of the concerts of Feb. 12 and 13 will include Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon"; Richard Strauss' fantastical "Don Quixote" (first time), and Beethoven's seventh symphony. There will be no concerts the week following.

DUBOIS OVERTURE HEARD IN BOSTON

"Frithjof" Given by Symphony Orchestra—First Time Here—Miss Olive Mead Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

A BRAHMS SYMPHONY FOR CLOSING NUMBER

Harold Bauer Gives His Closing Piano Recital for This Season with a Programme of Selections from Schumann.

The 14th concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Frithjof".....Dubois (First time.)

Concerto for violin.....Beethoven

Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms

Dubois' overture, which was produced at Paris in 1880, would not bring a blush to the cheek of any high officer of a conservatory. There is nothing in it that is radical or revolutionary; there is not the slightest suspicion of treason toward the traditions; there is no dallying with corrupt chords, there is no companionship with dissipated progressiveness. No susceptible pupil will be led astray by hearing a performance of it or by reading furtively the score.

This is as it should be. It would be a pity if Theodore Dubois, director of the Paris conservatory, should be taunted in his highly respectable old age with a musical sin of his middle years. Dubois can look his professors and pupils in the eye and say with the calmness of conscious rectitude: "Gentlemen, I have never been musically bold or individual or imaginative."

The answer to any sceptic concerning the inherent worth of the overture would probably be this: "It is well made; it is clear and logical and sane." The overture is condemned by the answer.

For Dubois chose a romantic subject and wrote an argument as well as music. He chose episodes from the "Frithjof" Saga. Frithjof and Ingeborg love each other, but the maiden's brother will not hear of the marriage. Frithjof is sent away, and Ingeborg laments and is forced to marry old King Ring. Frithjof returns, goes to the temple of Balder, and there, seeing the bracelet he gave Ingeborg on the arm of the god's statue, he tries to wrench it away, and by so doing fires the temple. The subsequent proceedings of Frithjof and Ingeborg interested the composer no more.

The overture is "well made." What is meant by this? The admirers of such overtures would say: "This music has form; it follows safely the approved traditions. There is an introduction with typical motives. The themes in the main body of the overture are clearly exposed and they are skilfully developed. There is no attempt to be pictorial. The coda may well be taken to portray the burning of the temple, but here, as everywhere, expression is moderate and regulated." And so on and so on.

This is all true. But consider a moment the saga itself, which smells of forest and sea. The lovers and their enemies are under a wild northern sky. There are elemental emotions. There is barbaric rage which defies the gods as well as men. Is there any of the spirit of the saga in this music? The music of Dubois is sleek. The love passages might be at Meudon on a Sunday afternoon. Is the first theme expressive of "Frithjof in exile" or expressive of any strong emotion? Nowhere is there a fiery burst; and the bass drum and cymbals used after the finale formula of old-fashioned Italian opera do not console us.

It is a good thing to hear occasionally such music, for it reminds us of the great advance made in France during the last 20 years by the men of the younger school. France produced Berlioz, who was of the romantic movement that swept Europe. After his great orchestral works were produced the musicians of talent looked for years only toward the stage for glory. It is to Dubois' credit that he tried for fame in the concert hall; it is not his fault if he is without imagination.

Miss Olive Mead played last night for the fourth time at these concerts. Her first appearance was in January, 1898. Each appearance has marked her progress in technical proficiency. Her performance of Beethoven's concerto may be considered, perhaps, as a mark of graduation which should be rewarded with a diploma; and it is a pleasure to add that in this concerto she showed a fuller tone and a broader and warmer style than in preceding years.

Her performance was creditable to her in many ways. It would be untrue and injurious to her to say that her interpretation was the full expression of the contents of the work. Her limitations in this respect are temperamental and spiritual rather than mechanical. Many play this concerto; the interpreters of it may be counted on the fingers. Miss Mead was heartily applauded.

The symphony by Brahms, the least striking of the four, brought the close. At the concert this week Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," a set of variations on a fantastic knightly theme, with introduction and finale, will be performed for the first time in this city.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 14th Symphony recital and concert had for a novelty the overture, "Frithjof," by Theodore Dubois. Miss Olive Mead was the soloist in Beethoven's D major concerto for the violin and Brahms' fourth symphony completed the selections. In the "Frithjof" overture Dubois uses motifs, in the Wagnerian manner, to express emotions, the more tender one, called "Ingeborg," being given to the clarinet, the others to combinations of instruments, with the chief dramatic episodes vigorously illustrated by the drums, double basses and the heavier instrument, each one being allotted themes as well as ensemble work.

The overture tells the story of Frithjof's love for Ingeborg, an Icelandic saga, his disappointment, anger and exile; the maiden's lamentations, her lover's return, his rage at finding her married and his setting Balder's temple on fire. It will be seen that in illustrating these incidents the score should necessarily be chiefly in a vigorous vein, and it is. Dubois has treated his subject with considerable skill and without a superabundant use of dissonant phrases and modulations. The thematic melodies are not disjointed affairs, but developed harmonies, as a rule, and some of the motifs are beautifully expressive of the daintier sentiments. There is a skilful contrast between the gentle "Frithjof" theme in the first part and the same motif in fortissimo at the close, and throughout the morceau each musical type of expression is handled with excellent effect.

The orchestra performed the work splendidly. The cellos sang the opening phrases very sweetly, the clarinet gave its theme equally well, the "wrath" motif was as vigorous and as fortissimo as could be desired, and the woodwinds repeated the phrases of the lighter string contingents smoothly and in perfect unison. The complicated climax was a musical storm, indeed, yet not in a hurly-burly sense, for Mr Gericke's control of his men prevented a chaotic finale.

The young American violinist, Olive Mead, has already proved herself an artist of great ability, and her performance of the Beethoven concerto showed her marked improvement in interpreting works of the larger style. Her bowing was excellent, although lacking in breadth by reason of a lack of physical strength, her fingering was nearly flawless, and the difficult runs, double stoppings, chord and arpeggios were executed with an ease and celerity which indicated a technical mastery of the instrument. All the figurations were played with pleasing daintiness and grace, her cadenza work calling for special commendation, and her audience gave undoubted marks of appreciation by recalling the young artist several times at the close of her performance.

The support by the orchestra was of the usual high standard. The Brahms symphony received admirable treatment, of course, the third movement, possibly, calling for special mention.

This week's program will comprise the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon"; Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Quixote," first time here, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Phony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the fourteenth Symphony Concert, which took place Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke had the assistance of Miss Olive Mead, violinist. This was the programme:

Dubois: Overture, "Frithjof." (First time.)
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 61.
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.

The fourteenth Symphony Concert is an occasion of which little can be said, for of the novelty of the evening the less that is said the better, and of the other works there is nothing to say that has not already been said by some ten or twenty times. Since the overture by Dubois, however, cannot be passed by in silence, one may suggest that it is but a feeble illustration of the famous old saga that tells, in stirring way, the loves and woes of the heroic Frithjof and the queen Ingeborg. It begins charmingly, even poetically. It ends magniloquently. Between the beginning and the end it is dull.

From quite different reasons, there is also nothing to say about the Brahms symphony, the wonderful beauties of which have been descanted on time and time again. Its performance, though, is another matter. Mr. Gericke, of course, has long been famous for his sympathy with and understanding of Brahms, yet it seems a long while since the massive strength and the idyllic grace of this Brahms symphony have been presented in so masterly a way as they were on Saturday. The entire performance was a triumph of noble conducting and of splendid orchestral playing.

The symphony was not happily placed on the programme, for it followed the Beethoven violin concerto, a symphony, and a beautiful one, in itself. Indeed, so vast a work as this concerto might well be allowed to pass for a symphony, and be accompanied by pieces of a smaller scale, like overtures and suites. Miss Mead played the solo part with beautiful tone, notably pure intonation and general musical intelligence. She has not, of course, the breadth of style or the warmth of temperament that are necessary for an exhaustive performance of a work of this calibre. Miss Mead was heartily applauded, being recalled quite four times.

Next Saturday there will be no soloist. This will be the programme: Overture to "Anacreon," Cherubini; symphonic poem, "Don Quixote," Richard Strauss (first time); symphony No. 7, in A major, Beethoven.

Transcript Feb 8 1904 R. R. G.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Feb 7

The program for the 14th Symphony recital and concert had for a novelty the overture, "Frithjof," by Theodore Dubois. Miss Olive Mead was the soloist in Beethoven's D major concerto for the violin and Brahms' fourth symphony completed the selections. In the "Frithjof" overture Dubois uses motifs, in the Wagnerian manner, to express emotions, the more tender one, called "Ingeborg," being given to the clarinet, the others to combinations of instruments, with the chief dramatic episodes vigorously illustrated by the drums, double basses and the heavier instrument, each one being allotted themes as well as ensemble work.

The overture tells the story of Frithjof's love for Ingeborg, an Icelandic saga, his disappointment, anger and exile; the maiden's lamentations, her lover's return, his rage at finding her married and his setting Balder's temple on fire. It will be seen that in illustrating these incidents the score should necessarily be chiefly in a vigorous vein, and it is. Dubois has treated his subject with considerable skill and without a superabundant use of dissonant phrases and modulations. The thematic melodies are not disjointed affairs, but developed harmonies, as a rule, and some of the motifs are beautifully expressive of the daintier sentiments. There is a skilful contrast between the gentle "Frithjof" theme in the first part and the same motif in fortissimo at the close, and throughout the morceau each musical type of expression is handled with excellent effect.

The orchestra performed the work splendidly. The cellos sang the opening phrases very sweetly, the clarinet gave theme equally well, the "wrath" motif was as vigorous and as fortissimo as should be desired, and the woodwinds repeated the phrases of the lighter string contingents smoothly and in perfect union. The complicated climax was a musical storm, indeed, yet not in a hurly-burly sense, for Mr Gericke's control of his men prevented a chaotic finale.

The young American violinist, Olive Mead, has already proved herself an artist of great ability, and her performance of the Beethoven concerto showed her marked improvement in interpreting works of the larger style. Her bowing was excellent, although lacking in breadth by reason of a lack of physical strength, her fingering was nearly flawless, and the difficult runs, double stoppings, chord and arpeggios were executed with an ease and celerity which indicated a technical mastery of the instrument. All the figures were played with pleasing daintiness and grace, her cadenza work calling for special commendation, and her audience gave undoubted marks of appreciation by recalling the young artist several times at the close of her performance.

The support by the orchestra was of the usual high standard. The Brahms symphony received admirable treatment, of course, the third movement, possibly, calling for special mention.

This week's program will comprise the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon"; Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Quixote," first time here, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THE SYMPHONY

Traveler Feb. 8, 1904

Overture, "Frithjof".....Dubois
(First time.)

Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Symphony in E minor, No. 4....Brahms

This 14th concert, like so many of its predecessors, was in the eminently respectable vein, with nothing to startle, nothing even to suggest the prickling of one hair with emotion. Next week, thanks to the musical fates, we are to be roused, doubtless by one of Richard Strauss' wild and strenuous works, but that is still in futuro. We have had so little to wake us up this year that even the anticipation is exciting.

The Dubois overture was in the true Dubois vein, neatly made, prettily orchestrated, mellifluous and fair, but devoid of inspiration. What a more inspired man might have done with the saga story, it were useless to conjecture. Enough to say that the eminent French organist and professor has escaped in a remarkable way any of the flavor of forest or ocean. Even the finale, dramatic enough in the legend, was merely a lightning flash striking a hive of honey. Away with Dubois—or, at least, let us hear only his pieces for the organ. Are we not rather surfeited with him when the Handel and Haydn gives his "Paradise Lost" twice within the year?

Miss Olive Mead played the familiar Beethoven concerto for violin with skill and beauty. She has not, and perhaps may never have, all that might be wished in strength and breadth and that something that calls the inherent soul from the G string, and yet she gave much pleasure by the refinement of her style and the artistic appreciation of her task.

Brahms E minor symphony, most academic and abstruse of his four, was admirably read and as admirably played. Here is the music in which Mr. Gericke doubtless revels, and in which his methods are most effective. He can give Brahms beauty if any man can, and his clear and sane vision sees all that the master of Vienna intended. It was a purely lovely performance throughout and amply rewarded those who heard it.

No. 3.

ist:

KRASSELT.

Courtesy Funk & Wagnalls

RICHARD STRAUSS

Henry Block, sc.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8, P. M

Programme.

CHERUBINI,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Anacreon."

RICHARD STRAUSS,

"DON QUIXOTE." (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale.) Fantastic variations on a theme of Knightly character, op. 35.
(Violoncello Solo by Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT.)
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto ed Allegro vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Scherzo e Trio.
IV. Finale. Allegro con brio.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Courtesy Funk & Wagnalls

RICHARD STRAUSS

Henry Block, sc.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8, P. M

Programme.

CHERUBINI,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Anacreon."

RICHARD STRAUSS,

"DON QUIXOTE." (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale.) Fantastic variations on a theme of Knightly character, op. 35.
(Violoncello Solo by Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT.)
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto ed Allegro vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Scherzo e Trio.
IV. Finale. Allegro con brio.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THE SYMPHONY

Traveler Feb. 15, 1904

Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini
"Don Quixote," fantastical variations on a theme of knightly character, Op. 35
(first time).....R. Strauss
Symphony in A major No. 7.....Beethoven

There is no denying that this concert was cunningly put together by Mr. Gericke, who does not always show such skill in devising programmes of clever contrasts. Hats off to the achievement at last!

For, of course, everything was arranged to show off Richard Strauss' enormously discussed "Don Quixote." Now, whether Mr. Gericke really loves Strauss and wished to give him an advantage, or is of the contrary mind and tried to make his bizarre-ness more ugly, is not to the point. It is sufficient that he placed Cherubini's "Anacreon" before it and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony after it.

The Cherubini overture, which, by the way, was played in cold but flawless style, is of that "faily regular" family in which pure classicism of form and expression are all that are desired. It has its own chaste beauties, never sensuous, never even mildly exciting. The feminine form in marble is its prototype in art; in that line of endeavor Cherubini was and will remain a master.

In coming to the discussion of the "Don Quixote" work, we must remember first of all that the piece is purely of the "programme-music" order; indeed, it is excessively so, since absolute dependence on the printed formula of the various movements is necessary for any comprehending of the score, save that there is in it real and impressive humor. Writers there are who declare that music cannot in itself be funny; any such should hear this colossal joke of Strauss' and be confounded. But further than that "Don Quixote" does not go without the aid of the programme.

But with that, what a world of marvels is there! It is freak music of the most exalted and brilliant sort, mingled with themes of beauty, nobility and loveliness that give dignity and charm even just as the ears have been tormented by the cacaphony and weird progressions of the scenic and mental pictures.

Whether the Don, with his distorted but manly chivalry, is to be depicted by a cello, or Sancho by a viola—much better have left him as a bass-clarinete that he was at first—needs no argument. The "motifs" of each are peculiarly interesting and appropriate, and the whole introduction, showing knight-errantry and the growing madness of Don Quixote, could have been written by no other living man. Strong, impressive, musicianly, the thing lives and breathes and conquers. Of a piece, too, is the broad yet beautifully tranquil music of the Don's death.

The freak triumphs are several. The tilt with the windmill, the joust at the sheep, with the most wonderful simulation of ba-a-ing imaginable to music, the whistling wind of the ride on the wooden horse and the combat with the monks are all evidences of the great, original genius of the composer. To be sure, there are dull passages here and there—the dialogues between the Don and Sancho, the journey in the enchanted bark, the knight's vigil—but on the whole the fantasia is a stupendous achievement, a tour de force of ingenuity. The piece was played in virtuoso style, both by the orchestra as a whole and by Messrs. Krasselt and Zach, who gave the cello and viola passages respectively.

The great humanity, the lofty charm, the angelic beauty of Beethoven seemed very marked after Strauss' ultra-modernity. Mr. Gericke read the Seventh Symphony with rare skill and ended triumphantly a concert of rare attractiveness.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv. Programme, Feb 15, 1904
Overture to the Opera "Anacreon"....Cherubini
"Don Quixote." (Introduction, Theme with variations, and finale.) Fantastical variations on a theme of knightly character, op. 35.....Richard Strauss
Violoncello solo (First time)....Rudolph Krasselt
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92....Beethoven

It was the first performance in Boston of a great work about which there is much discussion. It is well known that our great orchestral conductor is not in deep sympathy with the extreme modern school; all the more credit to him, therefore, that he takes such great care that it shall be perfectly presented. We doubt whether Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" has ever been so well performed (technically) anywhere, or whether this harmonic jungle will ever be traversed with more surety. The amount of work entailed by the performance may be faintly judged of when one is told that there were almost a dozen extra rehearsals on this single composition.

Was it as a sly presentation of his own views in the matter that Mr. Gericke gave Cherubini's lofty "Anacreon" overture before, and Beethoven's 7th symphony after this radical work? It reminded the auditor that one school does not abolish another, that even Strauss has not dimmed the glory of the classics. And old Cherubini sounded as majestic as ever, forming a stately introduction to the "melee" that followed.

"Don Quixote" is one of the recent innovations in the variation form. D'Indy made an experiment in this field by giving a set of variations in reversed order, the theme coming last; Huber made a set on a series of paintings by Boecklin; Elgar served up a number of his friends and acquaintances in variation sauce; and here comes a greater composer than any of them and gives us Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in a set of variation-adventures. Decidedly the modern composer is endeavoring to treat the variation-form by new processes.

In these variations Strauss has followed the thought of Berlioz, who caused the viola to become a definite character (Childe Harold), and has caused two instruments to become dramatis personae,—the violoncello being the fantastic Don and the viola his humble esquire. One can at once pay tribute to Mr. Krasselt and to Mr. Zach, who played the obligati with splendid effect and were applauded to the echo at the end of the work.

As to the composition itself one may well pause and become timid in rendering a verdict. Here is the chief master of the modern orchestra, a man who is the greatest tone-colorist that the world has ever possessed, giving a mixture of hideous and beautiful, of quassia and champagne, in a manner that must be called intensely graphic but not at all enjoyable. Is art to be enjoyed? That seems to be the question of the present.

167
Strauss answers in the negative. With such a complex work it must be demanded of every auditor that he sit up nights and study the score minutely before he ventures to attend the first performance. Let no man accuse the modern music of lack of intellectuality; it is as complexly intellectual as Grell's Mass in 16 real parts, but it requires a wholly different species of mental exertion on the part of the auditor from that demanded by Bach or Palestrina.

The matter becomes the more perplexing when one remembers that Strauss is not forced to this extreme ugliness by lack of ideas, as Bruckner may have been, for he has composed serenely beautiful works in the most classical forms, before he swept into this modern chaos.

Once upon a time there was a school of composition which indulged in every complexity of progression, which experimented with all possible abstrusities, which did not care how ugly its music sounded so that it was terrifically ingenious. The Flemish school has passed away, yet its composers may be regarded as the plowmen who made the harvest of Bach and the later giants possible. Perhaps the present school of mighty experimenters in tonal ugliness will also leave a good legacy. Some day an orchestral composer will come who will weld the melodic beauty of a bizet upon the wonderful tone-coloring and graphically of Strauss, and a new school of instrumental music will arise. Strauss himself might head this school if he would. Music is not a fixed and unchanging Art.

The pure contrapuntal school became monody with the beginning of opera; Bach altered the entire face of musical modulation; Beethoven led into a completely new domain; Wagner evolved a style utterly at variance with all that had preceded; we are probably upon the verge of another marked change and these volcanic throes, but herald the birth of the orchestral school of the 20th century.

There might have been more humor in the interpretation of the work. The bleating of the sheep was a startling touch of realism, but Dr. Strauss will emphasize it more when he gives the work here next month. The journey through the air is one of the phenomena of the composition. The introduction of the wind-machine is amazingly exciting. It sounds like a piccolo that has suddenly gone crazy. Yet it remained in tune with the music. Berlioz and Wagner introduced bells into the orchestra; Tschalkowsky added cannon ("1812"); Strauss adds this revolving wheel with its fierce glissando effects; the composer of the future has only Whitfield torpedoes to add to his list of instruments.

Touchees of much beauty and grace appeared occasionally, like plums in a pudding. Among these the counterpoint of the bassoons, in the 9th variation, and the twisted modulations of the first theme, typifying Don Quixote's false reasoning, and the clear presentation of ideas at the close, portraying the return of sanity, may be mentioned. At the end of the thorny journey, Mr. Gericke was called to the stand to bow to the applause of the audience; he pointed to his orchestra; let both conductor and men share in the gratitude a public for the most technically perfect performance of this most trying work. When came Beethoven's 7th symphony. The first movement was spoiled for us by the wild orgie we had passed through, but by the time that the Allegretto came we were normal again, and the solemn iteration of dactyl and spondee, and that tenderly consoling Trio, brought us back to sanity. Mr. Gericke's reading of this second movement was altogether great. He avoided the mawkishness that Beethoven feared here, and gave a most effective interpretation of this gem of slow movements. The symphony is replete with powerful organ-points; there is one in the first movement, another in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the most powerful of all in the coda of the finale. All three were properly emphasized and the entire work left the best possible impression. Spite of all the added effects of concussion, spite of all the phantasmagoria of latter-day music, we need not take Beethoven off his pedestal just yet.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 15th symphony rehearsal and concert contained an interesting feature in Richard Strauss' fantastic "variations on a theme of knightly character," entitled "Don Quixote." The other selections were the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon," and the great A major symphony by Beethoven. "Don Quixote" was finished about seven years ago and since then it has been the subject for wordy warfare, not only abroad, but in this country, where the piece was performed about five years ago in Chicago under the direction of Theodore Thomas. Dr Strauss has attracted so much attention by his masterly skill as a composer that the announced performance here of the much-discussed work aroused new curiosity in his musical "problem"; and doubtless since this curiosity has been satisfied, opinions pro and con, will now be in order. Earlier in the week, in Chickering hall, Mr Lang gave a puzzling composition by Debussy, repeating the work on the same evening to better enable the auditors to grasp the musical significance of three "Nocturnes"; but it will take more than one repetition of the Strauss poem for the majority of people to decide whether it is real music or mainly a conglomeration of sounds—a kind of musical satire or joke.

The work is strictly unconventional, effects are produced in the strangest musical fashion, many of them are seemingly without precedent in their odd instrumentation, and yet, with the subject, Don Quixote, in mind, this fantastic treatment undoubtedly illustrates the theme in a vivid manner. Cervantes certainly keeps one guessing what new and visionary emotion will awaken in the lean knight, and Dr Strauss' composition produces a similar effect.

There are about a dozen variations on the knightly theme, beginning with the mad don dreaming of adventures in the field of chivalry and closing with his peaceful death. Don Quixote is typified by the solo cello; the love theme is suggested by the violin, the viola representing the Sancho Panza theme. In the mass of orchestral chaos there is interspersed writing graceful, original and noble in invention, beautiful examples of musical art in coherent form, and harmonies which are enchanting, but, unfortunately, brief.

Mr Krasselt played the chief cello part, the Don Quixote theme, with splendid expression, and Mr Zack and Mr Arbos gave the viola and violin solos in a sympathetic manner. The orchestra evidently was faithful in illustrating Mr Gericke's ideas regarding the interpretation of the immensely difficult work; but further than that it would be difficult to judge after a single hearing of one of the most perplexing descriptive pieces ever performed here. The finale, the don's death, is wonderfully expressed and here the almost unrivaled ensemble playing of the orchestra was shown in perfection. The work afforded plenty of amusement for the players as well as auditors, the former when not busy, scanning the spectators with half-puzzled expressions as if to ask "what do you think of it?"

The Anacreon overture was performed admirably and the Beethoven symphony, especially the charming second movement, was given in the usual faultless style. George—Feb 14 1904

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week. The program announced for Feb 26 and 27 includes Mozart's symphony in E flat, Akimenko's "Lyric Poem" (first time), Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." Mme Schumann-Heink will sing Andromache's scene from Bruch's "Achilles" and two songs by Brahms with viola and piano accompaniment.

THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" Will Be Produced at Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra Today.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra, this afternoon, Mr. Gericke conductor, is one of extraordinary interest, for Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" will be produced for the first time in Boston. This remarkable composition has been played in Chicago, but we know of no other performance in this country.

"Don Quixote" is a series of fantastical variations on "a theme of a knightly character." A solo violoncello is typical of Don Quixote throughout the piece and Sancho Panza is typified by a solo viola.

The introduction portrays Don Quixote reading books of chivalry, dreaming of the ideal maiden to be rescued and of all manner of adventures. He goes mad. Then follows the announcement of Don Quixote's and Sancho Panza's themes.

Nearly a Dozen Variations

In the Theme of "Don Quixote."

The variations are as follows: (1) The two set out on their adventures, and Don Quixote fights the windmills; (2) He charges the sheep and thus gains a mighty victory over the army of Alifanfaron—a remarkable example of instrumentation, with a chorus of "Ba-a-a-a!" in the muted brass, while the strings portray the dust cloud, and there is a pastoral melody in the wood wind; (3) Dialogue and dispute of the knight and his squire concerning the comparative worth of the ideal and the real; (4) The adventure with the Penitents, who attacked by Don Quixote as robbers, beat him soundly; (5) The knight keeps vigil and meditates on the charms of Dulcinea; (6) Sancho tries to persuade his master that a country wench is his adorable Dulcinea; (7) Knight and squire, blindfolded, sit on a wooden horse and believe they are flying through the air in a furious gale. Here the wind machine is used; (8) The journey in the enchanted bark; the upsetting, and the prayer of thanksgiving when the two, dripping, reach the bank; (9) The fight with two monks, who to the knight are evil magicians; (10) Don Quixote, defeated by his friend disguised as the Knight of the Silver Moon, goes home determined to be a shepherd. The finale portrays the death of Don Quixote. The cello speaks his last words: he sees clearly his illusions and is willing to die.

Great Pains Have Been Taken In Preparation of This Work.

Great pains have been taken in the preparation of this work, which has excited hot discussion, and the performance has been anticipated eagerly. The other pieces, at this concert will be Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" and Beethoven's symphony No. 7.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week. The programme of the concerts for Feb. 26-27 will include Mozart's symphony in E flat; Akimenko's "Lyric Poem" (first time); Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing Andromache's scene from Bruch's "Achilles," and two songs by Brahms with viola and piano accompaniment.

RICHARD STRAUSS' TONE STORY "DON QUIXOTE"

Number, New to Boston, Feature of Symphony Program.

B. Journal—Feb 15 1904

Richard Strauss' tone story, "Don Quixote," new to Boston, stood midway on this week's Symphony program. It is a wonderful piece of work, to be heard more than once for full comprehension and appreciation, and not to be hastily reviewed in a season of clamorous and crowding war news. It illustrates its composer's ability to deal both with the heroic and the grotesque, and tells the different talents that characterize "Hero Life" and "Owlglass Pranks." Its introduction hints at the atmosphere of legendary reading, rhapsody and dream, in which the don dwelt in his earlier days. Short, disconnected, irrelevant notions compose it, one merging or breaking into another, none tending to any definite end or reaching any precise conclusion. Yet there are hints of nobility, beauty and deeds of high emprise, and a kind of martial determination is reached at last.

The thematic ideas are simple—a pensive, plain, but attractive subject, assigned to the solo cello, indicates the don, who was a true gentleman of Spain in spite of his follies and vagaries, while a rough, jolly, blunt air (given first by the bass clarinet and then transferred to the viola) stands for the burly, garrulous, plebeian Sancho Panza. Ten variations follow, each suggesting in Strauss' bold, ingenious and graphic fashion some episode in the knight's course of travels, most of them having the seriousness which his adventures were for him, although some acknowledge the extravagance that others saw in them. Every orchestral device, including even the whistling, howling wind machine of the theaters, is used, so that the sound effects are myriad and convincing, while the musicianly skill in preserving the individuality of knight and squire in the ever remodeled orchestral development is not less masterly.

The finale, illustrating the don's peaceful, resigned and religious death, is pathetic, one symbolic phrase after another fading away from the restored and enlightened mind, until lofty tranquillity closes all.

The cello part was played genially and truthfully by Mr. Krasselt, who was much applauded therefor, and Mr. Ferir was excellent in the Sancho music. Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture began and Beethoven's seventh symphony ended the program, both being old acquaintances and well presented.

"DON QUIXOTE" AT SYMPHONY

R. Strauss' Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character Are Very Fantastic and Make the Hero a Fool.

INJUSTICE TO FAMOUS GENTLEMAN OF FICTION

Composer Essays to Make Him Into a Laughing Stock, When in Reality He Was a Pathetic and Noble Character.

B. Journal—Feb 15 1904

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows: Overture to "Anacreon"..... Cherubini "Don Quixote," fantastical variations on theme of knightly character, Op. 35 (first time). . . . . R. Strauss Symphony in A major No. 7. . . . . Beethoven

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," composed in 1897, was played last night for the first time in Boston. So far as we can learn, the performance was the second in the United States. The first was at Chicago in 1899. The performance last night had been prepared with infinite care. It was read with sympathy and imaginative intelligence, as well as with the utmost technical authority, and it was played brilliantly. Mr. Krasselt was the solo cellist and Mr. Zach played the solo viola. There was hearty applause, and conductor and soloists were obliged to bow in acknowledgment.

Formidable Task of Putting "Don Quixote" to Music.

This music is exceedingly, enormously ingenious. Ingenuity is the distinguishing feature of the composition; but ingenuity is not the chief characteristic of the purest and the noblest art. The task undertaken by Strauss was formidable if not impossible: to typify Don Quixote and Sancho Panza by solo instruments and to portray them as plunged into all manner of orchestral adventures. The most striking sections of the work are those in which Strauss portrays moods, as the introduction in which there is a psycho-musical representation of the giving way of intellect; the passage in the third variation where Don Quixote speaks nobly of the ideal; the finale in which Don Quixote realizes the utter vanity of his illusions and gives up the ghost. In these instances music is employed legitimately and reasonably; and in these Strauss rises to his greatest height, in this particular work, as an imaginative composer.

His musical representation of conversation between Knight and Squire is for the most part tedious. And it may here be said that any exhibition of mere ingenuity, mere cleverness if it be prolonged for too long a time, is necessarily boring, and the hearer or the spectator yearns for something simple, something truly beautiful or impressive.

The variations attempt to portray in music certain adventures told in Cervantes' romance. There is no mistaking the Knight's attack on the sheep. The imitation of the baa-ing flock is surprisingly realistic; but the heaven is tempted to cry out with Agesilaus who, when asked to praise a fellow who imitated a nightingale, answered: "I have heard the nightingale itself." So, too, there is no doubt in the seventh variation that there is a mighty wind abroad; yet who without a programme explanation would associate this variation with the Knight and Squire, blindfolded, on the wooden horse?

Much of this music is for a panorama, and it is a pity that it does not accompany a panorama as it moves, or comment on entertaining views thrown on a screen. How is the Knight of the White Moon to be identified? Would any one without jogging of his elbow see windmills in the first variation? These are not captious objections. The composer made his variations; he supplied motives for them in the transcription for the piano; he accepted without protest the elaborately explanatory programme books for the Strauss festival in London, at which he was present. He wrote panorama music. Unfortunately, he neglected to provide the panorama itself, with the wind machine and other extra instruments for his swollen orchestra.

Mistake of Quixote as Fool Instead of as a Gentleman.

If the work is to be taken seriously—and fantastical persons are often the most serious of human beings—witness "Don Quixote"—there are aesthetic objections to Strauss' scheme. The variations for the most part are concerned with the ridiculous adventures of the Knight, with the grotesque pages that appeal to young readers, who see in "Don Quixote" merely an amusing book, just as children read "Gulliver's Travels" for the sake of surprise and consequent laughter, and miss the terrible irony. Don Quixote is the noblest gentleman in all fiction. Yet he is portrayed by Strauss to excite laughter.

Laughter is the lowest, cheapest expression of the superiority of him that laughs over the one laughed at. A man is guilty of awkwardness; he is foolish in speech, he cuts a silly figure at an ill-timed moment; he falls at the risk of bodily injury. There is laughter. He that laughs exults in his mental superiority or in his own inability to be ridiculous. Laughter is not necessarily the same thing as joy; there is a laugh that is kindly, just as the most common form of laughter is satanic.

No music in which the laugh of implied superiority is the leading motive can be beautiful or noble. It is merely ingenious, clever, diabolically clever; yet induces yawning; it does not brook frequent repetition.

It is fairer perhaps to consider "Don Quixote" as a colossal joke. The music no more lessens the grandeur and taints the sweetness of Don Quixote's character than did the impersonation of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance by Mr. Barnabee, when DeKoven's operetta was produced here 15 years ago. If Don Quixote could hear this music, he would regard it as another one of his illusions.

We are warm admirers of the uncommon talent of Richard Strauss. His "Don Juan," "Death and Apotheosis," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life" are great and unusual works, which may pass him to posterity as a genius. We regret, therefore, the more that he wrote "Don Quixote," especially as it is the only one of his more important works that is for the most part ineffective and dull.

The overture to "Anacreon" never sounded so superbly classic and so modern; the allegretto of Beethoven never seemed so human and so spiritual in its sublime melancholy.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of last Saturday's symphony concert, the fifteenth of the season:

Cherubini: Overture to the Opera "Anacreon."
Richard Strauss: "Don Quixote." (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale.) Fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, Op. 35. (First time.)

Violoncello solo by Mr. Rudolf Krasselt.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.

The matter of most moment connected with this concert was, of course, the first performance in Boston of Richard Strauss' composition, "Don Quixote." Although played here the other night for the first time, the work is not new, having been produced as early as 1898 at Cologne, and less than a year later at Chicago. It precedes, therefore, "Ein Heldenleben," which we already know here, so far as acquaintance is consonant with a solitary hearing.

Admirers of the tremendous conception of the "Heldenleben" and of the dramatic power displayed in "Tod und Verklärung" must needs be disappointed in "Don Quixote." The subject is lofty, according to the opinion of the world for three hundred years or so, and therefore, worthy of the same elevated treatment that Strauss has applied to his other orchestral poems, both earlier and later. In the case of "Don Quixote," however, Strauss has apparently seen only the man's crazed, grotesque side. Quite forgetful that Cervantes' creation was always, despite his eccentricities, "a very parafait gentle knigite," Strauss has made of him a ridiculous, pitiful buffoon. He first depicts a scene of violent madness, more suggestive of Bedlam than of the Spaniard's disordered condition, then proceeds to set everybody a-laughing at a series of farcical happenings more like the adventures of Carrie Nation at Harvard and at Yale than those of the chivalrous Don. That the madhouse episode sounds genuinely, horribly maniacal, that the tilt with the sheep is portrayed with an amazing orchestral ventriloquism of bleats and baas, that the high wind seems authentically gusty, goes without saying. In this composition, as in all his others, Strauss has contrived strange effects that will be curiously analyzed by all students of clever and brilliant instrumentation. The ingenuity of the musician, too, demands admiration. Not the minutest detail has escaped him that possibly could serve to make more vivid the picture of Don Quixote's experiences. All these details, however, are somewhat in vain unless each listener is furnished with a carefully prepared table of the variations, for, with all his skill and cunning, Strauss has not been able so plainly to indicate, to give an example, a windmill in motion, that it could be recognized unless the auditor's elbow were jogged. The themes representing Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, furthermore, are not strongly individualized. The one is not essentially noble and knightly, the other is not sharply in contrast. Strauss, in short, has misconceived the character of the Spanish hero, seeing a clown where there was a nobleman. He has also obstructed the march of his genius by overwhelming impedimenta of petty detail. Only one passage, in the middle of the work, reaches the plane of grandeur on which Strauss, more constantly than any living composer of music, abides. Now that we have heard the "Don Quixote," for which opportunity all thanks, why may we not have again "Tod und Verklärung," "Ein Heldenleben," or "Zarathustra," that we may not forget the quality of the real Richard Strauss?

In comparison with this musical burlesque, the "Anacreon" overture, played with a dazzling brilliancy, sounded more intrinsically noble than ever before. And never have the rhythms of the first Beethoven movement seemed more enchanting, the very poetry of motion. Nor did Beethoven's exquisite sense of tonal color suffer in juxtaposition with the flaunting daubs and splashes from Strauss' orchestral palette. The concert was admirably arranged; each composition displayed its own actual worth.

There will be no symphony concert this week. On Feb. 27 Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing, and this is to be the programme:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No. 3).
Max Bruch: Andromache's Aria, from "Achilles."
Th. Aklmenko: Lyric Poem. (First time.)
Brahms: Two Songs with Viola and Piano accompaniment.

Emil Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

R. R. G.

MME SCHUMANN-HEINK, WHO WILL CELEBRATE HER TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY NEXT WEEK.

173

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in E flat major (K, 543.)

I. Adagio. Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto.

IV. Finale: Allegro.

MAX BRUCH,

ANDROMACHE'S LAMENT, from "Achilles."
(Part II, No. 8), op. 50. "The dawn still lingers."

TH. AKIMENKO,

LYRIC POEM, for ORCHESTRA, op. 20.
(First time.)

BRAHMS,

TWO SONGS with Viola and Piano accompaniment
op. 91.

a) "LONGING AT REST."

b) "CRADLE SONG OF THE VIRGIN."

EMIL CHABRIER,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Gwendoline."

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

MME. ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in E flat major (K, 543.)

I. Adagio. Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto.

IV. Finale: Allegro.

MAX BRUCH,

ANDROMACHE'S LAMENT, from "Achilles."
(Part II, No. 8), op. 50. "The dawn still lingers."

TH. AKIMENKO,

LYRIC POEM, for ORCHESTRA, op. 20.
(First time.)

BRAHMS,

TWO SONGS with Viola and Piano accompaniment
op. 91.

a) "LONGING AT REST."

b) "CRADLE SONG OF THE VIRGIN."

EMIL CHABRIER,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Gwendoline."

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the sixteenth symphony concert (Saturday, Feb. 27, in Symphony Hall), Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist and this was the programme played:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543).
Max Bruch: Andromache's Lament, from "Achilles," (Part 2, No. 8), Op. 50. "The dawn still lingers."

Th. Akimenko: Lyric Poem, for Orchestra, Op. 20. (First time.)

Brahms: Two Songs with Viola and Piano accompaniment, Op. 91—

"Longing at Rest."

"Cradle Song of the Virgin."

Emil Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

This, the sixteenth concert, was unusually attractive, both in programme and in performance. The lovely symphony of Mozart, after the modern works we have long been praying for and have lately received in overwhelming force, held its own beyond all cavil, even in the large hall to which it is not adapted. For perfection of form, indeed, distinction of melody, exquisite orchestral color, and a free spontaneity that refreshes, the first movement, with its beautiful pages of slow introduction, towers far, far above most of the new works we have been so interested to hear the past month or so. Even the finale, old-fashioned as it is, vividly and forcibly expresses a joyous gayety not easily discovered in some modern works that have the benefit of plain-spoken titles for the better guidance of listeners: Debussy's nocturne, called "Fetes," and Mr. David Smith's "Overture Joyeuse." Is cheerfulness the one emotion a modern composer cannot suggest? The beauties of the Mozart symphony were admirably brought out by Mr. Gericke, who conducted the first movement entirely in the grand style, with becoming breadth and dignity; in the finale allowing free play to high spirits. For so appreciative and painstaking a performance of Mozart at this day, be all thanks.

The orchestra took equal care with a short lyric poem by a Russian composer, one Akimenko. While the work cannot possibly be regarded as of the slightest consequence, it is yet pleasant to hear, for it is melodious, a stormy episode is worked cleverly in, for the relief of the lyric portions, and the instrumentation is agreeable, if never distinguished. Probably some twenty of our lesser American composers could put their hands in their portfolios and draw out compositions that would put this poem from Russia to confusion.

Far more impressive was the overture to "Gwendoline," the unhappy Chabrier's opera. Here, after several attempts which we have recently heard, Dubois's with "Fritjof," Saint-Saëns's with his "Barbares," comes a musical sketch of barbarous times that actually succeeds in suggesting the wild uncouthness of barbarians, with all their rude strength, and with all the romance we, perhaps ignorantly enough, impute to savage peoples. The picture, too, is always beautiful—melodious when melody is fitting, glowing, burning with orchestral color, passionate to the pitch of violence, noisy with the din of battle, but never needlessly harsh or ugly. This splendid overture, on Saturday splendidly played, makes one long for a presentation of the entire opera.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, in grand voice, sang the lament from Bruch's "Achilles" vastly better than anything she has sung here in several years. She produced her tones carefully, phrased with fine art, was dramatically sincere, refraining from exaggeration, so that, at last, one could understand how she gained the reputation in Germany of being a really great singer. Mme. Schumann-Heink also sang beautifully Brahms's "Cradle Song of the Virgin," to which Mr. Ferir played a viola obbligato notable for lovely tone. The singer was roundly applauded.

At Saturday's concert, Mr. Busoni will appear with the orchestra. This will be the programme: Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major; Saint-Saëns, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5; Vincent d'Indy, Entr'acte from the Opera "L'Etranger" (first time); Liszt, "Todtentanz"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

R. R. G.

FOR SALE

HALF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEAT

In U, alternate Saturday evenings. Address J. L. A., Boston Transcript. (A):

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY TICKET

For Friday rehearsal, first balcony; E centre. Address E.O.B., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Herald Feb. 26, 1904
A Lyric Poem by Pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff to Be a Feature of Today's Programme.

The programme of the 16th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon will include an unfamiliar piece, a Lyric Poem, by Akimenko, one of the younger Russian school, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The piece is a development of a theme of purely lyric character. Akimenko has written pieces for various instruments and piano, songs and a "Schurzo Phantasie" for orchestra. The Lyric Poem was composed in 1898 and published in 1903.

The other orchestral pieces are Mozart's symphony in E flat, with which the concert begins, and the overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." The overture portrays the Danish hero Harold and might be called a symphonic poem.

Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles" and two songs by Brahms with viola and piano accompaniment. The second of these songs, "Cradle Song of the Virgin," was sent by Brahms as a christening gift to the first born son of the Joachims, who was named Johannes after the composer.

The programme of the concert March 4-5, will include Schumann's B flat major symphony; the entr'acte from Vincent d'Indy's new opera, "The Stranger" (first time), and the overture to "Die Meistersinger." Mr. Busoni will play Saint-Saëns' piano concerto No. 5, and Liszt's "Danse Macabre."

MOZART'S E FLAT MAJOR IS PLAYED

Joy and Peace Imparted by the Master at Friday Afternoon's Symphony Concert.

RUSSIAN LYRIC A SUCCESS

Schumann-Heink Added to the Laurels Already Won—She was in Good Voice.

Journal H M T Feb 7 1904

A fine performance of Mozart's E flat major symphony, such as introduced the sixteenth Symphony program, always stirs wonderment that the composer, poor, harassed and scorned, could have found for it, and the other two which he wrote at about the same time, so much loveliness, gentle longing, healthy strength and simple-hearted cheer. Truly, he might have taken as his motto, "My mind to me a kingdom is," and added that he nowhere else held the smallest fief. In this score are delicate distant beauties, hearty companionships and large firmness, which not even Beethoven could exceed in wholesome and intimate humanity. It gives joy, peace and encouragement, and it can never be let die so long as men "feel as they were wont to feel."

At the extreme of the program stood the vehemently demonstrative overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and the orchestra rendered vigorous treatment to the several episodes that symbolize the conquering assault of the Danes upon Britain, the fancies of Harold about the delights and honors of love, followed by the glories of Walhalla, which overbear even the direful tragedies to which the invasion leads. This supplied an exciting conclusion.

Truly a Russian Victory.

Midway was set the "Lyric Poem" of the young Russian, Th. Akimenko, who has cast it, nicely orchestrated, into two chief phases. It is at first warmly sentimental in a melody sympathetically stated by the violas, and then comes an urgent, stormy passee, which broadens, rises and hurries to quite a climax, but then thinks better of its opposition, subsides and gives place to the original theme and manner. It might be a song of a broad river cause, temporarily disturbed by rapids and torrents, or a calm June day crossed by a not too violent storm. It was well read and pleased.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was gladly received, much applauded and more than once recalled after her two numbers, each of which she had chosen judiciously and to advantage. Her dramatic disposition filled deeply the large lament of Andromache over Hector's corpse in the third part of Max Bruch's "Achilles." When this cantata (to call it so) was produced in 1885 at the Lower Rhine Festival, the part of the fond and wretched wife was sung by Mme. Joachim, who, great as she was, could hardly have been more true and strong in the pathos, the bitter outcry and the sharp shriek of pain than was Mme. Schumann-Heink, who tempered the great woe for which the dull beat of the funeral music prepares the mind with sensible reserve and dignity.

Where Woman Loves.

Later she showed the quiet, womanly tenderness of homely moods in two songs by Brahms, the "Gestille Sehnsucht," longing and pathetic, and the "Geistliches Wiegenlied," reverent and pious, yet naturally maternal. These songs were accompanied at the piano-forte by Mr. Zach, with carefully subordinated viola obligato by Mr. Ferit.

At the next concert an entr'acte from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "L'Etranger," will be offered as the novelty, and Mr. Busoni is announced to play, his choice at present resting on Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto. Schumann, Liszt and Wagner will be the other composers.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Feb 28 1904

Mme. Schumann-Heink, the Soloist, is Heard in a Group of Brahms's Songs—A Lyric Poem by Akimenko Heard for the First Time Here

The Symphony Orchestra returned from its tour and gave the customary rehearsal and concert with Mme. Schumann-Heink as the soloist. The programme was made up of Mozart's symphony in E flat, the Lament from Bruch's "Achilles," a lyric poem by Akimenko, heard for the first time here; the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and a group of songs by Brahms.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was in superb voice and was heard to better advantage than when appearing in opera. In the first piece the soloist was accompanied by the viola and the pianoforte, but in the "Cradle Song of the Virgin" the viola played the melody. Seldom has the lady created a more favorable impression.

The next rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon and evening of this week and the soloist will be F. Busoni, pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Symphony in E flat major (K. 543).....Mozart
Andromache's Lament, from "Achilles."
(Part II., No. 8), op. 50. "The dawn still lingers".....Max Bruch
Mme. Schumann-Heink.
Lyric Poem, for Orchestra, op. 20 (First time).....Th. Akimenko
Two Songs with Viola and Piano accompaniment, op. 91.....Brahms
(a) "Longing at Rest."
(b) "Cradle Song of the Virgin."
Mme. Schumann-Heink.
Overture to the Opera "Gwendoline".....Emil Chabrier

The symphony which began the programme was the first in which the clarinette was introduced and has therefore been called the "Clarinet Symphony." It was one of a group of 3, and its companions, the "Jupiter" and the ever-glorious G minor symphony, were both greater than this work in E flat. But it still charms, and the fact that Mr. Gericke was recalled to the platform after its conclusion proves that Mozart is not quite obsolete, even in these days of vivid tonal coloring.

The work was read with much vigor, particularly its finale, and Mr. Gericke evidently enjoyed bringing out its dainty points. Nevertheless, the symphonies of Mozart, outside of the 3 mentioned, are becoming obsolete and do not wear as well as Haydn's pleasant musical prattle.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was in noble voice and sang the unpleasant aria of Andromache, as evolved by the warlike Bruch, with incredible fervor. The frenzied grief that permeates this number requires the footlight flavor, which was so out of place in Mme. Schumann-Heink's recent recital of German "Lieder." The vocalist was great in her declamatory effects and gave the subsequent monotony of grief and despair with impressive majesty. The work is, however, not one of Bruch's best. The plaint of Ingeborg, in his masterpiece, "Frithjof," is infinitely more pathetic.

In Mme. Schumann-Heink's subsequent numbers, by Brahms, a success was won by the instrumentalists as well as the vocalist. But Brahms is not a passionate composer, and the first of these two songs, which dealt with longings, might as well have dealt with mathematics, for all that its emotional power was concerned. We can understand why the intense Tchaikowsky considered Brahms a mediocrity posing as a genius. Composers are seldom the best judges of other composers.

But there was genius in the serene and lofty "cradle song of the virgin," and Mme. Schumann-Heink sang it most effectively. Her rich voice blended beautifully with the dark, mournful tones of the viola, and Mr. Ferit played the latter instrument with most sympathetic quality of tone. Recall followed recall at the end of this song, vocally the gem of the concert.

We may here announce in very large head-lines,—"Another Russian Defeat"!—for Akimenko's lyric poem for orchestra was at the best a Pyrrhic victory, a "success d'estime." But in the field of music the Russians seldom suffer defeat. Their melodic charm is a constant rebuke to the Germans, for they manage to retain tune, while making as bold flights in orchestration as any Teuton of them all!

Almost every true Russian work has a melodic foundation. Akimenko, too, has not left the melodic path, but there seems to be less of inspiration in his climaxes and less of coherency in his treatment than we find in the works of his Muscovite brethren.

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture was given with much power. It has some very broad climaxes and some effective contrasts, but we do not find the sure hand, the delicate touches of a Bizet, in its measures. We have not as much faith in the modern French school as in the Russian. There is not the firm folk-song foundation, for one thing, and there is too much of straining for effect, for another. Chabrier is not so extreme as D'Indy or Debussy, nor so clear and shapely as Widor.

What a leap the French have made in the past century! Not so long ago they had perfect grace and daintiness, as shown in the works of a Boieldieu; Ambroise Thomas was the last of that tribe; now they try to out-Wagner Wagner. The "Gwendoline" overture deserves praise that it does not indulge in the fierce Gallic extremes of the present.

Louis C. Elson.

RUSSIAN MUSIC NEW TO BOSTON

Akimenko's "Lyric Poem" at the Symphony is a Great Disappointment—Mozart's Old-Fashioned E Flat Symphony Given.

CHOPIN AND LISZT PLAYED BY BUSONI

Remarkable Pianist is a Little More Human Than Before, but He is Full of Technic and a Little Shy on Soul.

B. Herald Feb 28 1904

The 16th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E flat.....Mozart
Andromache's Lament from "Achilles".....Bruch
Lyric Poem, op. 20.....Akimenko

(First time.)
Two songs with viola and pianoforte accompaniment, op. 91.....Brahms
(a) Longing at Rest.
(b) Cradle Song of the Virgin.

Overture to the opera "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

Of the three famous symphonies composed by Mozart in 1788, the one in E flat is the most old-fashioned, and readers of the fantastical and blood-curdling Hoffman, who was the first critic in Germany to appreciate fully the romantic genius of Beethoven, may well wonder at his rhapsody over this symphony. It is true that symphonies by Haydn and Mozart should be played by a small orchestra and in a small hall, where the bite of the strings is keenly felt, where the musical fluid quickly enwraps the hearer. Wood-wind instruments may be doubled in the modern full orchestra, and yet there is an absence of the proportion, which is everything in Mozart's music. The symphony in G minor has been so highly praised that it has met the fate of Aristides the Just; but how superior it is to this symphony, which in the first and second movements is square-toed in its formulas! The performance was precise and euphonious.

Akimenko's "Lyric Poem," composed in 1898, and published last year, was played here for the first time. The composer is a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, but no matter how great a teacher may be he cannot put broad or beautiful musical ideas into a pupil's head. Akimenko has written little for orchestra; his works are chiefly piano pieces, small chamber pieces, and songs. This "poem" is built on a sentimental and commonplace theme, and the development of it is interesting only in a few passages of orchestral color. The manner in which material from the contrasting episode is afterward employed is amateurish and at times ugly.

Mrs. Schumann-Heink sang Andromache's lament over the body of Hector from Bruch's "Achilles." The music itself recalled the old story of the Frenchman whose wife died. Complimented on his grief at the funeral ceremonies at the house, the bereaved one asked anxiously: "Did you go to the grave?" "No," answered his friend, "but every one thought you would go crazy at the house." "Ah," said the widower, "you should have seen me at the grave." Bruch's music has neither the noble antique spirit nor true modern intensity. Mrs. Schumann-Heink was in much better voice than at her late recital, and she sang with a far greater display of vocal artistry. Her mannerisms and failings were not in evidence, and on the whole her performance was the finest she has given here, either in opera or in concert. The two songs by Brahms were made endurable by the exquisite tone and sympathy of Mr. Ferir, who played the viola. The "Cradle Song" has a pretty refrain, but "Gestillte Sehnsucht" is without melody or mood. The singer was recalled again and again.

The orchestral feature of the evening was Chabrier's magnificent overture, which was played with appropriate fire and brilliance. The untimely death of this highly original composer was as great a loss to France as that of Bizet. He had superb ideas; he knew how to express them. His language was varied and supple in its eloquence; in his passion there was beauty as well as strength. For daring and successful rhythmical effects, he has never been surpassed, if equalled, and his orchestral palette blazed with gorgeousness. Would that we could hear more music like this overture! Would there were more music like it!

Symphony Orchestra in Providence

After seventeen years of indifferent success, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has at last found a cordial welcome in Providence. Last season its concerts in the Rhode Island capital were abandoned because of lack of support. This year thirty ladies and gentlemen guaranteed the expenses for two concerts—the last of which was held last night—and at both every seat was sold and many stood up. This was the more notable last night because Campanari, who was to be the soloist, became ill at the eleventh hour and the management was forced to provide a substitute. Charles Gillbert was procured and repeated his Boston success.

President Faunce of Brown University was the initiator of the movement to guarantee two concerts, and the success warrants the expectation that there will be at least four concerts next year. Through a working committee, of which Frederick Roy Martin of the Providence Journal has been chairman and Albert Steinert secretary, the guarantors have not only packed the hall and paid the orchestra, but have also laid aside the nucleus of a guarantee for next year's concert. The guarantors have been: Mrs. George H. Corliss, Hans Schneider, John W. Danielson, J. DeF. Danielson, Richard S. Howland, Frederick Roy Martin, William L. Hodgman, Albert Steinert, John Shepard, Jr., Moses B. I. Goddard, Charles Morris Smith, Jr., Robert I. Gammell, Herbert F. Hinckley, Arthur H. Watson, Howard O. Sturges, William Gammell, George W. Parks, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, President W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Miss Mary B. Child, Miss Isabelle Nichols, Miss Alice Dorrance, Mrs. Henry G. Russell, Miss Ella R. Matteson, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, I. Gifford Ladd, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles and the Misses Sharpe.

There has been a direct and urgent appeal to the music-lovers of Providence to support these concerts, partly as a matter of pride; the hour of beginning has been set ahead to 8.15 in order to prevent interference with the dinner hour, which is invariably later in Providence than in Boston; the prices of seats have been materially lowered and the guarantors have asked to have something to say about the soloists and the programme.

Trans.

Feb. 3. 1904.

MUSICAL.

globe Feb. 28. 1904
Mme Schuman-Heinks, Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Building
Fund—Strauss Concerts.

Recitals of the Week and Personal Gossip.

Mme Schumann-Heink was the soloist at the 16th Symphony rehearsal and concert, singing Andromache's lament from the Bruch opera, "Achilles," and two songs by Brahms. Messrs. Fevir and Zach playing the viola and piano accompaniments of the two arias. Mozart's beautiful E-flat minor symphony opened the program, and the other selections being a lyric poem by Akimenko, first time here, and the overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." The gifted German contralto sang with her usual breadth and fullness of tonal power and with every appearance of being delighted with her surroundings, for her wholesome good nature was not even clouded by the serious type of her selections. The "Lament of Andromache" was given with splendid effect, though doubtless something of lighter musical caliber would have better suited a majority of her auditors, but the art of the great contralto was not to be denied, for her organlike tones were as rich, vibrant and sonorous as could be desired, and her phrasing and expression seemed nearly flawless.

In the two songs by Brahms her sympathetic interpretations were even more pleasing than in the Bruch number, and she had fitting associates in Messrs. Fevir and Zach, whose accompaniments on viola and piano were very fine. The applause, which was complimentary, after the first number was spontaneous and very hearty after the Brahms group, the popular artist being summoned back many times.

The lyric poem by Akimenko, which was not specially interesting, has some clever ideas of a desultory nature expressed in a musicianly way, without any marked suggestion of originality in matter or method. The orchestra played the piece smoothly and interpreted it according to Mr. Gericke's reading.

179
The performance of Mozart's noble symphony may be praised unreservedly. It was musical poetry interpreted in the best vein of the orchestra, sympathetic and perfect in ensemble. The "Gwendoline" overture was given with due regard to its wild, tumultuous nature, the vigor of the performance according properly with the motif of the barbaric story.

Mr. F. Busoni will be the soloist at this week's concerts, playing Saint-Saens' fifth concerto. The orchestral selections include Schumann's first symphony, the entracte from "L'Étranger," by Vincent d'Indy; Liszt's "Todtentanz" and an excerpt from "Die Meistersinger."

RICKE, Conductor.

VCERT.

BER 19, AT 8, P. M.

mme.

No. 9, in C minor.

for VIOLIN.

SIC from "Azara."

"Tannhäuser."

ist:

MacCARTHY.

BUSONI RECITALS

181

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.

I. Andante un poco maestoso: Allegretto molto vivace.

II. Larghetto.

III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I.: Molto piu vivace.
Trio II.

IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO No. 5, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA
in F major, op. 103.

I. Allegro animato.

II. Andante.

III. Molto allegro
(First time in Boston with Orchestra.)

VINCENT D'INDY.

ENTR'ACTE from the Opera "The Stranger."
(First time.)

Liszt
WAGNER,

"Dance of Death" for Pianoforte & Orchestra
PRELUDE to the Opera "Die Meistersinger."

Soloist:

Mr. FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

BUSONI RECITALS

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.

I. Andante un poco maestoso: Allegretto molto vivace.

II. Larghetto.

III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I: Molto piu vivace.

Trio II.

IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO No. 5, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA
in F major, op. 103.

I. Allegro animato.

II. Andante.

III. Molto allegro

(First time in Boston with Orchestra.)

VINCENT D'INDY.

ENTR'ACTE from the Opera "The Stranger."

(First time.)

Liszt

"Dance of Death" for Pianoforte & Orchestra

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to the Opera "Die Meistersinger."

Solcist:

Mr. FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony No. 1, in B flat.....Schumann
Piano Concerto, No. 5, in F major.....Saint-Saens
Entr'acte from the opera, "The Stranger".....
(First time) D'Indy
"Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies
Irae," for pianoforte and orchestra.....Liszt Prelude to the opera, "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Soloist: Mr. Ferruccio Busoni.

The triumph of the evening was won, not by any of the moderns, but by Schumann's symphony of more than 60 years ago; by a work that has been heard dozens of times by almost every symphony auditor. It received a noble performance, and its beautiful themes never seemed more attractive. Mr. Gericke was recalled several times at its close. A word of special praise must be spoken for the horn-playing and for the flute-work of the finale.

Busoni has evidently conquered Boston, as we predicted he would do eventually. He is a strange compound! An Italian, yet entirely devoted to the instrumental school; a most modern pianist, yet intellectual almost to the point of austerity, and by no means inclined towards sentimentality. Here is what Hanslick, today the leading musical critic of the world, wrote about Busoni (then 9 years old) in 1876:—

"His piano-playing gives evidence of true musical sensibility and an unusual intellectuality. The piano compositions of the little one are in the short forms, as befits a young and half-fledged Talent, short and good, some again not so good, so that we may suspect the help of the master. To an encouraging recognition he has fully earned his right, he can go on courageously with his work."

Since that time the boy has become a man and a master in his field. His performance on Saturday was great enough to win recall upon recall, with a couple of laurel wreaths thrown in. It was a wonderful display of technique, but not of the Rosenthal variety merely, not of every trick of fingering, every device of rapidity and force; it was an intellectualized technique, a perfect mastery of the piano, with a keen and authoritative mentality back of the interpretation.

St. Saens' Concerto in F is not an inspiring work; it is pleasant to find a great modern composer with form and coherency, but with the maximum of facility the composer seems to have the minimum of enthusiasm. Even the orientalism of the andante is not half as effective as the eastern music which the public may hear in the same composer's "Suite Algerienne" at the Chickering concert next Wednesday. The finale had a wild, half-Dervish character that was more spontaneous than any other part of the concerto.

Later in the programme Busoni excited the audience with one of those bone-yard fantasies that the modern composers love to produce. Sickness and Death, Invalids and Skeletons, are important adjuncts to the modern musical repertoire, from Liszt to Loeffler. We imagine that we shall eventually have a "Hospital Symphony" with the following movements:—

1. Allegro. Dyspepsia.
2. Andante. Hypochondria.
3. Scherzo. St. Vitus Dance.
4. Molto. Allegro. Delirium Tremens.

But Liszt is not as ghoulish in this "Dance of Death" as one might have feared. Berlioz is far more gruesome when it comes to portraying the supernatural. The variations on the "Dies Irae" are, however, most skilful, and the glissando piano effects, the solemn march, the hiccoughy fugal work, are all exciting, even if they do smell of the footlights and of the circus saw-dust, and Busoni displayed the glittering Liszt wares to the best possible advantage.

D'Indy's Entr'acte from "The Stranger" was solemn enough and to a degree impressive, but it was still one of the modern "puzzle-pieces." We might suggest changing the title from the comparative to the superlative, by altering it from "The Stranger" into "The Strangest"! But we suspect that it is a work that may grow upon acquaintance, as some other compositions of D'Indy have done.

The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was not so perfect as we have had it at these concerts. The brass was too repressed, the strings over-balancing. But we do not doubt if any auditor were asked to pick out the 2 best works of this long concert he would promptly choose the first and the last.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The programme of the 17th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon includes Schumann's familiar symphony in B flat major and the equally familiar prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The orchestral novelty is the prelude to the second act of Vincent d'Indy's latest opera, "The Stranger," which was produced at the Monnaie, Brussels, early in 1903, and has since been performed at the Opera, Paris. The Stranger is a wanderer with mysterious power, who goes about doing good. Against his will he falls in love with Vita, who is betrothed to a coastguard in a fishing village. She loves him, but he tells her that he must leave her. This prelude or entr'acte is supposed to portray his conflicting emotions. In the attempt to save men from a shipwreck, the Stranger and Vita, the only one that dares to accompany him in the boat, are lost.

Mr. Busoni will play Saint-Saens' piano concerto No. 5, which was composed for the 50th anniversary of Saint-Saens' debut as a pianist. The second movement, written in Egypt, is of an extremely oriental character. Mr. Busoni will also play, with the orchestra, Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," which was first played here by Mr. Bauer at a Symphony concert.

The programme for the concerts of March 11-12 will include Strube's Fantastic overture (first time); Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin (Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist), Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, and Sibelius' symphony No. 2 (first time).

A MUSICAL TREAT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Concert of the Symphony Orchestra
Wins Hearty and Continued
Applause from the Large and Delighted Audience.

The programme of the 17th Symphony concert in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:
Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann
Piano concerto in F, No. 5.....Saint-Saens
Entr'acte to "The Stranger".....D'Indy
(First time.)

"The Dance of Death".....Liszt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
This concert was one of unusual interest. The symphony has the freshness and the enthusiasm of youth. Whether the work were inspired by the passion of spring felt by all, or by the thought of Clara Wieck, is immaterial. The music makes its irresistible way, whatever may be said about its instrumentation. In these days, when so many score their works in an amazingly brilliant fashion and so few have ideas that are worth the gorgeous orchestral dress, it is a good thing to be reminded that ideas themselves have abiding value.

Saint-Saens' concerto was first played by him at the concert given to celebrate the 50th anniversary of his first appearance in public as a pianist. It was played here without orchestra Feb. 26 by Miss Hawkins, with Mr. Lang as the player of the second piano; but such a performance, however excellent it may be, is not a production.

A modern concerto, without an orchestral accompaniment, is as cold as a dead man. The second movement, composed in Egypt, and of an extremely Oriental character, exerts an exotic fascination, and the instrumentation is piquant. The finale is brilliant and the most melodious of the movements, according to western ears. The first movement is skilfully put together, but it has little spontaneity or true musical charm.

Mr. Busoni played the concerto in a delightful manner, for its brilliance, its glitter and its cool sentiment, with its demands on a supreme technique for suitable interpretation, appealed to his peculiar musical individuality. His performance was one long tour de force. He was recalled again and again, and two wreaths were given to him.

Liszt's "Dance of Death" was played here by Mr. Bauer at a Symphony concert in 1902. The piece is a wildly fantastical paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," inspired, it is said, by the fresco, "The Triumph of Death," in the Campo Santo of Pisa. And yet is there one genuine shudder in the music? We do not ask whether there is a new shudder, but whether there is one already known.

The music is pretentiously spectacular, but it is not truly macabre. There is neither the stroke nor the rush of horror. It is not a question of sincerity. You see Saint-Saens smiling as he listens to his own Danse Macabre, but you hear with him Death fiddling and the skeletons in glee knocking their bones against the tombstones. Or think of Berlioz in his Fantastic symphony, with those bassoons chattering as ghosts in the March to the Scaffold, with the wild rout worshipping Satan in the obscene finale. Again Mr. Busoni worked miracles of technique, but 'twas all in vain. The music itself is curiously boring.

The entr'acte from "The Stranger" no doubt loses in effect when it is taken from its place in the opera. As absolute music, without reference to what has been enacted on the stage and without expectation of what is to happen, it seems unemotional, austere.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was worthy of its highest reputation, and Mr. Gericke was obliged to respond more than once to the hearty and long continued applause after the symphony.

AT THE SYMPHONY

Busoni Plays Saint-Saens's Fifth Concerto and Liszt's "Dance of Death"

—Orchestral Numbers by Schumann, D'Indy and Wagner

The programme of the 17th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 1.....Schumann
Concerto for piano No. 5, in F.....Saint-Saens
Entr'acte from "The Stranger".....D'Indy
"Dance of Death," piano and orchestra.....Liszt
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner

Two of these numbers were first time at these concerts. One was Saint-Saens's fifth concerto in F, played by Mr. Busoni. The work was played for the first time in Boston very recently, by Laura Hawkins, but without orchestral accompaniment. Heard under proper conditions last evening, impressions are not very favorable. It possesses a certain amount of technical interest for the pianist, but there is little, if any, thematic material of value, and to be brief the concerto is a clever, tricky exposition of a musical desert. It is about the least thing of value that has been heard recently from this "Beau Brummel" among French composers. Mr. Busoni played it with consummate ease, but even technically considered it offered him but little opportunity compared with the "Dance of Death." Liszt's pianistic monstrosity, which he played later on in the concert. In this latter number which Bauer introduced to Symphony patrons two seasons ago, there is abundant opportunity for virtuosic display which Mr. Busoni improved to the limit. It was a superb piece of work, for which he was heartily applauded and several times recalled.

The rest of the programme does not call for extended comment. D'Indy's entr'acte to his new opera, "The Stranger," shows some clever instrumentation, and heard in connection with the opera itself it might prove of interest. As it was its first performance in this city last evening it made but a perfunctory impression.

Schumann's great symphony received a finished performance that was without especial vigor, and an excellent performance of Wagner's prelude to the Mastersingers brought the end of the concert.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventeenth symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, soloist, was given last Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the programme being as follows:

Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Op. 38.
Saint-Saens: Concerto No. 5, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F major, Op. 103.
(First time in Boston with Orchestra.)
Vincent d'Indy: Entr'acte from the Opera, "The Stranger."
(First time.)

Liszt: "Dance of Death," for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Wagner: Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger."

Since symphony concerts have been held in Symphony Hall, no season has been so prodigal of brilliant orchestral playing as the present, and no one concert has given more universal pleasure than that of last Saturday, when the remarkable performance of a singularly attractive programme aroused a high enthusiasm seen by no means every day in the concert year.

Of most moment, doubtless, if not of most general interest, was the first performance here of an entr'acte from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "L'Etranger." The book of the opera appears to be a somewhat involved study of temperament, quite as psychological as a novel by Paul Bourget, and very symbolical. In finding music fitting for such a text, d'Indy comes before us in a capacity totally different from that by which we best know him here—that of the poet who tells, with compelling sympathy, of woods and hills, of winds, and of waters under the earth. In this entr'acte he has written music that might well serve as the prelude to a tragedy, for its tenor is sad, and the inherent gloom of the musical thought is deepened by the masterly way in which d'Indy has arranged his orchestration; the sombre tones of violas he calls upon unusually. This is noble music, but it is scarcely human, for the love, which is one motive of the entr'acte, is here too ascetic to be moving, and renunciation, the contrasting motive, here fails to contrast; with d'Indy, love and sacrifice are treated musically much alike, that is, severely, neither one with a ray of warmth. One listens more willingly to d'Indy the man of outdoors.

Another new work, strikingly different in quality, was the fifth pianoforte concerto by Saint-Saens, which Miss Laura Hawkins had played in Potter Hall only a week or so ago, but without orchestra. In the case of this concerto, the orchestra without the pianoforte would have been more to the purpose, for with Saint-Saens, particularly in his later days, the clothes often make the man. While making no stronger an impression, musically, in Symphony Hall than it had in Potter Hall, the concerto was vastly more effective, for its orchestration is certainly very piquant and brilliant. And Mr. Busoni's performance was even more brilliant than the work itself. It is, indeed, many a day since such astonishingly lustrous, sparkling playing has been heard in Boston. Mr. Busoni, at last at his best, offered a display of electrifying scales, of magnificent tone, and of perfect rhythm that swept the audience straight off their feet. It was all dazzling, blinding, as with flashes from myriads of diamonds. The same qualities Mr. Busoni also brought to bear on the solo part of Liszt's extraordinary "Todtentanz," a work which to be thoroughly appreciated for the majesty and horror of its conception, and the skill and ingenuity with which it is carried out, should have been written by a latter-day Frenchman or Russian instead of by Liszt, who transcribed so much trash for the pianoforte. Whatever the worth of the composition, when played by Mr. Harold Bauer with the Symphony Orchestra, it aroused many a genuine thrill of grisly horror. On Saturday there was less effect from the performance, for Mr. Busoni regarded the work from the viewpoint of a virtuoso more than did Mr. Bauer. Mr. Busoni, however, without fully appreciating the fearfulness of Liszt's picturesque, grotesque, horrible sketch, none the less treated the work seriously, and displayed a warmth of temperament that added greatly to the effect of the work. For brilliancy of tone and rhythm, his performance of the Liszt fresco-like composition rivalled that of the charming arrangement of lines and colors by Saint-Saens. It is gratifying that at last, before leaving Boston, Mr. Busoni should play once in the splendid way of a few years ago.

This wonderful concert began with a sympathetic performance of Schumann's ever-delightful B-flat symphony, and ended with grand playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude, which seemed worth all that had gone before it.

Mr. Adamowski is to play this week. Here is the programme of the concert: Strube, Fantastic Overture (first performance); Lalo, Symphony Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 (first time).
R. R. G.

SYMPHONY TICKET

A few choice locations at reasonable prices.
Apply at once, MR. HARDING, 95 Kilby St.
MWT(A):

MELBA.

Concert next week.

G. STRUBE

(March 1896)

The Symphony Orchestra player, whose composition will be played at the next concert.

187

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

STRUBE,

FANTASTIC OVERTURE. op. 20.
(First performance.)

LALO,

SPANISH RHAPSODY for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA
op. 21.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Scherzando: allegro molto.
- IV. Andante.
- V. Rondo: Allegro.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Coriolanus." op. 62.

SIBELIUS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major.

- I. Allegretto.
  - II. Tempo andante ma rubato.
  - III. Vivacissimo: Lento e suave.
  - IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.
- (First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

G. STRUBE

(March 1896)

The Symphony Orchestra player, whose composition will be played at the next concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, AT 8. P.M.

Programme.

STRUBE,

FANTASTIC OVERTURE. op. 20.
(First performance.)

LALO,

SPANISH RHAPSODY for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA
op. 21.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Scherzando: allegro molto.
- IV. Andante.
- V. Rondo: Allegro.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Coriolanus." op. 62.

SIBELIUS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major.

- I. Allegretto.
  - II. Tempo andante ma rubato.
  - III. Vivacissimo: Lento e suave.
  - IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.
- (First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, held in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening:

Strube: Fantastic Overture, Op. 20.

(First performance.)

Lalo: Spanish Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21.

Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62.

Sibelius: Symphony No. 2, in D major.

(First time.)

Soloist—Mr. T. Adamowski.

This last symphony concert was not so brilliant an occasion as those which directly preceded it, yet it was by no means commonplace, for there were two new compositions produced, one of them, Mr. Strube's "Fantastic Overture," being of peculiar interest. Mr. Strube himself conducted his work, which was splendidly played and heartily applauded. To speak truth, however, the overture made no strong impression. Mr. Strube is a man of originality, with a marked personality in his music, and he is a master of orchestration. But his overture seems strangely vague. The themes do not command attention, their working out leads to no definite end. In a work designated "fantastic," one customarily expects touches of fancifulness, something whimsical and capricious. Mr. Strube would appear to have been moved less by fancy than by lack of definite aim. The result is incoherence. The orchestration of the overture is intensely modern, consequently sonorous and rich, but over-full and turgid. With fewer instruments there might have been more color. This last composition of Mr. Strube's is far less interesting than the "Hymn to Eros," which, although peculiar and hard to get hold of, still made its effect.

The second novelty of the concert, Sibelius's symphony, was interesting mainly through the nationality of its composer. From Finland we are not in the way of looking for music. The man evidently knows his business; his symphony demands respect. Its monotony of mood and color, however, may be due either to the composer's individuality or to the Finnish temperament. At all events, the symphony is constantly, tiresomely sombre—not with the passionate sadness so often expressed in the music of Tchaikovsky, but dully, depressingly so. The finale approaches nearest to animation, and is surely the most effective portion of the work. In such company, Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture seemed bigger, statelier, and more truly tragic than ever before, although one might have wished for more warmth and freedom in its performance.

The most cheerful event of the evening was Mr. Adamowski's appearance as soloist, with Lalo's Spanish Symphony. In excellent case, Mr. Adamowski played better than he has in some years, with all the rich sweetness of tone, the grace of phrasing, and the warmth of feeling for which he is distinguished, and with admirably clear technique. It is regrettable that more composers have not followed the example set by Lalo in this symphony for violin and orchestra, which, despite its lack of technical display for the solo instrument, is more grateful than any violin concerto written.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy will play at the next concert. This will be the programme: Brahms's Tragic Overture; Liszt's Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte; Elgar's prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius"; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, op. 36.

R. R. G.

STRUBE NOVELTY RULES SYMPHONY

Domestic and Foreign Music Offered the Large Audience at Eighteenth Concert.

AUTHOR LED ORCHESTRA

Final Number of Jean Sibelius Is Intensely Ideal and Almost Uncanny.

The eighteenth Symphony concert began and ended with novelties. For the first number was given under the composer's conductorship, Gustav Strube's new "Fantastic" overture, a work no less complex, but more comprehensible than most of his larger pieces.

It is writing of the time and nearer to Strauss than Wagner, but not obviously modeled after any other work, but akin in a sort of distant cousinship to Mr. Busoni's symphonic study in tone-color. It is erratic, but pleasant to accompany. It is rich in melodies, which have no apparent logical connection, but start forth unexpectedly and retreat without warning.

They give a steady flow, however, through the overture, and upon them are cast glittering side-lights which flash and fade in a moment. There is, therefore, a certain coherence, and there are moments, too, of high, piquant excitement and hasty energy. Mr. Strube led it firmly, enthusiastically, and without excess.

Wild Composition.

The other new thing was the final number—the second Symphony of Jean Sibelius. This is a strange, wild composition that often comes near to being weird or eerie—almost uncanny. It is intensely individual, but whether this character is to be considered as national or personal to the composer, one would need to know more of Finnish music to decide.

It belongs to a lonely, remote and unique land, for it hints the influence of dark lake, stern mountain, cold solitude and stormy sea in its roll and mutter of thunderous tempest, and its tramp of surge, while against difficulty and opposition there moves the sense of an independent and indomitable disposition. In their land the Finns—like the Welsh in their rough country—are by nature exceedingly musical, and this symphony befits their sturdy, obstinate and yet poetic and moody character.

Very Resourceful.

The orchestration is resourceful and often beautiful and powerful; the harp is frequent; the horn, of which the Finns are fond, even in their churches, is often heard, and when the trio of the scherzo takes a pastoral turn, it becomes delicate and gentle in color.

The symphony grows as it goes on, and the almost glum assertiveness of the first allegro becomes resoundingly triumphant in the finale. It was well read and received with pleasure.

Beethoven's grand "Coriolanus" overture was also played by the orchestra, and Mr. T. Adamowski, as the soloist, contributed Lalo's "Spanish" concerto, which had his accustomed grace and fancy of style, together with a closer adherence to right intonation and more warmth and resolution than he often displays.

STRUBE OVERTURE GIVEN IN BOSTON

Initial Performance of the Work at the Symphony Concert Last Evening
Conducted by Composer—
Music Not Impressive.

B Herald Nov 14/1904
The programme of the 18th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Fantastic overture.....Strube
(First performance.)
Spanish symphony.....Lalo
(Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist.)
Overture to "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Sibelius
(First time.)

Mr. Strube conducted his overture with spirit and authority; his colleagues played as though eager to put the music in the best light; the audience was generous with applause, and a wreath was handed to the composer-conductor. Yet we were disappointed in the work itself. Mr. Strube is a thoroughly grounded and versatile musician. He has written music that is highly creditable to him, music that has qualities which we do not find in this overture.

We do not object to the ultra-fantastical passages because they are ultra-modern, but because we find them for the most part ineffective. The overture is constructed on a large scale; it is scored for the full modern orchestra; but the results are not great or impressive.

There are pretty patches of orchestral color, there is ingenuity enough in development, but the music has no determined goal toward which it hastens, nor is there a series of striking episodes. There is neither the masterly continuity of thought that holds the attention, nor is the music kaleidoscopic. And in spite of the orchestral resources there is seldom true and rich sonority; there is little of musical thought or concentration of orchestral tone. We beseech Mr. Strube, in whose work we are interested, to look over again the earlier scores of Saint-Saens, or the scores of Auber's better operas, and to observe with what apparently small means these Frenchmen produce delightful or impressive orchestral effects.

The symphony of Sibelius is a thoughtfully considered work. The composer was in most serious and earnest mood. The music is sombre, lonely and often tedious. Is the discouraging atmosphere due to the presence of Finnish "local color," or to the neutral dryness of the composer's thought? The symphony was interesting as music from a country as yet little known to us in art, and after hearing this work there is curiosity as to whether the pervading gloom be the expression of a folk or of an individual. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra did their best for Jean Sibelius, but the composer should have done more.

The nearly century old overture of Beethoven stood boldly out in tragic and compelling grandeur.

Mr. Adamowski played Lalo's delightful concerto—for this Spanish "symphony" is in reality, a concerto, or a suite, if one must speak unequivocally by the card—and he played it with sentiment, dash and brilliance. He was applauded heartily and deservedly.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv 18+ PROGRAMME. Nov 14/1904

Fantastic Overture, op. 20 (First performance).....Strube

Conducted by the composer.
Spanish Rhapsody, for violin and orchestra, op. 21.....Lalo

Mr. T. Adamowski.
Overture to "Coriolanus," op. 62.....Beethoven

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Sibelius

It was a penitential concert, that of Saturday, too gloomy even for mid-Lent. Almost every number was sorrowful, or tragic, or incomprehensible. A cultured Chinaman once said to Fr. Amiot (the Jesuit missionary): "Your European music is remarkably ingenious but it cannot touch the heart like our Chinese music does!" Bearing this divergence of taste in mind we will not say that Strube's overture is bad music, but only state that we cannot comprehend it. We can best illustrate its effect upon our mind by making a "poem" on the same plan:—

"POEME FANTASTIQUE."

The horror of an Asiatic night
With ecstasy the downcast spirit grapples.
Behold the mystic maze where sirens fight!
But oh, how terrible the price of apples!
Destruction, desuetude and dire perdition
In sweetest contest struggle for admission.
Hark! 'Tis the gong which sounds its tepid
clang!
On comes the clammy climax,—bang! bang!
bang!

This poem, like the overture, cannot be comprehended offhand; it presents thoughts which are somewhat disconnected; it is full of magnificent contrasts and surprises; and it gives a splendid chance for modern tumult. If Mr. Strube, or any other prophet of the newest school wishes to set the above poem to orchestral accompaniment we gladly present it in the cause of art, but would suggest that the work be composed in F flat major, that an orchestra much larger than the symphonic size be employed, that it be chiefly in 5-4 rhythm, and often 2 different rhythms at once, that no consonances of any kind be used, and that the composer burn all his harmonic text books at the outset.

Mr. Strube conducted, was recalled at the end of the trouble and was presented with a laurel wreath. It is therefore presumable that many auditors understood the work and found it beautiful.

There is not a large repertoire of effective violin works with orchestra. Violin soloists are obliged to repeat themselves frequently. Bruch's G minor concerto, Mendelssohn's, Brahms', Beethoven's concertos, and the list is about ended. This disguised concerto by Lalo is also a grateful work and won success again at this concert, after repeated previous hearings. Mr. Adamowski was excellent in the G string work of the Andante and the final harmonics were very pure. The pizzicato-and-bow passages of the finale were also brilliant.

There was not as much breadth and hearty abandon as we are accustomed to hear in a performance by this great artist, but it was a very worthy interpretation nevertheless and Mr. Adamowski was recalled three times. The Carillon of the finale and the bright Pandango-like rondo were almost the only joyous touches of the long programme.

But the dignity of sorrow in the "Coriolanus" overture made that number by far the greatest work of the concert. The orchestra and its conductor seemed inspired by the subject and it stood forth like a mountain among ant-hills.

It was unjust to Sibelius to give his sombre symphony after a puzzle-overture and a tragic overture. Possibly if the work had been at the beginning of the concert it might have made some effect. As it was it fell very flat. Yet the symphony has some moments of true grandeur. The second movement seemed a dignified threnody, with its pizzicato passages forming an impressive "basso ostinato." This seemed a favorite device with Sibelius, for he used another ground-bass in the finale. There was agitation and suspense in the last movement, and it was pictured quite a la Wagner, by soft and irregular strokes of the kettle-drums.

But, although we found much originality and some majesty in the symphony, it seemed very short-breathed compared with the sustained majesty of the "Coriolanus" overture, and the melodic material was rather scant. Mere scales were harmonized over and again, and repetitions of devices were too abundant. The oboe did some excellent work in the finale and Mr. Gericke allowed the orchestra more abandon than usual in some parts of this composition.

It was, however, the right thing in the wrong place; to require the auditor, who had "supped full of horrors," to study a great modern work of this kind after what had preceded was expecting more than was possible. The worm, the barrel-hoop and the meek Bostonian will turn sometimes, when trod upon.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL.

Echoes of Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Attractive Promises for Coming Season of Grand Opera.

Recitals of the Week—Personal Gossip.

Globe — Mar 13 1904

Two novelties were on the program of the 18th Symphony rehearsal and concert: Gustav Strube's "Fantastic" overture for orchestra, conducted by the composer, and the first performance at these concerts of the second symphony of Jean Sibelius, the Swedish composer. Mr Strube's work, which is dedicated to Mr William Gericke, was given for the first time. The other selections were Lalo's "Spanish" symphony for violin and orchestra, with Mr Timothee Adamowski as soloist, and the overture to Beethoven's "Coriolanus." Mr Strube is a composer whose abilities are not confined to any special class of music, for his versatility has a wide range, from grave to gay, his lighter pieces being familiar with patrons of the "pop" concerts, and his more serious works meeting the approbation of attendants of the Symphony concerts, several of his compositions having been on the programs in the past eight years. He is a thorough musician and an excellent conductor, and all his works are scored in a skilful manner.

In his "Fantastic" overture he has indulged in many up-to-date vagaries and made free use of forte effects in his instrumental combinations; the heavy basses, string and winds, are frequently introduced for vivid contrasts against the lighter instruments, and the cellos he has made very prominent in several groups of ensemble measures. The overture is a pleasing writing in the modern style, with many striking passages for the different instrumental groups and altogether "fantastic" in form and development. The orchestra did its work admirably under Mr Strube's baton, and the composer was warmly applauded at the close of the performance.

Lalo's symphony for violin and orchestra is specially prolific in heavy passages for the solo instrument, which are immediately supplemented by florid variations. There are innumerable changes in tempo and keys, and many of the "working out" measures and their duplications continued in passages allotted to other strings. Mr Adamowski, who played the solo violin in this number for the third time at these concerts, gave a very commendable performance, his heavier work being resonant and broad in effect, his lighter and more brilliant fingering was facile and pure in tone, and each similar figuration on the different strings was played smoothly. His performance was splendidly supported by his associates, and the auditors showered liberal applause upon the popular violinist.

In the "Coriolanus" overture the dramatic elements of the picture were shown with due regard to its lights and shades, making the interpretation one of great impressiveness. Of the Sibelius symphony it is difficult to form a very good estimate after a single hearing, for it appears to lack homogeneity in construction. It is filled with quaint and surprising effects, modern of course, and its musical ideas are so numerous and so constantly changing that much of the work sounds fragmentary; or as if the composer was striving for originality by sacrificing lucidity. The second movement is dramatically somber in character, a strange combination of running accompaniments on the double basses, kettledrums and wood winds being of an unusual nature. The third part has some pleasing themes dispersed among the strings with wood wind accompaniments, and vice versa, and the finale displays some bright and peculiar contrasting episodes which lead up to a vigorous finale. The rendition was satisfactory and doubtless technically correct.

The next rehearsal and concert will take place March 25 and 26. Mr Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist, playing the second piano concerto by Liszt. The other program numbers will be Brahms' "Tragic" overture, prelude to Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," and Tschai-kowsky's fourth symphony.

STRUBE'S OVERTURE.

As it impressed L. C. Elson.

"POEME FANTASTIQUE."

The horror of an Asistic night
With ecstasy the downcast spirit grapples.
Behold the mystic maze where sirens fight!
But oh, how terrible the price of apples!
Destruction, desuetude and dire perdition
In sweetest contest struggle for admission.
Hark! 'Tis the gong which sounds its tepid
clang!
On comes the clammy climax,—bang! bang!
bang!

This poem, like the overture, cannot be comprehended offhand; it presents thoughts which are somewhat disconnected, it is full of magnificent contrasts and surprises; and it gives a splendid chance for modern tumult. If Mr. Strube, or any other prophet of the newest school wishes to set the above poem to orchestral accompaniment we gladly present it in the cause of art, but would suggest that the work be composed in F flat major, that an orchestra much larger than the symphonic size be employed, that it be chiefly in 5-4 rhythm, and often 2 different rhythms at once, that no consonances of any kind be used, and that the composer burn all his harmonic text books at the outset.—Boston Advertiser.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist at the 17th Symphony rehearsal and concert this week, and in this appearance he increased the respect which his several recent piano recitals have gained for him. No one save a deep student of the art would have chosen such a composition for solo performance as this last of the five masterly concertos written by Camille Saint-Saens. Of this three-movement, F-major concerto it may be said with more basis of truth than of the rest of his piano music that it is "absolute music" of the most unequivocal sort. All five of the concertos are interesting harmonic treatments of poetic themes, but this one is especially rich in descriptive measures and is full of the charm which invests "Samson and Delilah" and others of the versatile Frenchman's works. He composed it in Egypt early in 1896, and it was first publicly performed at the 50th anniversary of his appearance in concert as an 11-year-old prodigy. The score, with all its wealth of measures for the orchestra, does not belittle the piano part, and the result is a resonant and memorable tone-picture, requiring rare interpretative ability, and, in this case, finding performers eminently worthy of the theme in Mr Gericke and Mr Busoni. The pianist showed his remarkable technique and his mastery of chords as he has not hitherto had opportunity to do in Boston. His reading of the elaborate score was poetic in the extreme. No soloist could have more delightfully brought out the staccato figuration in the allegro movement, or the dainty G-major Nubian love song in the second, or andante part. He seemed to play without apparent effort, as if the theme itself were carrying along the piano part—which is the proper spirit in a virtuoso's performance. Added to the finale which brought out the various themes again, the composition was beautiful almost beyond the power of words to describe. Aimed to the orchestration under the deft baton of the symphony conductor, it was a concerto to be remembered for its sweeping virility.

In the Liszt "Dance of Death," too, Mr Busoni's piano part was a thing of genius, and nothing less. The weird, fantastic, haunting suggestions and dissonances—paces set by orchestra, and answers now and again echoed by the wonderfully responsive piano—were brought out in a way not soon to be forgotten. The "Dies Irae" and chiming motifs, and all the other touches of eclesiasticism are woven in with clever skill by the great imaginative composer. It was dedicated to, and much thought of by von Bulow. Small wonder; for it is of a nature to be recalled when many more lengthy pieces are buried. In this also, Mr Busoni was received with vehement approval.

The rest of the concert was interesting in the extreme, and was marked by the perfection which always characterizes a symphony performance. The B-flat major symphony by Schumann was a lovely specimen of the tonal wonder-worker's best and dreamiest thought. The only literally "first time" number in the program was the odd and melodious entr'acte from the opera of "The Stranger" by D'Indy; and this, with the tuneful "prelude" to the Wagner opera of "The Mastersingers," were, of course, superbly done. The soloist for the coming week's recital and concert will be the long-time Boston favorite artist, whose face has become familiar to symphony goers for many seasons. Mr

Timothee Adamowski, who will play Lalo's "Symphony Espagnole" for violin and orchestra. The other numbers will be a "first time" symphony by Sibelius, a "first time" "Fantastic Overture" by Strube, and the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture. Globe Mar 6 1904

THE SYMPHONY

Traveler Feb. 29, 1904

Symphony in E-flat .....Mozart
Andromache's Lament from "Achilles".....Bruch
Lyric Poem, op. 20.....Akimenko
(First time.)

Two songs with viola and pianoforte accompaniment, op. 91.....Brahms
(a) Longing at Rest.
(b) Cradle Song of the Virgin.

Overture to the opera "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

Mozart's Symphony in E flat is of that trend that does not content itself with the mere beauty of sweetness. For its day and generation it shows wonderful dignity and strength, achieved, of course, by the means which composers of today would look upon as trivial. Then the colors of the musical palette were almost primary, yet in this work Mozart showed what noble effects could be obtained by them. Had Mr. Gericke been a little less restrained in his conducting, the truth would have stood forth with still greater emphasis. The symphony was beautifully played in every respect. All it needed to be perfection was a bit more fire.

There is a new Russian whose name is Akimenko, and his "Lyric Poem" is now given us for the first time. Take it away. It has no genius, none of the bearable crudities of great ability, but is a suave, dull thing that no one should be made to hear twice. Because there are great modern Russians is no proof that all of them are worth while. This one maunders along in what he chooses to call the "lyric" vein of composition. Now lyrics are not necessarily things of sugar and water, nor does a tiny dash of Slavic help the case.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is now getting to be a rather common figure upon the concert platform, and in danger of breeding—well, satiety—by familiarity, was in excellent voice and artistic frame of mind, and gave much pleasure by her singing. There was real nobility of pathos in the Bruch "Lament," while the Brahms songs were given with true intelligence and with beauty of tone. In brief, the singer was far more than usually satisfactory, and that is saying much.

At the end, with dash and vigor and superb color, came the "Gwendoline" overture of the ever-to-be-lamented Chabrier. Alas, that such a voice had to be hushed before it had said its say! Alas, that France produces no man who can revive its message! For of all the moderns Chabrier had in some respects the greatest originality, the most splendid swing of melody and the most charming orchestration. In every respect he was a brilliant composer whose music is perennially interesting and unfailingly beautiful. The overture was played with immense vitality and bravura—one might say ideally, and still be within the bounds of truth.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

There will be two novelties at the 18th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra (this afternoon): A Fantastic overture by Gustav Strube, a violinist of the orchestra, well known here as a composer and conductor, and Jean Sibelius' Symphony No. 2. Mr. Strube's overture was composed in May, 1903, and is dedicated to Mr. Gericke. It has no programme other than the title. Jean Sibelius is a Finn by birth—he was born in 1865—and he studied at Helsingfors and at Vienna. The symphony, in four conventional movements, is without programme, but it is supposed to have a certain exotic flavor. The other pieces will be Lalo's Spanish Rhapsody for violin, which has been played twice at these concerts by Mr. Loeffler and twice by Mr. Adamowski, who will play it today for the third time, and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus."

There will be no concerts next week. The programme for March 25-26 will include Brahms' Tragic Overture; Liszt's Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Joseffy, pianist), the Prelude to Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" and Tschaiikowsky's Symphony No. 4.

AT THE SYMPHONY

Post Mar. 13. 1904
Orchestral Numbers by Strube, Lalo, Beethoven and Sibelius—Timothee Adamowski Was Solo Violinist

The programme of the 18th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Fantastic Overture, Op. 20.....Strube
Spanish Symphony, for violin.....Lalo
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 82.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Sibelius

Mr. Strube's overture was conducted by the composer, this being its first performance. He has done some clever things along certain lines, but the new overture is about the least interesting work that one can at present recall. It is scored with considerable brilliancy, but take it as a whole, this overture is lamentably "weak" and entirely unworthy of a place on a Symphony programme. Mr. Strube received a very flattering reception, and was recalled at the end of the performance. Another new work was the symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. He is all but unknown here, but has written much in various forms.

His symphony heard last evening is ambitious, and the composer takes a long time to say but little. There are moments occasionally that are pleasing in this work, but on the whole it is dull and monotonous. It was very finely played, and the Coriolanus overture also.

Mr. Adamowski scored a great success in his performance of Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra. He has played it before at these concerts, but probably never better than he did last evening. The work is always one of interest, being one of the best, in fact, of its kind, and one that apparently has a long lease of life.

Mr. Adamowski received a great ovation and several recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.
LISZT,	CONCERTO, for PIANOFORTE, in A major. No. 2.
ELGAR,	PRELUDE to the Opera "The Dream of Gerontius." (First time at these concerts.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima, movimento di valse. II. Andantino in modo di canzona. III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato": allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of Good Friday the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday Afternoon, March 31.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

There will be two novelties at the 18th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon: A Fantastic overture by Gustav Strube, a violinist of the orchestra, well known here as a composer and conductor, and Jean Sibelius' Symphony No. 2. Mr. Strube's overture was composed in May, 1903, and is dedicated to Mr. Gericke. It has no programme other than the title. Jean Sibelius is a Finn by birth—he was born in 1865—and he studied at Helsingfors and at Vienna. The symphony, in four conventional movements, is without programme, but it is supposed to have a certain exotic flavor. The other pieces will be Lalo's Spanish Rhapsody for violin, which has been played twice at these concerts by Mr. Loeffler and twice by Mr. Adamowski, who will play it today for the third time, and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus."

There will be no concerts next week. The programme for March 25-26 will include Brahms' Tragic Overture; Liszt's Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Joseffy, pianist), the Prelude to Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" and Tschaiowsky's Symphony No. 4.

AT THE SYMPHONY

Post Mar. 13. 1904
Orchestral Numbers by Strube, Lalo, Beethoven and Sibelius—Timothee Adamowski Was Solo Violinist

The programme of the 18th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Fantastic Overture, Op. 20.....Strube
Spanish Symphony, for violin.....Lalo
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Sibelius

Mr. Strube's overture was conducted by the composer, this being its first performance. He has done some clever things along certain lines, but the new overture is about the least interesting work that one can at present recall. It is scored with considerable brilliancy, but take it as a whole, this overture is lamentably "weak" and entirely unworthy of a place on a Symphony programme. Mr. Strube received a very flattering reception, and was recalled at the end of the performance.

Another new work was the symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. He is all but unknown here, but has written much in various forms.

His symphony heard last evening is ambitious, and the composer takes a long time to say but little. There are moments occasionally that are pleasing in this work, but on the whole it is dull and monotonous. It was very finely played, and the Coriolanus overture also.

Mr. Adamowski scored a great success in his performance of Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra. He has played it before at these concerts, but probably never better than he did last evening. The work is always one of interest, being one of the best, in fact, of its kind, and one that apparently has a long lease of life.

Mr. Adamowski received a great ovation and several recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.
LISZT,	CONCERTO, for PIANOFORTE, in A major. No. 2.
ELGAR,	PRELUDE to the Opera "The Dream of Gerontius" (First time at these concerts.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima. movimento di valse. II. Andantino in modo di canzona. III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato", allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Solcist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of Good Friday the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday Afternoon, March 31.

Photographed by Falk.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY.
Polish-American Pianist.

228.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cher
PROGRAMME. Mar 28 1904
Tragic Overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Concerto, for pianoforte, in A major, No 2....Liszt
Prelude to the Opera "The Dream of Gerontius".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, op 36.....Tchaikovsky

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" began matters nobly. Amid all the modern experiments, the last of the classical composers holds his own very well.

The appearance of Joseffy on the concert platform is always an event of importance, and one which occurs far too rarely. What a worthy career this great artist has had! It is just a quarter of a century ago that the young pianist made his glittering American debut. He was then a marvellous virtuoso, could play more rapidly than anybody else; had a key-board made for him, with a reduced "dip", for the sake of greater rapidity; was erratic in tempo and placed the interpreter above the composer by very marked individualizations.

He has grown into something very much greater than such a beginning promised. For a long time he withdrew from public performance; he became a teacher of highest rank. He lived for many years in retirement in a small town in New York, and had the habit of playfully boasting that he was "the greatest pianist in Tarrytown!"

When he came back to the concert stage he was a totally different kind of musician; he was one of the greatest interpreters of the world. He played Brahms in a manner that made one forget Joseffy altogether and think only of the beauty of the composition.

It is a pity that it could not have been a more subtle work than the Liszt concerto in which he reappeared. The A major concerto is, to be sure, a deeper composition than the rhapsodical E flat concerto, by the same composer, but it is none the less leonine at times, and Joseffy leans to the side of delicacy.

Mr. Gericke held down the ardor of the orchestra (very wisely) in order that the pianist might not be over-shadowed, and Joseffy whispered the beauties of the concerto to the audience in a semi-confidential manner. There was a daintiness, an elegance and ease in the performance that was remarkable. Only at the end did the pianist reveal Liszt as Jupiter Tonans, and thunder forth a few final phrases.

The audience appreciated the superb technique and forgave the fragility of the interpretation, recalling the pianist half-a-dozen times with great enthusiasm. But we shall always associate the A major concerto with Dresden china after this dainty performance.

The house programme gave the title of Elgar's oratorio as printed above. As an "opera" it might have some rather pungent scenes, particularly that of the Judgment Hall with the devils waiting outside! The performance was so excellent that it seemed as if this dignified prelude were for the first time unveiled to a Boston audience.

We were disappointed in the Tschalkowsky symphony. If the composer had not been so very ambitious in the first movement it would have been better. The great fanfare, with which the work begins and ends, is not so fine as the beginning of Schumann's B flat symphony, which seems to have inspired it. There are masterly touches of wood-wind, of which department Tschalkowsky was always a king. The kettle-drums have an impressive ground-bass in this movement and were well-played.

It was refreshing to hear undisguised melody in a modern work, and the singable character of the second movement was most delightful. The exquisite character of the oboe solo became ravishing in the interpretation of our great oboist. Nor may we forget to chronicle the fine performance of the bassoon in the later part of the movement.

The Scherzo was another popular movement, not great, but attractive. The piccolo work was brilliant here, and the sweeps of pizzicato upon the strings were exciting enough. Of course the movement made the chief success of the work, but it is scarcely of symphonic power.

The finale had but little to say to us. Of course we recognized the return of the figure of Fate and the repeated fanfare (not perfectly played) which announced that all human striving must bend to destiny, but we did not thrill very much to the Tupperian sentiments, and not even the graphic Russian folk melodies could reconcile us to this labored and grandiloquent symphony.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of the Saturday's symphony concert, the 19th of the season, when Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist: Tram. 1904

Brahms: Tragic Overture.
Liszt: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in A major.
Elgar: Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius."
(First time at these concerts.)

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36.

While in prospect this concert seemed unusually attractive, in actuality it proved far less interesting than most others. The programme was all of gloom, from Brahms, with his Tragic Overture, to Tchaikovsky, who, even when he tried, could not be other than depressing. In the fourth symphony, to be sure, there is less of groveling, whining despair than in the fifth and sixth symphonies, but, none the less, it is always grimly pessimistic, even the mad abandon of the finale being interrupted with awful suddenness by the dire call of fate. More mournful still was Elgar's prelude to "Gerontius," a composition that cries out of shortness of breath, heart failure, and all the distressing happenings that one imagines in connection with a deathbed. When brought to hear such oppressive music as this prelude of Elgar's, it is difficult to bear in mind the consoling testimony of all physicians, that most life-passings are painless and unconscious. Brahms's Tragic Overture was the most cheerful music of the evening, for Brahms, at least, did not confound tragedy with morbid misery.

Despite the inherently melancholy character of Liszt's A major concerto, certain sparkingly brilliant, highly colored episodes in its course should have brought relief to the prevailing darkness. Mr. Joseffy, however, apparently influenced by the atmosphere, made little of these passages, but played always gently, soothingly, his ravishingly beautiful tone never rising much above a mezzo-forte. While it is gratifying to find a great artist who appreciates the serious side of Liszt, the fact remains that, for the proper performance of his compositions, a bountiful measure of virtuosity is essential. The poetical quality and consummate musicianliness of Mr. Joseffy's playing were cordially appreciated, the artist being recalled six times.

Barring this one wave of enthusiasm, the audience at the concert appeared dull and listless, and if the orchestra showed little more animation than the audience, who shall blame either one? When spring comes in, the atmosphere of the concert hall ceases strongly to attract. With the advent of murky, sultry weather, the tone of the flute and violin is less appealing than that of the bird, for this latter calls before one visions of outdoors, with warm sunlight over bare, brown fields, and winds in the budding trees. In springtime art must yield very humbly before nature.

R. R. G.

JOSEFFY PLAYS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, and Elgar's Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius" Among the Programme Numbers. 1904

B Herald — March 27

The programme of the 19th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:

Tragic overture.....Brahms
Concerto in A major, No. 2.....Liszt
Mr. Joseffy.

Prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius"....Elgar
Symphony in F minor, No. 4....Tschaikowsky

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony is not familiar here, yet some, and they are by no means blind partisans, call it the most characteristic of the six. The andantino and the scherzo were played here twice before Mr. Walter Damrosch produced the whole symphony in 1893. The performance last night was the second at the Symphony concerts.

It has been said that Turgeneff divided all Russians into two classes, Hamlets and Don Quixotes. It might be said that to Tchaikowsky man was either Hamlet or Manfred. In this symphony, as in the fifth and sixth, Fate broods over the movements, but in this work the final word is not one of despair. The composer gave an explanatory programme in a letter to his friend, Mrs. von Meck, and the substance of this programme is to be found in many pages of his voluminous correspondence and in his diary.

Man must submit to fate. He may cherish illusions, he may dream dreams of happiness, but the awakening is inevitable and rude. Yet there is pleasure to the melancholy in recalling the gladsome hours when young blood was at fever heat. The scherzo has no more determined feeling than has the poem of Walt Whitman's entitled "Sleep-Chasings"; the sections are merely arabesques, the fancies of one heated by wine. In the finale the melancholy one joins the common people in holiday mood. His egotism of woe is rebuked. Others are happy. Fate sounds its trump, but it is not heard by the others. Perhaps there is joy in watching and sympathizing with the pleasure of others; at least, by entering into their happiness, one can live.

We are far from the grim and hopeless conclusion of the "pathetic" symphony; and in the Fifth there is no such honest revel of thoughtless joy as in the finale of the Fourth. Yet how terrible is the reminder of Fate in this same finale: the announcement of the inexorable is one of the most dramatic and memorable strokes in all music that is not for the stage.

While we do not agree with them that would rank this symphony above the later works, we see easily why some Russians entertain the idea—not because in the finale a Russian folksong, a song of a beech tree, is introduced, but because the whole character of the music is Russian in its gloom, in its capriciousness, in its vodka-heated gaiety. There are pages that are transcriptions into music of scenes described by Dostoevsky. There is the Russian love of monotonous repetition, and this is found even in the stories of that supreme artist Turgeneff; the hopeless attempt at gaiety—how melancholy, for instance, is the gutter song heard by the uneasy sleeper!

The dance music is such as might have sounded in the ears of the masked guests when the Red Death was about to make his entrance, eager to greet the host and the timorous revellers. There is again the monotony of rhythm, as in those empty and haunting passages punctuated by a drum that might be beaten by fleshless hands.

It would be idle to discuss the question whether the symphony is rightly called, or whether it is in reality a them, or whether they sit with superficial pleasure at the brilliantly lighted feast. The music is elemental and human, as well as imaginative; and if there be coarseness in it, there is coarseness in life and in death, the coarseness of nature itself, and without this coarseness life for its priggishness would be intolerable.

Mr. Gericke read the work with marked spirit and elasticity of treatment. The composer's effects were not softened; they were broadly or poignantly realized.

Mr. Joseffy is still one of the few great pianists. His touch is now velvet, now crystal; always a thing of beauty. There is still the exquisite repose, the inimitable polish. His mechanism is conspicuous in an age of incredible mechanism. Long ago this admirable pianist thought out and elaborated his scheme of expression, and its individuality is pronounced. Everything is subordinated to the expression of the purely beautiful.

It would be easy to quarrel with Mr.

Joseffy's interpretation of this particular concerto, for there is no suspicion in it of the demoniacal spirit that was characteristic of Liszt; but his answer would be ready and plausible. It was a great pleasure to hear this true artist, who was welcomed affectionately, applauded to the echo, and recalled again and again. May he soon revisit us!

The Brahms overture might have been played with greater intensity. The prelude by Elgar, episodic in itself, and in many respects ineffectively artificial, should be reserved as a preparation for the oratorio. It has little meaning or power as an ordinary concert piece.

Symphony Concert Was Too Full Of Melancholy

Numbers Were Excellently Rendered, But,
Except For Liszt Concerto, Gloom
Characterized Each Selection.

Journal Mar 27 1904

For the nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and this was the program:

Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Concerto, for pianoforte, in A major,
No. 2.....Liszt
Prelude to the opera "The Dream of Gerontius".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)

Symphony No. 4, in F minor..Tschaikowsky

The concert might reasonably be called a study in musical melancholies, for, with the exception of the brilliant and highly-colored Liszt concerto, the rest was tinged with gloom, of very different manners, it is true, but nevertheless of the same somber effect. And the differentiation was vastly interesting; Brahms, Elgar and Tschaikowsky—scarcely a more dissimilar three, so far as their language is concerned, could be gotten together, and yet, translated, their messages had wonderful resemblance.

Brahms' "tragic overture" is calmly and philosophically mournful, with much of the exquisite beauty of tender sadness and little of the writhing or shrieking of despair. In its suave and graceful melody, its rich yet simple orchestration, its complete refinement and charm, it is best accepted as absolute music of high rank, with no attempt to fit it to any special mental picture. Mr. Gericke read it with all of his fine appreciation of Brahms, and the orchestra played it with the usual grace and technical perfection.

Elgar's "Gerontius" Again.

And now enters our new friend, Edward Elgar, with another performance of the prelude to "The Dream of Gerontius." But a few weeks ago at a Cecilia concert the whole cantata was given, rather unfortunately for Mr. Elgar's reputation on this side of the water, for it was agreed by most of the judicious that the music was heavy, dull, uninspired and unlovely, nor does the second hearing of the prelude very much increase our respect for it. It is solemn, to be sure, and devotional in a curiously formless way, but these qualities are often found in the biggest of bores. Elgar's melancholy is that of a stifling sick room, where a man is trying so hard to die that he shouts about his weakness. The "sleep," "fear," "prayer," and other motifs are not impressive. They do not, like those in the Wagner operas, convince the hearer that they, and no others in all the world, could have been used.

And, although the work had all the benefits of a magnificent performance, it still seemed like the music of a skillful mechanic, not a man whose soul is bursting to sing.

Tschaikowsky's Greatness.

The Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky has been greatly overshadowed by the reputation and frequent performances of his noble Fifth and overwhelming "Pathetique." and yet a hearing of it last night, after six years, proves more conclusively than ever the colossal genius of the somber Russian, whose nature no one has ever yet sounded to its depths. The whole work glows with the passionate inspiration of morbid genius—morbid, that is, in that underlying whatever theme we may choose, whether simple folk-song, sensuous waltz or pompous march, it is ever the melancholy that broods over the unescapable end of man. Of this symphony he himself wrote: "The introduction is the kernel, the quintessence, the chief thought of the whole symphony." "The opening theme," he says, "is Fate, the fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness from gaining the goal." So after the beauty of the cello songs, the tenderness of the oboe air, the brilliant vivacity of the pizzicato movement and the ferocity of the rondo, there crashes into the finale that same "Fate" theme, overpowering in its might and gigantic in its pessimism. It is strange and wonderful music, and we have not yet explored all its secret passages. It was given with immense technical cleverness, but still with that reserve that Mr. Gericke always imparts to the reading of Tchaikowsky.

Joseffy Reappears.

The reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, after a silence of several years, was a delightful event, not only because of the pleasure of greeting this valued acquaintance again, but because he gave us some of the most perfect pianoforte playing we have had for a long time. He made of the dashing Liszt concerto a thing of rare beauty, poetry and sentiment. He still has the liquid tone, the velvety touch and the pearly scales of yore; he is strong without brutality, brilliant in bravura without mere empty finger work. From first to last he played the concerto as it should be played, never forcing the pianoforte out of the musical picture, yet always keeping himself in just that particular part of the foreground where he belonged. He was heartily received and enthusiastically applauded for his work. Let us hope, now that the recluse of Tarrytown has come out into the world again, that he will be prevailed upon to give Boston a more intimate view of his great art.

MARCH 18, 1904.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Boston Orchestra.

The soloist at the fifth and final concert this season of the Boston Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, last night, was that sterling pianist Frl. Aus der Ohe, who played Tchaikowsky's B flat minor concerto. The work is one of which she is especially fond, and with good reason, for it is rich in passages of dignity and power, in which playing of this broad, free style finds its most effective expression. More than in almost any other concerto is the solo work an integral part of the whole; it is interwoven with the orchestra, and its interpretation must be orchestral in character. The piano gives no miniature copy of the theme, no echo of the mass of instruments, but constantly dominates. Such work requires a style of playing not often attained by women. Frl. Aus der Ohe revelled in its difficulties and showed once more that she is particularly at home in music supposed to require the masculine attributes of breadth, intensity, and dramatic power. She was recalled many times and would doubtless have played again had not an accident happened to the piano which prevented the proper use of the pedals during the last half of the concerto.

An orchestral novelty was Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme," in which the author pictures in music fourteen of his friends. Few of the variations have much value. The theme itself is singularly uninteresting, while with the exception of the last movement, a sonorous, march-like strain, the variations are lacking in color, charm or melodic inspiration. Proximity seems to be Dr. Elgar's besetting sin. He uses a tremendous equipment and much time to express the most trivial ideas, and probably more than one person in the audience last night must have rejoiced that the composer's friends number fourteen and not forty. As it was, the composition lasted a good half-hour. The concert began with a smooth and musical performance of Schumann's B flat major symphony, and ended with the "Meistersinger" overture, of which Mr. Gericke gave a out-and-dried, metronomic, and wholly uninspiring interpretation.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY APPEARS.

THE GREAT PIANIST PLAYS WITH THE BOSTONIANS.

He Was Not Advertised, but Took the Place of Muriel Foster, Suddenly Indisposed—Gustave Strube Conducts His Own "Fantastic Overture."

The final afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday brought with it a joy unexpected. Muriel Foster, an English contralto for whom Edward Elgar wrote music and of whom many vibrant telegraph wires have told alluring tales, was to have sung, but she fell into the wide ranks of the suddenly indisposed. Now every one must be sorry that a woman is ill, especially that rare woman, a real contralto; but if such must be the fortune of the day, then let the bountiful gods who rule the destinies of musical art provide such a substitute as he of yesterday.

For out of the golden remote wild Tarrytown, where the most roseate technic spreads its airy tendrils all the year round, came the figure of Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, who is so much rarer than a day in June that he ought to be kept in a melodic conservatory and forced. Little slips in the programme told of the change, but somehow the amorous winds had caught the news and flashed it along the avenues, so that melomaniacs of epicurean tastes and infrequent visits to the chambers of ivory manipulation came out of their seclusion and basked in the sunlight of the hour.

Mr. Joseffy played the A major concerto of the rhapsodic Abbé Liszt, and how he played it inky type may not tell. Such piano playing has not been heard in this town in many moons. It was real piano playing, not piano pounding. It was piano playing which had respect for the limitations of the instrument, which fathomed its nature and which, within the delicate circumference of a starlike outline, painted a concerto with a thousand exquisite tints.

Such airy, fairy nuancing as Mr. Joseffy did, ravished the hearing and touched the poetic fancy. There was all the beauty of the old Joseffy touch, scintillant, crisp, clear, unerring, and yet always laid on with fingers of rose-leaf velvet. There was that pellucid atmosphere, created by a continent use of the pedals and a liberal employment of a marvellous independence of finger. There was the plentiful range of dynamics, which yet never reached a thunderous fortissimo. Beautiful, symmetrical, reposeful piano playing it was; and as for the reading of the concerto, surely no one could make the composition sound more imaginative.

Mr. Joseffy's treatment of the slow passage was masterly. It was poetry itself. As for his playing of the scherzando parts, that was the very dance of Queen Mab herself upon the keyboard. The audience burst into a tumult of applause at the close of the performance, and would gladly have had Mr. Joseffy play again and again, but other music was to be heard.

The orchestral numbers were Mozart's E flat symphony, Gustave Strube's "Fantastic Overture" and Charbrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline." Mr. Strube's composition was a novelty, and he, being a member of the orchestra, was permitted to conduct it himself. The audience treated him kindly, but whether it is because in these degenerate days we are incapable of perceiving the excellence of any orchestral composition which does not require two thousand words of programme notes to explain the recondite philosophical idea lying behind it, or because Mr. Strube was not a great unknown, there was no furious beating of eager palms nor craning of elastic necks.

Yet the composer offered a considerable prospect of wry harmonies, distorted trumpet solos, melodic deformities and instrumental hurly burly of the type now approved by advanced authorities. At least one foolish person in the audience was of a mind to fancy that if the overture had been signed R. Strauss it would have persuaded the audience to shiver the rafters with plaudits.

Certainly, Mr. Strube has been listening to the music of the bard of Munich. Perhaps he has received some of it filtered through the enthusiasm of irresistible Charles Martin Loeffler, but in some fashion he has got it. Yet he is still Strube, this man and not that one, and he has something individual to put into the Munich bottle.

To be more specific, he has a very pretty technique of his own, and he can build a fantastic overture as fantastically as the best or worst of them. In set terms of criticism, his composition is well made, excellently instrumented and shows skilled musicianship. Like the music of Mr. Strauss, it does not show a striking fecundity in thematic ideas. But these are not at a premium in the impressionistic school. The orchestra played the overture "con amore" and the composer conducted ably.

The Charbrier overture is a martial composition designed to characterize the hero of the opera, Harald. It was poured into the auditorium in a fine stream of color and seemed a mighty, vigorous, self-sufficient and confident piece of music. Finally, let it not be forgotten, Mr. Gericke and the gentleman of Boston interpreted the Mozart symphony as if the march toward cerebro-spinal musicitis had not robbed them of their joy in the song of the morning stars.

Symphony Concert Saturday Evening Fashionable One

Journal March 13, 1904.

The Symphony concert of last Saturday evening with Mr. Raphael Joseffy, the Russian pianist, as soloist, was one of the most brilliant of the series, particularly after an absence from town of two weeks of the orchestra. Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke and her mother, Frau Flamm, with her, was among the first to greet Mr. Joseffy in the green-room prior to the concert. Mrs. Gericke was charming in a black satin skirt en trainee, with which she wore a white satin waist with white lace over it and touches of pale blue satin on her corsage. Her sleeves were close fitting of the lace, and reached well over the hand. They were finished in long streamers of the white lace, which fell nearly to the floor. Frau Flamm was elegant in black satin, the bodice of which had touches of white chiffon and black lace garnishing it. The audience impressed one as being especially dressy for the occasion, as Miss Henrietta Sargent, who came with Mr. Clayton Johns and a party of people, was stunning in white satin embroidered in white silk applique. She wore no hat and a full coat of pale blue cloth. A long string of pearls fell from her neck around her knees. Others noticed in the audience were Mr. Robert M. Cushing, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. William Sturgis Bigelow, Mrs. Richard C. Dixey, who had Miss Hooper with her; Dr. and Mrs. Henry H. A. Beach, Mr. B. J. Lang and his daughter, Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang; Mr. and Mrs. Harry Young, Mrs. Charles Marsh and her daughter, Miss Marsh; Mrs. Edith M. Binney, Mrs. Edward M. Robinson, Dr. and Mrs. William B. Rice, Mrs. Edith Noyes Porter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Head, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Parkman, Miss Aspinwall, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Jones, Mr. William P. Blake, Mr. E. Howard Gay, Miss Clapp, Mr. S. Gannett Wells and his sister, Miss Louisa A. Wells; Miss Porter, Mr. J. Pierson Beebe, Miss Appleton, Dr. William Appleton, Miss Cabot and others.

202

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8. P.M.

Programme.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| MENDELSSOHN,     | OVERTURE to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina."op. 32.   |
| GLUCK,           | RECITATIVE AND ARIA, "Che farò senza,Eurydice."   |
| BRUCKNER,        | SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 9.(Unfinished.)I. Feirlich.II. Scherzo: Bewegt, lebhaft. Trio: Schnell.III. Adagio; Sehr langsam.(First time.) |
| DVOŘÁK,          | SONGS with PIANOFORTE.  |
| RACHMANINOFF,    | "GUTE NACHT."   |
| RICHARD STRAUSS, | "VON JENSEITS."   |
|                  | "MUTTERTÄNDELEI."   |
| BEETHOVEN,       | OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72.   |

Soloist:

Miss MURIEL FOSTER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

203

BRUCKNER'S EFFORT FAILS TO PLEASE

Dreary and Depressing Symphony
Dulls Gericke's Twentieth
Program.

WEIRD MIXTURE OF MOODS

Miss Foster Betrays Unfamiliarity With Tradition in Regard to Gluck's Aria.

Journal Wilder Dec 3 1904

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night, with Miss Muriel Foster as soloist. The program was:

Overture, "Melusina".....Mendelssohn
Recitative and aria, "Che farò senza, Eurydice".....Gluck
Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (unfinished).....Bruckner

First time.
Songs with pianoforte.
"Gute Nacht".....Dvorak
"Von Jenseits".....Rachmaninoff
"Muttertändelei".....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.....Beethoven

The calm and tranquil beauty of Mendelssohn is nowhere better exemplified than in the very first bars of this "Melusina" overture. Here is the bubbling up of water, the poetry of the naiads, the mysterious suggestion of something dreamily uncanny. And, although this theme and the other sterner one are pretty finely spun out, and both invention and interest lag after a while, the work as a whole is still full of fascination, still fresh and youthful, still instructive with that Mendelssohnian grace that has never quite existed in any other composer. It was perfectly played, for here is where the art of our orchestra, at times almost as refined as that of miniature painting, is at its best.

Bruckner's Weird Work.

How vastly different was the strange, dark, weird, often dull Ninth Symphony of Bruckner. It is an appallingly long mixture of the grand and grandiose, of pathos and bathos, of beauty and that sheer ugliness that lacks the saving grace of fascination by reason of its uncouthness. Richard Strauss can be horribly dissonant, unlovely enough to set the teeth on edge, but that sort of thing never produces mental indifference in his hearers. There is enough of originality, of genius, of sudden bursts of beauty in his music to keep one very much awake. Not so with Bruckner. He is, for the most part, dully weird and weirdly dull.

But the work cannot be damned incontinently, except as one may feel entitled to scold a thing that tantalizes by its possibilities of enjoyment, possibilities it proceeds to drown in a sea of tone that merely swashes along without grandeur. There is a noise that is majesty and a noise that is mere uproar. The latter is the character of the greater part of the first movement. Here may be noted the influence of Wagner—in a brass theme very like that of Siegfried's funeral in "Götterdämmerung" and a muted-horn passage of close relationship to the hunt-music in the beginning of the second act of "Tristan." But those resemblances are interesting merely as showing how deeply Wagner entered Bruckner's soul, and yet how the disciple failed wholly to attain to the splendor of the man he adored.

A Greater Scherzo.

The scherzo was by far the best movement of the three, with its odd, piquant, tricky rhythms, its snatches of exquisite melody and its strong originality. Here was a Bruckner that men might still be following with admiration, had he chose to have it so. But apparently he did not choose, for the next movement lapsed from the solemn beauty of the opening chant in a thin and dreary development of poverty-stricken themes, during which about all interest that the Symphony had had vanished entirely. The finale was an anticlimax of no persuasiveness. Taken as a whole, the work is that of a hard-working, earnest, musicianly man who narrowly escaped being a genius. The playing was very fine, for Mr. Gericke warmed to his task in a very sympathetic way, and gave the very best of himself and his orchestra to the performance.

Miss Muriel Foster again displayed the generally fine and attractive quality of her rich contralto voice, and again showed those faults which seem to be the result of bad teaching. In the Gluck aria, which of all things in the world ought to be sung with a perfect legato, she pumped her voice, chopped her phrases and managed her breathing badly. It is a pity that with such a noble organ she should impair her effectiveness so noticeably. In the song with piano she was gracious, refined and intelligent, but here again she lacked the vocal repose that was demanded. The pretty little Strauss song of mother love and pride she gave to best effect.

The "Leonore" No. 2 of Beethoven's most powerful days is still potent to thrill and charm an audience, and when played as it was last night, it is always worth hearing.

ANTON BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

Unfinished Work of the Composer
Played in Boston for the First Time at Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC THAT VEXES AND IRRITATES NERVES

Mendelssohn's Overture to "The Fair Melusina" and a Beethoven Overture Also Given—Miss Muriel Foster Sings.

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr.
Gerike conductor, in Symphony Hall,
last evening, was as follows:

Overture to "The Fair Melusina," Mendelssohn
Aria, "Che Faro Senza Euridice," Gluck
Symphony No. 9, unfinished, Bruckner
(first time).

Songs with piano:
"Gute Nacht," Dvorak
"Von Jenseits," Rachmaninoff
"Muttertaendelei," R. Strauss
Overture to Leonore, No. 2, Beethoven

Anton Bruckner died before he finished his ninth symphony. This symphony was produced at Vienna, Feb. 11, 1903, and the first performance in the United States was at Chicago the 20th of last February. Just before Bruckner died he said: "I undertook a stiff task. I should not have done it at my age, and in my weak condition. If I do not finish the symphony then my 'Te Deum' may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." The "Te Deum" was performed in Vienna as the finale. The unfinished work has been performed in several German cities, and in Munich alone it has been played at least three.

The symphony as performed last night is on the whole less endurable than preceding works of the same composer. We do not use the word "endurable" with offensive intent. To listen to a symphony by Bruckner is literally a test of endurance; for although there are sublime pages in some of the symphonies—pages that are apocalyptic in sweep and grandeur of vision—there are many more pages that are perplexing or childish. To use a homely phrase Bruckner's music soon "gets on the nerves," not to excite, not to thrill them, but to irritate and vex them. It is a long time between this composer's intoxicating drinks.

We are not told whether the ninth symphony was revised by the composer fully to his satisfaction. The manuscript contains dates of completion, but such dates are not always a sure index of a composer's unchangeable approval. The fastidious Tennyson revised constantly many of his earlier poems long after publication, and the changes were not always advantageous. It is highly probable that the three movements of the symphony are as Bruckner wished them. They are certainly in his familiar manner; they show the weaknesses known of old, and here and there is a page so lofty and irresistible that it makes us wonder at the tiresome twaddle that precedes or follows.

The opening measures, the preparation and the announcement of the chief theme, these are powerfully conceived and expressed. After these measures there is an intolerable amount of flat and vapid sack to a bit of nourishing bread. The scherzo is by far the one movement most sustained in interest. It is original and often piquant. There are impressive moments in the third movement.

There are the old, elemental faults: A lack of continuity of thought, so that there is no apparent organic structure. The music is as a series of views. The ear, as, in the other instance, the eye, becomes tired through disappointment, and is quickened only for a moment. There is no continuous rhythmic pulse that beats to the end. Bruckner is as a child who puts building blocks in a row, and has neither the inclination nor the skill to construct a building, either solid or fantastical. His melodic thought is often dry, and the endless repetitions dampen the soul. His wild admiration for Wagner leads him to the imitation of his idol's harmonic devices, or at times to deliberate and respectful quotation.

There is no need of going into the political question; of pitting Bruckner as a Wagnerian against Brahms and his passionate press agent, Hanslick. There is Bruckner's music in this ninth symphony; and if, to complete the familiar speech, there it will remain, we fear it will be to the world at large as on a dusty shelf. It was once the fashion to publish volumes entitled "Elegant Extracts," but a score of such musical quotations is hardly suited to concert use.

Miss Muriel Foster sang for the first time at these concerts. As a woman she might be compared by an oriental to a cedar of Lebanon, for she is tall and stately. As a singer she reminds us of other English contralto visitors who were tall, if not stately, or with such a striking face. She has an impressive organ, full, sonorous, dark, without natural warmth. The tones have not all been carefully placed, nor has the singer been judiciously schooled. Her delivery of sustained passages was spasmodic rather than legato, and she was inclined to force lower tones after the manner of her countrywomen. On the other hand her interpretation of the aria was dramatic in the quieter and less deliberate moments of intensity. Her gradations of tone in one and the same phrase were occasionally extreme, and the sudden jump from a fortissimo to an almost inaudible pianissimo was disconcerting to the hearer and injurious to the composer.

The overture to "The Fair Melusina," played with delicacy, beauty of tone, and also with spirit when the occasion demanded, revealed Mendelssohn the landscapist, a far greater man than the Mendelssohn of "Elijah" and much sentimental piano music.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME
Mendelssohn—Overture to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 32.
Gluck—Recitative and Aria, "Che faro senza Euridice,"—Miss Muriel Foster.
Bruckner—Symphony in D minor, No. 9. (Unfinished.) (First time.)
Songs with Pianoforte.
Dvorak—"Gute Nacht."
Rachmaninoff—"Von Jenseits."
Richard Strauss—"Muttertaendelei."
Miss Foster.

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72.
"The Fair Melusina" is one of Mendelssohn's many water-subjects ("Becalmed at sea and prosperous voyage," "The Hebrides," etc.) and is a proof of how extremes meet, for the arpeggio figure of the beginning is similar to Wagner's great Rhine music at the beginning of the trilogy. Mendelssohn's treatment is somewhat saccharine and the water is only a pleasant luke-warm.

Nevertheless the audience at once proved that pretty melodies have not lost their charm, by applauding the work with enthusiasm. The agreeable composition was delicately performed, and the flutes did especially excellent work. Mendelssohn uses this instrument very prominently in this work. It was always a favorite instrument with him, as witness his playing part of the grand old chorale "Ein Feste Burg" as a flute solo, in the "Reformation symphony," and his bringing back the old sacrificial instrument of Rome by a flute obbligato in the heathen chorus, "Oh be gracious, ye Immortals," in "St. Paul."

Miss Muriel Foster was the soloist. She appeared to much better advantage than at the Arbos concert of the week before, but the unclear enunciation was still in evidence, and also the running to extremes of fortissimo and mezza-voce. Nevertheless the passionate power and the noble quality of some of the higher and lower tones made ample amends, and in Strauss' "Muttertaendelei," even the pronunciation was clear, and the song was given in much better style than we have recently heard it. Miss Foster was recalled with much applause after each of her appearances and proves to be a much greater artist than her last appearance led us to expect.

How hard the concert-goer has to work in these days! Each composer comes forward with an abstruse problem, one more difficult than the other. This oppressive music of Bruckner, his ninth symphony, has many ideas, some of them great, some of them trivial; it can be unriddled by considerable effort on the part of the auditor, which is more than can be said of some recent works; but it remains musical mathematics rather than musical beauty.

And it is long! People speak of Schubert's "divine length"; reverse the sense of the adjective and we have a description of Bruckner's prolixity.

If ever there was a proverb applicable to modern music it is the saying that "the unexpected always happens." There is every kind of surprising modulation and harmony in the Bruckner symphony. The Scherzo is bizarre to the highest degree, the first movement ends so suddenly that the auditor is tripped up in the most alarming manner. The ideas themselves are choppy and short-breathed.

Bruckner seems a thorough musician without much inspiration, who wanders on and on, from climax to climax, in the hope that he may reach something grand at last; but the crowning moment never comes. We cannot believe that Bruckner will ever be ranked among the great; yet he is a talent in music and a very ingenious one. The "unfinished symphony" finishes its audience.

How sane, how beautiful, the Leonora overture (No. 2) seemed after the struggle of the Bruckner number! Mr. Gerike read it as if he wanted to teach a lesson. It was most brilliantly played. The trumpet passages were especially smooth. Spite of their prominence they are not very difficult. In fact there is not an extremely difficult trumpet passage in any of Beethoven's scores, although he pushed the contrabasses, the horns, and all the other instruments, unmercifully.

The fact is that during the time of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Weber, the art of trumpet-playing was in decadence. The keyed trumpet did not exist (although there was a "trombe a tirarsi" like a slide trombone) and the natural instruments were very sparingly employed. Beethoven, orchestral tyrant as he was, felt obliged to yield in the matter of trumpet passages and cut his coat according to the cloth. The violin work in the coda of the overture was as dashing as we have ever heard it; but we need not pick out points of excellence where all was so well done.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the twentieth symphony concert, held in Symphony Hall Saturday evening, Miss Muriel Foster, contralto, was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Mendelssohn: Overture to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," Op. 32.
Gluck: Recitative and Aria, "Che faro senza Euridice."
Bruckner: Symphony in D minor, No. 9. (Unfinished.) (First time.)
Songs with Pianoforte—
Dvorak: "Gute Nacht."
Rachmaninoff: "Von Jenseits."
Richard Strauss: "Muttertaendelei."
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, Op. 72.

The concert was made notable by the first production in Boston of a symphony by Bruckner, the ninth and last of this remarkable composer. Such of the audience as remember the impressive grandeur of Bruckner's B-flat symphony, played here some two years ago, awaited with lively interest the last message of the

208
 as had been finished, for of the finale only sketches have been found. After the hearing most people would have admitted themselves disappointed. When in his prime Brückner, by force of his original genius and also of his peculiarities, wrote music that created much discussion, being, to be sure, more generally condemned than commended. In his old age, his mannerisms grew upon him as his powers failed, till he himself said, concerning the ninth symphony: "I undertook a stiff work. I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my Te Deum may be used as a Finale. I have nearly finished three movements." Only the three were ever brought to completion, and the composer's suggestion as to the Te Deum is seldom carried out.

Without it, indeed, the work is quite long enough. The first movement alone would answer every purpose as the serious work of a symphony concert. Although Brückner undoubtedly conceived this symphony after a definite plan, its scheme is difficult to discover. The course of the music, seemingly, is entirely free. Themes of majesty and grandeur appear, then disappear, giving way to long passages of trivial and meaningless music. Tender, delicate episodes are hurried out of the way by bursts of orchestral splendor, all without discoverable reason. Listening to a symphony by Brückner is like riding through a flat, monotonous country, where one constantly comes upon unexpected beauties of landscape, by turns picturesque, charming, or grand. But in the ninth symphony there is more of the flat, dull country than in Brückner's earlier compositions. The slow movement is like the first, very long, with some impressive, dramatic moments, but oftener dull. Best of the three, most distinguished, most like the Brückner of old, is the scherzo, a piece brilliant in color and in rhythm, and less prolixly developed than the others. It would be a grateful number at any concert, and ought not to be banished from the concert hall on account of the hopelessness of the other movements.

The soloist of the occasion was Miss Muriel Foster, an English contralto of great repute in England and on the Continent. She has a glorious voice, of real contralto quality, without a break, of wide range, and moderately well placed. Considered musically, Miss Foster is to be ranked with English contraltos like Miss Butt, Miss Crossly and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn rather than with such American singers as Miss Wood, Miss Hussey, Miss Tucker, Mme. Wyman or Mme. Stein.

The most agreeable part of the concert was surely the delightful performance of Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, a work in which the composer let his feeling for the picturesque have its way, and in which he also indulged his undeniable fondness for orchestral color.

Mr. Emile Sauret is to be soloist at this week's concert. The programme will be as follows: Symphony No. 7, in C major, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saëns; Overture to "Carnival" (first time), Glazounow; "Les Préludes," Liszt.

R. R. G.

M. SAURET.

209
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in C major, (B. & H. No. 7.)

- I. Adagio: vivace.
- II. Adagio ma non troppo.
- III. Menuetto: allegretto.
- IV. Finale: Presto assai.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in B minor, No. 3, op. 61.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto moderato e maestoso. Allegro non troppo.

GLAZOUNOW.

OVERTURE, "Carnival." op. 45.
(First time.)

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Préludes." No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. EMILE SAURET.

Viennese master, so much of it, at least, as had been finished, for of the finale only sketches have been found. After the hearing most people would have admitted themselves disappointed. When in his prime Brückner, by force of his original genius and also of his peculiarities, wrote music that created much discussion, being, to be sure, more generally condemned than commended. In his old age, his mannerisms grew upon him as his powers failed, till he himself said, concerning the ninth symphony: "I undertook a stiff work. I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my Te Deum may be used as a Finale. I have nearly finished three movements." Only the three were ever brought to completion, and the composer's suggestion as to the Te Deum is seldom carried out.

Without it, indeed, the work is quite long enough. The first movement alone would answer every purpose as the serious work of a symphony concert. Although Brückner undoubtedly conceived this symphony after a definite plan, its scheme is difficult to discover. The course of the music, seemingly, is entirely free. Themes of majesty and grandeur appear, then disappear, giving way to long passages of trivial and meaningless music. Tender, delicate episodes are hurried out of the way by bursts of orchestral splendor, all without discoverable reason. Listening to a symphony by Brückner is like riding through a flat, monotonous country, where one constantly comes upon unexpected beauties of landscape, by turns picturesque, charming, or grand. But in the ninth symphony there is more of the flat, dull country than in Brückner's earlier compositions. The slow movement is like the first, very long, with some impressive, dramatic moments, but oftener dull. Best of the three, most distinguished, most like the Brückner of old, is the scherzo, a piece brilliant in color and in rhythm, and less prolixly developed than the others. It would be a grateful number at any concert, and ought not to be banished from the concert hall on account of the hopelessness of the other movements.

The soloist of the occasion was Miss Muriel Foster, an English contralto of great repute in England and on the Continent. She has a glorious voice, of real contralto quality, without a break, of wide range, and moderately well placed. Considered musically, Miss Foster is to be ranked with English contraltos like Miss Butt, Miss Crossly and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn rather than with such American singers as Miss Wood, Miss Hussey, Miss Tucker, Mme. Wyman or Mme. Stein.

The most agreeable part of the concert was surely the delightful performance of Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, a work in which the composer let his feeling for the picturesque have its way, and in which he also indulged his undeniable fondness for orchestral color.

Mr. Emile Sauret is to be soloist at this week's concert. The programme will be as follows: Symphony No. 7, in C major, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saëns; Overture to "Carnival" (first time), Glazounow; "Les Préludes," Liszt.

R. R. G.

M. SAURET.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in C major, (B. & H. No. 7.)

- I. Adagio: vivace.
- II. Adagio ma non troppo.
- III. Menuetto: allegretto.
- IV. Finale: Presto assai.

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in B minor, No. 3, op. 61.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto moderato e maestoso. Allegro non troppo.

GLAZOUNOW.

OVERTURE, "Carnival," op. 45.
(First time.)

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Préludes," No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. EMILE SAURET.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Saturday night the faithful returned to their shrine, and the symphonic muse came into her own again in spite of a week of opera. The programme:—

Symphony in C major, B. & H. No. 7....Haydn
Concerto in B minor for violin, No. 3...
Op. 61.....Saint-Saens
Overture, "Carnival," Op. 45.....Glazounoff
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3....Liszt
Soloist, Mr. Emil Sauret.

This made a pleasing and well-arranged concert, proceeding from old to new, from lesser to greater. The Haydn symphony, an example of classic antiquity, still retains its moments of comparative power, and the slow movement has more than the usual eighteenth-century depth of feeling.

The concerto was decidedly pleasing. Saint-Saens has been called the Proteus of modern music, because he employs so many varied styles in his works. The first movement was the least satisfying of the three. Of moderate interest, it tended a trifle towards dryness; but when compared with the infinite dulness of some more recent French composers, the movement would become as an oasis in a desert.

Yet modern Frenchmen in music never seem wholly successful in intellectual efforts, and it was only in the later portions that the full charm of the work was revealed. The second movement, in Siciliano (6-8) rhythm, possessed an idyllic pastoral character that was altogether delightful, while the finale kept up the standard in a more brilliant vein.

Mr. Sauret, as soloist, won a most decided triumph. His very first phrase, brusque and virile, showed that his powers were to be well displayed. Through all the work he displayed great breadth of tone. His work is well known in Boston, yet his expressive power of Saturday night came almost as an unexpected treat. Of his technical attainments, so far as the work displayed them, there is nothing to say but praise. His double-stopping was thoroughly clear and effective, and the arpeggio effects in harmonics that closed the second movement were marvellously pure. The applause was long and persistent, and the artist may well be satisfied with his reception.

We have had many orchestral carnivals, ranging from the Roman gayety of Berlioz to the Parisian revelry of Svendsen, and now comes Glazounoff with a Russian version. There was less than the expected Russian flavor in the work; the affair was a European celebration, not an Oriental orgie.

The dance is begun by piccolo, clarinet, and violins, while after a short interlude they are joined by 'cellos and bassoons, and the pace grows faster and faster. In the midst of the celebration, a conscientious organ protests, in rather acid chords, against the unseemly gayety, but this proves of no avail, and the occasion comes to a triumphant close. Speaking seriously, the overture contains great beauties, even if not so continuously charming as the composer's sixth symphony. Glazounoff's works seem at least as attractive as those of any living Russian.

"Les Preludes," well known and well beloved, was given a spirited performance, and stood forth as a revelation of joy. The day is coming, perhaps it is at hand, when Liszt's true greatness in composition will receive full recognition.

Wagner was satisfied to borrow his harmonies by the dozen, Strauss has followed in the musical form that he evolved. Sometimes Liszt is confused and kaleidoscopic in effect, but here he produced a work that is logical, coherent, and ineffably beautiful. The time may soon arrive when "Les Preludes" may serve to point the finger of reproach at the whimsical "Don Quixote" or the unmelodious "Heldenleben" of today.

Arthur Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the 21st Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, included Haydn's symphony in C major (B. & H., No. 7); Saint-Saens' violin concerto in B minor, No. 3, played by Mr. Emile Sauret; Glazounoff's "Carnival" overture (first time), and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

Mr. Emile Sauret, who has not played here since 1896, was most warmly applauded at the public rehearsal, as at the concert, and this applause was well deserved. He played not only with technical accuracy, ease and brilliance, but with fine musicianship and an exquisite appreciation of Saint-Saens' purpose and intent. The music of this most accomplished composer is characterized by a peculiar elegance of expression and of workmanship. He is never deep, although a consummate master of his trade; he is seldom, if ever, emotional; his taste is fastidious, and, if there be courteous irony in music, it is to be found in his compositions. Mr. Sauret's performance had the distinction of the highest violinistic breeding. He did not sentimentalize in the song episodes, he did not attempt to give incongruous importance to the work. An admirable display of polished, as well as truly musical, virtuosity!

The overture by Glazounoff, now 10 years old, is a routine work, which is poor in musical thought and not strikingly or originally brilliant in expression. Why should we not hear at these concerts the earlier and more imaginative works of Glazounoff, "Stenka Razin," "The Kremlin," "The Sea" and others of the period, in which he did not indulge himself in contract labor? The overture was played with much spirit, and the performance of the symphony and Liszt's symphonic poem gave pleasure, for sympathy with the ancients does not preclude, in Boston, appreciation of the modern romantic school—and Liszt is still a modern; and, in some instances, an ultra-modern.

April 10 1904

SAURET MADE HIS VIOLIN SPEAK

His Rendition at Symphony Hall
Showed Him to Be an Artist,
Not a Showman.

B Journal in Quaint Apr 10 1904

The twenty-first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening with the following program:

Symphony No. 7, in C major.....Haydn
Concerto for violin.....Saint-Saens
Overture, "Carnival".....Glazounoff
(First time.)

"Les Preludes".....Liszt

The surpassing feature of this most interesting program was Emil Sauret's performance of the Saint-Saens' concerto for violin. Mr. Sauret chose the concerto in B minor, which bears a dedication to Sarasate, and which had already been performed in Boston by Miss Mead, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Ysaye. The performance of last night will long be a pleasing, thrilling memory.

For not only did Mr. Sauret excel in brilliancy of technique, but also in virility and in perfect happiness of interpretation. He was no mere expert displaying his show-piece; he was rather the true artist, duly confident of his power, but more than all reveling in the beauty and the vigor created by the composer.

There are players whose technique is as dazzling as a Fourth of July rocket; but when the dazzle is gone what is left but a commonplace impression? Mr. Sauret's pyrotechnics are subservient to his song; and after the thrills wrought by his mastery of the bow had subsided there lingered, and will linger for many a day, the deep impression wrought by the mellow loveliness and the glorious power that he evoked from the music of Saint-Saens. Deservedly, he was recalled again and again.

Glazounoff's overture, "Carnival," the novelty on the program, is memorable in a negative form, to be expressed thus: "I wouldn't particularly care to hear it again."

Its beauties are as tinsel, its solemnity (mostly confined to the organ) vague and groping. It was written when the author was 28 years old, and betrays rather ambitious intentions than settled power. The organ was played by Wallace Goodrich.

But charming from first to last was the performance of the Haydn symphony—a work designed for the cheerful inhabitants of the land o'erflowing with milk and honey.

Delightful, too, sounded the symphonic poem, in which Liszt conjures up in turn the spirits of illusions, of bucolic contentment and of martial enthusiasm. So was well ended an evening of rare enjoyment.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Emile Sauret appeared as soloist at last week's Symphony concerts and quickly rewon the favor of those who remembered his splendid work of a half-dozen years ago, and gained for himself many new admirers. He played the Saint-Saens B minor violin concerto. The novelty number on the program was the "Carnival" overture, by Glazounoff. Haydn's C major and Liszt's poem, "The Preludes," completed the selections. Mr. Sauret's interpretation of the concerto was masterly and showed full appreciation of the dignity and strength of this beautiful violin piece. The first part was a bit lacking in tonal purity in the rapid passages and Sauret did not display the effeminate finger dexterity of Kubelik or Kociau, but the authority and virility of expression were there, and all the dynamic variations were given with artistic finish.

One hardly looks for so poetic an exposition of the second movement from a man of Sauret's appearance, yet his playing of the "Siciliano" rhythm was exquisitely shaded, and every phase from pianissimo to forte was set forth in a manner which awakened unusual tributes of applause at the close of the movement. His attack was splendidly forceful, his chord runs were very even and his bowling called forth a large, expressive tone throughout the violin register. In the more passionate third part the latter quality of his art was very frequently in evidence and the resultant tones were notably sonorous. The audience was hugely delighted with Mr Sauret's performance, and so, too, were the members of the orchestra. His recalls at the finish of his playing were many.

The "Carnival" overture by Glazounoff is a descriptive work of a jolly nature, so far as movement goes, but it is full of the usual percussion effects introduced as contrasts to the gentler motifs given to the lighter strings and wood winds. These instruments have some captivating bits of melody in the introduction and there are some excellent passages of a strenuous, but melodic, nature allotted the heavier contingents just before an organ episode. The thematic material is quite cleverly utilized and the orchestra gave the work with efficiency and commendable zeal.

The third movement in the Haydn symphony was the gem in an interpretation which seemed to be thoroughly sympathetic and characteristically exact in execution. The accompaniment to the violin performance was also in harmony with the work of the soloist, and the stormy passages in the Liszt number were given with due regard to the marks in fortissimo.

This week Mme Hopekirk will be the soloist, playing a concert piece for piano and orchestra, written by herself, and the scherzo for the Saint-Saens G minor piano concerto. The orchestral numbers will be the overture "La Fiancée du Tzar," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

Globe Apr 10 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

In Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, Mr. Emile Sauret as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this programme:

Haydn: Symphony in C major (B. & H., No. 7).
Saint-Saens: Concerto in B minor for Violin, No. 3, Op. 61.

Glazounoff: "Carnival" Overture, Op. 45.

(First time.)

Liszt: "The Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3.

In these noisy days, when one of our men, cunning with music, sits him down to write us a piece for the band, he never is content with it unless it has challenged the riddle of the universe, or has pictured the origin of species, or traced the rise of man, or has followed his trail after death to the very fence about Elysium. When Haydn took his pen in hand it was just to say: "Come with me out under yon green tree, and we'll watch the clouds and the grazing sheep, and we'll pipe a merry tune!" With destiny and the chief end of man he never concerned himself. (For Sousa, let us interject by the way, the chief end of man is the end where the feet are.) For Haydn it was enough to feel the brush of the spring air upon his cheek of an afternoon, to chat with a great lady in her salon that evening, or exchange a pinch of snuff with his sovereign. His sorrows were simple because his heart was simple and his contentment was great. And these are the things we hear in this symphony. Its moments of clash and ardor and action may seem to us mere friskiness—we are wise, and have dwelt beside the dynamo and the roaring Elevated. But when Haydn brings to us his quiet bliss, his tenderness and his absolute peace of mind we are like mad beings eased at last with a yearned-for, an alien, an unattainable repose. And so through all his archaic devices we welcome this genial old man, with his message that is fresher and newer now than ever it was. The minuet alone might have called forth smiles. For that matter, Haydn is the wheelwright's son in all his minuets—they all seem designed to be danced on rag carpet. But in the finale there are themes of a dignity, and they are worked up with a seriousness and a majesty, to shame some of the slipshod finales that Beethoven himself is content with at times.

The orchestra played this symphony with admirable finish. So was the well-known Liszt symphonic poem given a notable, a great performance. The "Carnival Overture" is not one of Glazounoff's most important works; but its themes are interesting and sufficiently merry, and they rise once or twice to an exciting climax. The organ part butts in like a sour and bore-some old hypochondriac at a feast.

It may not be the province or the wish of Mr. Sauret to paint wild and sobbing passion, to drag unwilling tears to the eye and distort the listener's countenance with the delicious agony of emotion. For all his spirit and dash, it is his fashion to recount with an impersonal touch a tale that may be ever so tragic, seeing the whole thing quite objectively and speaking in a tone of voice that is not keyed at a shriek. He is the accomplished player of bridge who can sit down smiling and airy to a game of desperate stakes and polish the whole thing off with a flourish—incidentally coming off winner. He is Corot painting a battle picture. And surely this is legitimate art, and it may be great. Why tear a passion to tatters? Mr. Sauret gets from his fiddle a tone that is caressing yet at times enormous. It may want many of the stops in Duse's splendid organ. But then his technique is competent and brilliant and always finished. His style is broad; if not impassioned, it still is warm and full of romance. And after these many scrapers who gush and wall eternally flat or sharp, what a delight it is to loll back and hear this man declaim in his big sonority, with his smoothness and precision, with no panting or perspiration, and always absolutely on the pitch!

At the next concert, on April 15, the orchestra will play: Overture, "La Fiancée du Tzar," Rimsky-Korsakow; Concert Piece for Piano, with Orchestral Accompaniment, Helen Hopekirk; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; Scherzo from the G minor Concerto for Pianoforte, Saint-Saens; Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Hopekirk will be the soloist. B. K.

Trans. Apr 11 1904

ROMANTIQUE for VIOLIN.

erato. — Recitativo.

po. — Canzonetta (allegro moderato). —

in C, No. 1.

ace.

ro energico.

ne.)

st:

ROTH.

214
SYMPHONY HALL

215
Wednesday Evening, April 13, 1904

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

CONCERT in aid of its Pension Fund

THE ORCHESTRA WILL BE ASSISTED BY THE

CHORUS of the
Handel and Haydn Society

PROGRAMME

Beethoven . . . . . Overture to "Egmont"
Mozart . . . . . Quintet from "Così fan tutte"
Beethoven . . . . . Symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," Op. 125

ORCHESTRAL PART.

- I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
- II. Molto vivace. Presto.
- III. Adagio molto e cantabile.

CHORAL PART (the text from Schiller's "Ode to Joy").

- IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Baritone Recitative.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor Solo and Chorus: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro ma non tanto. Prestissimo.

SOLOISTS

MRS. KILESKE-BRADBURY

MR. THEODORE VAN YORX

MISS PAULINE WOLTMANN

MR. MYRON W. WHITNEY, JR.

MR. SULLIVAN SARGENT

ORCHESTRA WAS IN FINE FORM

Small Audience, However, Favored
Boston Symphony's Effort for Pension Fund.

MAGNIFICENT CHORAL AID

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony the Event of Evening—Strauss
Conducts Next Week.

A concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last evening in aid of its pension fund. Notwithstanding a very interesting program, the audience was shamefully small. This may have been due to the fact that a new opera was given in the Boston Theater, but even at that, it seemed strange that the friends of the orchestra did not respond more generously than was the case. The program follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi fan tutte".....Mozart
Symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral,"
Op. 125.....Beethoven

The event of the evening was, of course, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with its magnificent choral part. For this the orchestra was assisted by the full chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society and the following soloists: Mrs. Kileski-Bradbury, soprano; Miss Pauline Woltmann, contralto; Theodore Van York, tenor, and Myron W. Whitney, Jr., basso.

Orchestra in Fine Form.

In the three orchestral movements which preceded the choral the orchestra, under Mr. Gericke, seemed to play with unusual finish. The delicate first movement was read with much taste, and the presto following was given with a spontaneity and zest that throughout had the effect of delicious light comedy. The adagio made even a stronger impression. Its dignity, combined with its rare melody, was thoroughly inspiring.

The work of the chorus in the choral deserves special commendation. Mr. Gericke handled the big stageful of musicians with fine authority, and the clean-cut work of the singers in conjunction with the orchestra enabled him to work out some splendid effects. The volume at climatic moments was powerful, yet it never degenerated into mere sound.

Short Effective Solos.

The part that the soloists have in this symphony is important, though by no means extensive. The four voices blended excellently in the quartets, and both Mr. Whitney and Mr. Van York gave their short solos effectively. Mr. Van York's voice was particularly agreeable.

Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and the Mozart quintet, the two opening numbers of the program, were well chosen appetizers and formed a desirable contrast to the weightier matter which followed.

STRAUSS TO CONDUCT

ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

A special arrangement has been made for a concert at Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Richard Strauss in which the Boston orchestra will be directed throughout the program by Dr. Strauss. This will afford the gratification of a very generally expressed desire to hear the Boston orchestra under the direction of Dr. Strauss.

For this occasion the program will be introduced by the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, followed by the "Vorspell" to "Tristan and Isolde." The second part of the program will be made up exclusively of compositions by Dr. Strauss, including his tone poem "Don Juan," his "Don Quixote" and the love scene from his opera "Feuersnoth."

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave last evening, at Symphony Hall, a concert in aid of its pension fund. The organization was assisted by the chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society and by Mrs. Kileski-Bradbury, Miss Pauline Woltmann, Mr. Theodore Van York, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Jr., and Mr. Sullivan Sargent. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mozart's Quintet from "Cosi fan tutte," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in D minor, for solo voices, chorus and orchestra.

A good deal has already been written in these columns and elsewhere concerning the purpose of these concerts, and that purpose must be by this time generally understood. The musicians have by their own efforts established a fund destined to aid members of their organization after they have become old or incapacitated for service. This fund they propose to increase by giving occasional concerts. It is an independent and praiseworthy effort, and deserves the encouragement of all loyal music lovers in the community. Last evening the audience was small. Doubtless the opera season is an unfortunate time for the giving of other music entertainments; but there seems no excuse for the vast barren spaces in the hall. It is needless to dilate upon the quality of concerts offered. This programme may not have been as alluring as a more varied, and more generally modern, programme would have been, but it was an admirable program for all that, and it is most regrettable that, together with the prospect of a fine performance and its good cause, it should not have aroused more public enthusiasm.

Of the performance it is needless to speak in detail. Mozart's quintet was gracefully sung. The symphony was given a spirited reading; the chorus sang with good volume and intonation, and the orchestral portions, especially (the first three movements), elicited warm applause. Herold Apr 14 1904

RICHARD STRAUSS HERE.

Special arrangements have been made for a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening of next week with Dr. Richard Strauss as conductor. The programme will include: Strauss' Beethoven symphony No. 8, Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' tone poems "Don Juan," and "Don Quixote" and the Love Scene from Strauss' "Feuersnoth." Tickets for this concert are now ready at the Symphony Hall box office.

THE PENSION CONCERT.

Last night's concert by the symphony orchestra, in aid of its pension fund, deserved a better fate. Opera week kept away its quota of music-lovers, for one thing. But more important in effect was the open secret, now an announced fact, that Richard Strauss, the great Richard himself, is to conduct the symphony orchestra in a second concert next Tuesday evening.

It is certainly to be hoped that all Boston music-lovers will avail themselves of this chance to see and hear the greatest composer who has ever trod on the American continent. By doing this they will give needed aid to the orchestra; for on last night's receipts the retiring musicians would surely have to abandon bread and cheese and cut down their allowance of beer.

Nevertheless, those who came enjoyed a notable concert. The programme was as follows:—

Overture, "Egmont,".....Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi fan tutte,".....Mozart
Symphony No. 9, "Choral,".....Beethoven

The Egmont overture received a spirited performance. It is a noble work, more stirring than the somewhat aimless "Coriolanus." Beethoven always thrilled at the thought of liberty, and he has given a glorious account of the Netherlands hero.

The Mozart quintet introduced the soloists, Mrs. Bradbury, Miss Pauline Woltmann, and Messrs. Van York, Myron Whitney, and Sullivan Sargent. All seemed effective, and gave the piece with due discretion and delicacy.

The ninth symphony was the important number, and under Mr. Gericke's lead it revived old memories. Its empty opening chords had all their customary effect of weirdness and the storm and stress of the first movement were excellently rendered.

The second movement, Motto Vivace, was given with due lightness and grace. The syncopations were made plain, and the fugal touches were admirably clear. The exquisite serenity of the Adagio was altogether effective, but the glory of the work is always its final movement.

The lover of liberty has become the prophet of fraternity, for Beethoven here aims to depict the universal brotherhood described by Schiller in his "Ode to Joy." The themes of strife and tumult are answered, as if in rebuke, by the dignified phrases of the deep strings. Then comes the melody of rejoicing gradually broadening through the orchestra, and reaching its grand climax in the chorus.

Yet the final effect seems always a trifle obscured. It may be the trying nature of the vocal parts, for Beethoven exacted as much from the voice as from inanimate instruments that cannot tire. But the work itself seems a little long today. One does not write a whole oratorio as the postscript to a symphony.

The programme of next Tuesday includes Beethoven's 8th Symphony, the "Tristan" prelude, "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," and the love scene from "Feuersnoth." Herold Apr 14 1904 Arthur Elson.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

For the enlargement of its pension fund and with the aid of these singers—Mrs. Kileski-Bradbury, Miss Pauline Woltmann, Mr. Van Vorex, Mr. Myron Whitney, Jr., Mr. Sullivan Sargent—the Symphony Orchestra held forth in its hall last evening with this programme: Herold Apr 14 1904

Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Mozart: Quintet from "Cosi fan tutte."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," Op. 125.

All the virtues of the orchestra spoke in the Egmont overture. Egmont was made to rage and to defy the terrible Duke with exciting spirit and vigor. The triumph of the hostile force against him grew to be impressively sinister. And yet there was preserved the other side of the story. There was drawn for us, in admirable contrast and in warmest colors, Egmont the proud prince, the darling of the people, the lover of Clarchen.

In the quintet, appointed guide by the music itself, Mrs. Bradbury anyway became the chief figure. Whatever her recent indisposition, the loveliness of her voice had all returned and her skill in its use was never finer.

And now we come to the much-handled subject of the Ninth Symphony. Americans have a fashion of being bored at its pretensions, and love to sneer at the supposed cause of the weariness, without distinguishing sharply whether the blame for it rests with the symphony or with themselves. (The audience last night was lamentably small.) For one thing the piece is too unfamiliar here. However intimate the players may become with its aims, the singers have too little chance to master its difficulties; and in consequence the infrequent performances it receives in this country are hardly ever adequate because hastily and scantily prepared for. The listener suffers even more. The work is colossal in form and epic in meaning. And the poor average listener is not ready, at the snap of the finger, to think in such large terms, or anyway be at home in them. Used to everyday tens and hundreds, he is embarrassed by sudden mil-

Or like a lubber habituated to the quick rhythm of his own busy steps on the city sidewalk, he is hardly at ease when suddenly transferred to shipboard and is tortured there with the long and strange and agonizingly regular pulse of the sea. And so before this symphony he is dazed and puzzled, and very naturally blames this piece which confuses him, rather than blame himself or the circumstances that have permitted him to hear it too seldom.

But when you gird yourself and collect your powers and ponder the thing, what an ultra modern you discover the Beethoven of this ninth symphony to be! We are but just growing up to him. The day will come when we shall find those famed and disputed last quartets a perfect, a fitting voice to the buzzing activities, the daring philosophy, the titan tendings of this latter day. After this symphony has Richard Strauss been so novel or his utterances the great wild, triumphant yawp that we have said they are? At every turn he is anticipated. The Zarathustra tune opens with no more Olympian impressiveness, nor Keat's Hyperion with more yawning impressiveness, than the commencement of that first movement. In it there is all of Strauss's furious, daring use of cacophony and clash. There is the trick of themes in pairs, theme answering theme. These themes have all the transcendental sweep dear to Strauss, with a succinctness besides such as Strauss has rarely yet attained. Strauss reaches far and seeks wide as Space itself—Beethoven both reaches and grasps. His themes in this symphony are as willing as those of Strauss to cut loose and wander away from the common, safe, sane everyday circle of men's interests. They do not sing of the difficulty of earning today's bread, or the pain of parting with a friend. They leap into risky regions. Let reason protest as it will, thought and fancy here cast off the habitual, the usual, and dare to meander where they will. Strauss has screamed no Great Yearning that sees so clearly the thing that it desires, or that desires so stupendously much as the yearnings in this symphony.

And there is another, a last tendency of Beethoven here in the ninth, that is more modern yet. There are long patches of moods, merely moods. Latterday composers seem to use music as an escape from the worries and the strivings of the world. Their tunes, their themes, their finished compositions do not so much sing the strivings and thinkings we do, as the moments when we give over thinking and doing and sit down to muse. Franck and Faure give utterance to our method of rest. They paint us sitting silent, watching a sunset, our feelings hardly gathered into the definite form of thought. Of if we walk away from the scene with one or the other petulant fling at Destiny which annoys us, or at Space which has grown so small, these musicians faithfully jot it down and utter it with our own intensity. Beethoven rarely sat down to paper without the intention of ridding himself at once of some burning conviction, and he always said it in his intensest manner of speech. He could, of course, be "muddy," too; yet even in his most abstracted humor he sits with his mental processes pretty much gathered up into at least the silent thought of contemplation. Yet here is the Beethoven who, too, can put away utterance and thought and definiteness, who can become a flock of dust in Space and stare into it vacantly as a tree. The slow movement to this symphony is one whole stretch of the inarticulate moods and maunderings that were ours on this very 14th day of April.

So Strauss and the later Beethoven are brothers and twins, but for one distinction. For all that he casts loose and visits unwonted regions of speculation, leaps away from earth and from the heights of Olympus, wishes fruitlessly for the brotherhood of man, when he comes to write it down Beethoven never parts with his worship of form. Form is a restraint—here the only restraint he will tolerate; but he does tolerate it. He may outdo the abandon of Shakspeare inhabiting the mind of a Lear; but he makes his Lear speak in the common forms of human thought and according to all the rules of syntax. Beethoven stops short of the amorphous, and so will always be human. Strauss stalks sublimely on beyond. Beethoven is a man throwing a baseball with enormous force but with perfect grace. Strauss is a man throwing a fit.

There is another reason, too, perhaps, why this ninth symphony has not the hold on the listening mind that is perennially exerted by the third or the fifth—to keep only to Beethoven. Schubert's tenth, and certainly his unfinished, will be listened to longer and more lovingly. And the reason has its plausibilities. Take the case of the Messiah, of Stabat Mater. Each of these tells the story of a passion that is brought home to the daily experience of every one of us. In Rossini's work there is the mother who weeps for her son. The most untutored mind will represent such feelings to himself with no effort of the imagination. His nerves are easily tuned to such feelings and he sits overpowered with sympathy. On the other hand consider a recent account of a supposed crack of doom, and a picturing of the feelings of mankind at sight of the new Jerusalem. The idea may be magnificently presented, and yet it will not strike home so closely as the Messiah, for example, which celebrates a passion that at some time or other visits every breast. And so it is with the ninth symphony. At its first measures earth drops away and we are in company with the gods, in whose society we feel painfully inconsequent.

As for the performance last night, it is always unjust to listen too closely to the vocal end. Invariably the singers have had too little drill. And then Beethoven has written for them unmercifully. In contempt of possibilities and limitations, he exacts of them a mass or quality of sound, let them obtain it as best they may. The first three movements, however, and especially the scherzo, went with the expected and the usual technical precision, and there was commendable feeling for the stupendous significance of the music.

One last thought is suggested. If the recent visit of Richard Strauss taught us anything at all, it is this: In any work of vast form and content, the climaxes should be more marked than ordinarily; the fortissimos should be more vociferous, and the softer parts more than ordinarily gentle. If we do not have these higher heights and deeper depths, there is the painful effect of a desert where there was intended to be even richer variety of scenery than is common or possible to more modest pictures. Certainly Strauss felt instinctively this principle. The performances of his works gathered some of their greatness from its observance. And our own symphony orchestra need not blush to learn from his example.

SYMPHONY PENSION

Post April 14, 04 FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave a concert last evening at Symphony Hall in aid of the pension fund, assisted by Mrs. Killeski Bradbury, Miss Pauline Woltmann, Theodore Van York, Myron W. Whitney, Jr., Sullivan Sargent, soloists, and the chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Quintet from "Così fan Tutti".....Mozart
Symphony No. 9 (choral).....Beethoven

The "Egmont" overture was superbly played, and the quintet from Mozart's opera, "Così fan Tutti," one of the best of its kind, was effectively given by the soloists, and this number made a delightful impression. The scherzo and slow movement of the symphony are the most interesting portions for the average listener. The last movement for soloists and chorus is seldom given, as the music is a hard proposition for voices, being well-nigh unsingable. The chorus did remarkably well and the soloists also.

THE PENSION CONCERT

Last night's concert by the symphony orchestra, in aid of its pension fund, deserved a better fate. Opera week kept away its quota of music-lovers, for one thing. But more important in effect was the open secret, now an announced fact, that Richard Strauss, the great Richard himself, is to conduct the symphony orchestra in a second concert next Tuesday evening.

It is certainly to be hoped that all Boston music-lovers will avail themselves of this chance to see and hear the greatest composer who has ever trod on the American continent. By doing this they will give needed aid to the orchestra; for on last night's receipts the retiring musicians would surely have to abandon bread and cheese and cut down their allowance of beer.

The programme of next Tuesday includes Beethoven's 8th Symphony, the "Tristan" prelude, "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," and the love scene from "Feuersnot."

220

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOW, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Tzar."

HELEN HOPEKIRK, CONCERT PIECE for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA
in D minor.
(First time.)

SCHUBERT, UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

SAINT-SAËNS, SCHERZO from the CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.

WAGNER, OVERTURE to the Opera "Rienzi."

Soloist:

Mme. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv - PROGRAMME. Apr 18 1904

Rimsky-Korsakow—Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tzar."

Helen Hopekirk—Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra in D minor (first time)

Mme Helen Hopekirk.

Schubert—Unfinished symphony in B minor.

Saint-Saens—Scherzo from the Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Mme. Hopekirk.

Wagner—Overture to the Opera, "Rienzi."

On Saturday we returned from operatic dissipation to symphonic respectability; it is better to be doorkeeper at Symphony Hall than to dwell in the tents of "Carmen" and "Coppelia." Mr. Gericke celebrated the Prodigal's return by a programme of unusual interest. Rimsky-Korsakow (with the accent on the penultimate) is one of those Russians who have advanced the cause of modern music by using attractive melodies in connection with rich harmonies and varied orchestration, by combining modern complexity with tuneful beauty.

In the overture we found clear and charming themes instead of glittering fragments, coherent development instead of unintelligible progressions, in short, another proof of Muscovite power in the large musical forms. The artistic war of the future will be between Russia on the one hand, and France and Germany on the other, and that combat, at least, Russia will win.

Mme. Hopekirk is not only a great figure among female pianists, she is a prominent composer as well. Her Concert Piece may be accorded high rank among the musical works produced by women in America. It has the merit of not attempting more than the composer can carry through with a sure hand; it is not distended with an ambition that o'erleaps itself.

The themes are well-contrasted and well developed, especially towards the close. The cadenza has an original touch in combining oboe with the chief instrument, and Mr. Longy added to the beauty of this part of the work. We did not find as Scottish a flavor in the composition as we had been led to expect.

The coda was perhaps the most Gaelic portion. The placing of the cadenza earlier than usual in the work is quite permissible; Mendelssohn in his violin concerto gives a cadenza in the centre of the first movement.

Of the playing of this excellent composition we can also speak in praise; Mme. Hopekirk was fluent and secure. But in the subsequent St. Saens Scherzo she was still more effective and gave the airy, tricky lightness of the work with a daintiness that was altogether delightful. The ensemble of both works was commendable. The pianist was recalled with enthusiasm after both of her appearances.

Seldom has Schubert's unfinished Symphony sounded better than it did on this occasion. All consonances may be abolished by the apostles of ugliness, the latter-day orchestra may bleat as a flock of sheep or bray as a herd of asses, but Keats' words still remain true:—

A thing of beauty is a joy forever;
Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness.

The audience applauded the work most heartily. We have heard it given with more elasticity, but it was an effective interpretation nevertheless.

The Rienzi Overture came later, like bombast after daintiness, a prize-fighter after a sylph, moonshine whiskey after ambrosia.

Yet it is not without redeeming features. There is no total depravity in music any more than in ethics. The prayer is a melody that cannot easily be shaken out of the mind. If one compares this overture with the "Vorspiel to the Mastersingers" one can obtain a good idea of how true masters in music may rise.

"On stepping stones

"Of their dead selves, to higher things."
Louis C. Elson.

COMPOSER IS ALSO SOLOIST

Mrs. Hopekirk Performs Her Own
Work at 22d Symphony
Concert.

SHE IS AN INSPIRED PIANIST.

Band in Good Humor Gives Admirable Support—Sympathetic in Schubert's Unfinished.

Journal Apr 17 1904

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night, with Mrs. Helen Hopekirk as soloist. The program was:

Overture, "The Betrothed of the Tzar"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concert Piece in D minor, for pianoforte, and orchestra.....Helen Hopekirk
(First time.)
Unfinished Symphony in B minor....Schubert
Scherzo from the Concerto in G minor,
No. 2, for pianoforte, Op. 22....Saint-Saens
Overture to the opera "Rienzi".....Wagner

Martial and Inspiring.

Unfortunately—or fortunately, as you please—no Japanese overture existed to place before or after the piece from "The Betrothed of the Tzar," which was first heard in Boston (in fact, first heard in this country) at a Symphony concert in November, 1902. Rimsky-Korsakoff was once an officer in the Russian marine service; indeed, from 1873 to 1884, he was an inspector of the marine bands. Fate has kindly kept him ashore. The overture requires no new analysis; it is too clear; its novel ideas, gracefully and skilfully worked out and its rich orchestration are too obvious. However, the martial spirit of the times may excuse these few comments. The performance of the overture was fully satisfying.

Mrs. Hopekirk appeared not only as soloist, but as composer. Her concert piece is wholly interesting, at times, too, it is brilliant and charming. From first to last piano and orchestra accompany each other delightfully. Mrs. Hopekirk played captivatingly.

A Satisfying Performer.

Her performance of the Saint-Saens scherzo was also graceful and powerful. There was virility when needed, and again there was a featheriness of touch or a purity of legato that revealed the complete artist. She was rewarded with enthusiastic applause.

Never has the unfinished masterpiece of Schubert been more sympathetically played than last night, and none the less enjoyable was the performance of the stirring and melodious "Rienzi" overture.

MME. HOPEKIRK WINS RECALLS

Her Concert Piece in D Minor for Piano and Orchestra Given for the First Time at the Symphony Concert East Evening.

CLOSE OF GRAND OPERA SEASON AT THE BOSTON

Calve Sings in "Carmen" at the Matinee; "Goetterdaemmerung" Given in the Evening, with Mme. Gadski as Bruennhilde.

Herald P. Hall Nov 17 1904
The programme of the 22d Symphony concert in Symphony Hall last evening,

Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"

Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concert piece in D minor for piano and orchestra.....Helen Hopekirk
(First time.)

"Unfinished" symphony.....Schubert
Scherzo from Piano Concerto in G minor,
No. 2.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera has a romantically tragic libretto, which deals with jealousy, poison, madness, murder and violent takings off, but the overture might serve for a comedy. Perhaps the composer had in mind the paradox of Champfleury, that anything which concerns death is surprisingly gay. Whatever his motive, the incongruity is surprising. The overture, which had been played here once before, is delicately scored. Let us hope another season for "Sadkow" and the Spanish Caprice, which show the imagination as well as the orchestral coloring of this gifted composer.

Mme. Hopekirk's Concertpiece for piano and orchestra was composed in Paris in 1894 and produced at Edinburgh Nov. 19 of that year, at a concert of the Scottish Orchestra, led by Mr. Henschel. The programme book of that concert spoke of "a characteristic freedom of form and what may be called fantastic flavor, redolent of northern breezes and hethery hills." We do not find these qualities in the music, nor does a certain theme sound "wild and barbaric." The composition is creditable student's work. The most poetic portion is the episode for oboe solo against the background furnished by the piano, and the composer was fortunate in having the assistance of such a rare artist as Mr. Longy. The second theme of the main movement is pretty and the development is at times effective. But the work as a whole is not of distinguished originality in thought or expression. There are pages that are frankly conventional, the conscientious work of a faithful and uninspired pupil. Mme. Hopekirk, who played the piano part, was heartily applauded, and there were recalls.

She had the courage to play a detached movement of Saint-Saens' concerto in G minor. The scherzo of one of Liszt's concertos is thus played—we believe Mme. Zeisler puts it on her programme—and there is no reason why movements of a symphony or a concerto should not be thus heard. The performance of Mme. Hopekirk might justly be described as neat and chaste. The music demands, however, sharply defined rhythm, brilliance, glittering elegance and the authority that gives the suggestion of irresistible reserve force. The performance of both pianist and orchestra was highly respectable and pale.

The highly poetic symphony was read as if with a personal affection and the performance was most euphonious. The overture to "Rienzi" is at the best mere circus music. It is a good thing to hear it once in a while, for it shows that Wagner, on occasion, could be more vulgar than Meyerbeer, whom he so cordially disliked.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-second concert in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening, and with the assistance of Mme. Hopekirk played the following programme: Trans. Nov 18 1904

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."
Helen Hopekirk: Concert Piece in D minor, for Piano and Orchestra. (First time.)
Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Saint-Saens: Scherzo from the Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 22.
Wagner: Overture to the Opera "Rienzi."

Mme. Hopekirk's concert piece contained an abundance of interesting matter. Really this abundance became the chief fault of the work, by its running to an extreme. It classed the composition inevitably among the early endeavors of people who have yet written little, and who have not learned to leave a portion of their ideas to become the substance of later pieces. They seek to vent everything they have ever thought of in one grand comprehensive burst. Victim to this tendency, Mme. Hopekirk's work lacked unity of design. She has not begun it with a single-minded text, stripped of the superfluous till it is self-evident, till it fairly says itself. She has not expounded this to that length and with that degree of insistence which such texts, in great works, seize to themselves in a sort of perfect wedding. There were, instead, many texts and no sermon. It was the entertaining but disjointed conversation at a tea-party. But Mme. Hopekirk's themes are all charming, especially those allotted to the orchestra, which very greatly preponderates over the pianoforte part in interest. Mme. Hopekirk played this and the Saint-Saens Scherzo with vigor as distinguished from power. In the latter composition her feeling for rhythm was at times in abeyance, but she did it with an airy touch and with a smooth and round, if unchanging, tone.

The overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff claims the listener's attention solely with its beauties of orchestration. Otherwise it is slight indeed. The youthful Wagner's overture, unskilled but robustious and full of crude force, was played with a spirit that almost lifted it from the insignificance into which the remainder of the programme sank beside the splendor of the performance accorded the Schubert symphony.

Schubert, like all men who have come to much, was long in making himself. The trouble with him was that he persisted in going through the ordeal of mastering his mind with his pen glued to his hand. Except for the songs, in all but his last works we are called upon to sift his ideas out of the maze of mouthings that he was put to before he could arrive at utterance. We hardly can see his buildings for the scaffolding about them. But when he came to write this symphony he was the man who at last has learned to write. Luck had kept it in the background of his mind and had saved it from his early days of experimentation; yet the song must have slumbered in him long. Nature had nursed that cry in him till it burst forth from him in sheer inability to stay any longer contained. Water might more easily flow up hill than a single note of this piece be written other than it is. The Matterhorn is not more a work of nature.

And with a skill that was great, Mr. Gericke and his orchestra made themselves a willing tongue for Schubert to deliver his oration. They made his burning, intense, laconic phrases as logical as the rainfall. When Schubert had written this piece he had left no more to be said on that particular topic. And on Saturday evening one felt, when the orchestra had finished it, that they had left no other way for it to be played. Only once, in the first movement, the majesty of that opening given to the basses and the effect of the querulous theme of the violins was marred when the cellos entered with their familiar lovely song. The gentlemen were not in unison; somebody was playing sharp or flat; and the spell was broken. But the second movement with its spirit of renunciation and its unearthly mystery, was given an inspired performance. The first clarinet and first oboe became foremost among ninety poets. The orchestra had played better than it ever has played before.

The programme at the next concert will include: Chadwick, concert overture, "Euterpe" (first time), directed by the composer; Berlioz, Cassandra's aria from "The Trojans"; Elgar, variations on an original theme, op. 36; songs with pianoforte; Borodin, Symphony in B minor (first time). The soloist will be Miss Marguerite Hall.

B. K.

MUSICAL.

Echoes from the 22d
Symphony Concert.

Strauss Will Lead the Orchestra Tuesday Evening.

Creator Tonight—Other
Coming Concerts.

Edo Nov 17 1904
The program of the 22d Symphony concert and rehearsal was notable for its massiveness and for the charm which comes to the student of music through considering superbly executed masterpieces. The only number which might be said to possess novelty was the beautifully impressive "Concert piece in D minor," composed by the eminent Scotch woman, Mme Helen Hopekirk, in Paris, in 1894, and given its first Boston hearing last week with the composer at the piano. The appearance of Mme Hopekirk as soloist was the signal for renewed assurances of Boston's great and increasing friendliness, and her reception was most flattering. The "concert piece" is the most pretentious of any of her compositions, her fame having hitherto been based mainly upon songs and piano pieces. It is of almost heroic mold, and is rarely poetic in the unfolding of a plaintive love melody, first outlined by the cellos and violas, accompanied in tender syncopation by the other strings. It gave the piano great opportunity for contrasts in phrasing, and for passages of uncommon sweetness and pathos, delightfully interpreted by the soloist.

Her second appearance on the program was in the weirdly beautiful Saint-Saens "Scherzo from the Concerto in G minor," first given in Boston at a concert of the Harvard musical association, Feb 3, 1876. It has been played at Symphony concerts before by Mme Szumowska, Seveking, Gebhard, Bendix and others, but surely never with more subtlety of feeling than was shown by Mme Hopekirk. Its main fault is that it is much too short. She certainly excels in breadth of interpretation. Her management of the scherzando and pizzicato passages was consummately artistic, and the conclusion of phrases was in every case a model of rhythmic contour. In color and singing quality of pianoforte playing she is in the pale of perfection, and is a performer of very large artistic stature.

She modestly shared with Mr Gericke the applause demonstrations at the close of each appearance; but could not be urged to play again, though her friends seemed insistent upon that point.

One of the most enjoyable of the program numbers was the extremely interesting "Unfinished Symphony," which its unfortunate author, Franz Schubert, never lived to hear performed. Attached to the name is a singular history of friendship, fidelity, and after-death justice to the composer, involving the names of Anslem and Joseph Huttenbrenner, Johann Herbeck and August Ludwig, who reverently finished the third movement of the symphony, for which Schubert had written only nine measures. It was first given 37 years after Schubert's death, at a Gesellschaft concert in Vienna, and has about it many suggestions of the representative compositions of the brilliant young Viennese genius. One of the most memorable things about it is the carrying of the haunting theme by violins in majestic unison with sobbing cello accompaniment. The oboe, clarinet and other wind instruments add to the enchantment of the measures, which are full to the brim of romantic melody; and which were given with exquisite spirit by the magnificent company of solo-performers under Mr Gericke's baton.

The effect of the close of the "andante con moto" movement, like a veritable voice from the dead composer's own heart, was rendered by the Symphony players, of indescribable pathos and power. Seldom has any offering had the poetic reading, or possessed the impressiveness of this present rendition of Schubert's melodious "unfinished" work.

The program began with a vivid and semibarbaric "Betrothed of the Tsar" overture by the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff, a musician admired by Liszt, Rubenstein and others, and still living in St Petersburg. It ended with the majestic "Rienzi" overture, which brought to the fore the local undeniable Wagnerian spirit, and which made a triumphant closing to a concert of unusual musical significance. It is familiar to many thousands. Who that has heard its on-sweeping flood of mellow harmony can forget it or its composer? It has been performed many times in Boston, but never with greater success, and never with more conscious power and orchestral earnestness. It was a noble climax to a splendid program.

For the 23d rehearsal and concert this week there will be given two "first-time" numbers, a concert-overture, "Euterpe," conducted by the composer, Mr Chadwick, and a Borodin symphony in B-minor. The program will also include Cassandra's aria from Berlioz' "Trojans" variations on an original theme by Elgar, and songs with piano accompaniment by Miss Marguerite Hall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1900-01.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in D major. (First time at these Concerts.)
DVOŘÁK.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN. (First time.)
JUL. ROENTGEN.	BALLAD on a Norwegian Folk Song. (First time.)
WAGNER.	OVERTURE, "Tannhauser."

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Violin Concerto.

considering superbly executed masterpieces. The only number which might be said to possess novelty was the beautifully impressive "Concert piece in D minor," composed by the eminent Scotch woman, Mme Helen Hopekirk, in Paris, in 1894, and given its first Boston hearing last week with the composer at the piano. The appearance of Mme Hopekirk as soloist was the signal for renewed assurances of Boston's great and increasing friendliness, and her reception was most flattering. The "concert piece" is the most pretentious of any of her compositions, her fame having hitherto been based mainly upon songs and piano pieces. It is of almost heroic mold, and is rarely poetic in the unfolding of a plaintive love melody, first outlined by the cellos and violas, accompanied in tender syncopation by the other strings. It gave the piano great opportunity for contrasts in phrasing, and for passages of uncommon sweetness and pathos, delightfully interpreted by the soloist.

Her second appearance on the program was in the weirdly beautiful Saint-Saens "Scherzo from the Concerto in G minor," first given in Boston at a concert of the Harvard musical association, Feb 3, 1876. It has been played at Symphony concerts before by Mme Szumowska, Seveking, Gebhard, Bendix and others, but surely never with more subtlety of feeling than was shown by Mme Hopekirk. Its main fault is that it is much too short. She certainly excels in breadth of interpretation. Her management of the scherzando and pizzicato passages was consummately artistic, and the conclusion of phrases was in every case a model of rhythmic contour. In color and singing quality of pianoforte playing she is in the pale of perfection, and is a performer of very large artistic stature.

She modestly shared with Mr Gericke the applause demonstrations at the close of each appearance; but could not be urged to play again, though her friends seemed insistent upon that point.

One of the most enjoyable of the program numbers was the extremely interesting "Unfinished Symphony," which its unfortunate author, Franz Schubert, never lived to hear performed. Attached to the name is a singular history of friendship, fidelity, and after-death justice to the composer, involving the names of Anselm and Joseph Huttenbrenner, Johann Herbeck and August Ludwig, who reverently finished the third movement of the symphony, for which Schubert had written only nine measures. It was first given 37 years after Schubert's death, at a Gesellschaft concert in Vienna, and has about it many suggestions of the representative compositions of the brilliant young Viennese genius. One of the most memorable things about it is the carrying of the haunting theme by violins in majestic unison with sobbing cello accompaniment. The oboe, clarinet and other wind instruments add to the enchantment of the measures, which are full to the brim of romantic melody; and which were given with exquisite spirit by the magnificent company of solo-performers under Mr Gericke's baton.

The effect of the close of the "andante con moto" movement, like a veritable voice from the dead com-

poser's own heart, was, as rendered by the Symphony players, of indescribable pathos and power. Seldom has any offering had the poetic reading, or possessed the impressiveness of this present rendition of Schubert's melodious "unfinished" work.

The program began with a vivid and semibarbaric "Betrothed of the Tsar" overture by the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff, a musician admired by Liszt, Rubenstein and others, and still living in St Petersburg. It ended with the majestic "Rienzi" overture, which brought to the fore the local undemable Wagnerian spirit, and which made a triumphant closing to a concert of unusual musical significance. It is familiar to many thousands. Who that has heard its on-sweeping flood of mellow harmony can forget it or its composer? It has been performed many times in Boston, but never with greater success, and never with more conscious power and orchestral earnestness. It was a noble climax to a splendid program.

For the 23d rehearsal and concert this week there will be given two "first-time" numbers, a concert-overture, "Euterpe," conducted by the composer, Mr Chadwick, and a Borodin symphony in B-minor. The program will also include Cassandra's aria from Berlioz' "Trojans" variations on an original theme by Elgar, and songs with piano accompaniment by Miss Marguerite Hall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1900-01.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in D major. (First time at these Concerts.)
DVOŘÁK.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN. (First time.)
JUL. ROENTGEN.	BALLAD on a Norwegian Folk Song (First time.)
WAGNER.	OVERTURE, "Tannhaueser."

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Violin Concerto.

SYMPHONY HALL

Tuesday evening, April 19, at 8 1904

The
Boston Symphony Orchestra

AND

Dr. Richard Strauss

By special arrangement of the
Pension Fund Committee

PROGRAMME

BEETHOVEN . . . . . Symphony No. 8

WAGNER . . . . . Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"

RICHARD STRAUSS . { Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
"Don Quixote"
Love Scene from "Feuersnot"

Tickets now on sale at Symphony Hall. $2, $1.50, and $1

229

SYMPHONY HALL

Tuesday evening, April 19, at 8 1904

The
Boston Symphony Orchestra

AND

Dr. Richard Strauss

By special arrangement of the
Pension Fund Committee

---

PROGRAMME

BEETHOVEN . . . . . Symphony No. 8

WAGNER . . . . . Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"

RICHARD STRAUSS . { Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
"Don Quixote"
Love Scene from "Feuersnot"

---

Tickets now on sale at Symphony Hall. $2, $1.50, and $1

PENSION FUND CONCERT A TREAT

Richard Strauss Makes His First Appearance as Conductor of Symphony Orchestra—Performance Was Triumph for All Participating

MR. GERICKE ALSO COMES IN FOR MUCH PRAISE

Work of the Orchestra Was Result of His Long and Arduous Labors in Bringing It to the Present State of Perfection.

Dr. Richard Strauss conducted last evening in Symphony Hall, by special arrangement of the Pension Fund committee, a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Don Juan".....R. Strauss
"Don Quixote".....R. Strauss
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....R. Strauss

The performance was as much of a triumph for Mr. Gericke and the players as it was for Dr. Strauss, composer and conductor. The supreme virtuoso qualities of the orchestra as a body, the remarkable euphony and the exquisite balance of timbres, the plasticity and the now instinctive phrasing—these characteristics that make the orchestra famous—are due to the artistry of the players, and, above all, to the discipline maintained for so many years by Mr. Gericke. He first established the brilliant reputation of the orchestra, and through his untiring vigilance this brilliance has been preserved of late years. Without his work in the past, Dr. Strauss' task last night would not have been so easy, nor would his triumph have been so assured.

It is well to remember this, for it is easy to forget it. We all, accustomed to the best, over familiar with it, are inclined to sigh for new readings, novel effects. We welcome that which has been hitherto unknown; we cherish it for a season; and then that, too, becomes stale. Conductors will in the flight of years come and have their little day; they will blaze and their light will go out or be forgotten. When the history of this orchestra will be written, the name of one conductor will be enduring, in the inseparable association with the name of Maj. Henry L. Higginson. Mr. Gericke will be remembered as the conductor who gave the orchestra the qualities that set it apart from other bands of players, who, by his taste, intelligence, skill and authority carried out fully and brilliantly the noble purposes of the founder and the maintainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The features of the concert were the prelude to "Tristan" and Strauss' "Don Juan." The Prelude was played with infinite yearning and splendid passion, and the performance of the tone-poem was distinguished by dash, brilliance, the demoniacal spirit that fired the breast of the pursuer of the ideal woman.

The performance of the symphony was not one of unusual merit. There might have been some curiosity as to the pace of the second and third movements under Dr. Strauss; but no sane person expected surprises in reading. For the music does not admit of marked surprises, and the conductor who should attempt to be revolutionary with this symphony would deservedly excite suspicion as to the sincerity of his art. Here and there Dr. Strauss made perhaps a nuance to which we were unaccustomed, but his reading as a whole was conventionally sound, and the music itself did not gain or suffer by any slight innovation.

Mr. Gericke took infinite pains this season in the rehearsal of "Don Quixote." The performance under his direction was masterly. The composition itself did not then appeal to us, either as programme music or as music without an explanatory text. The performance under Dr. Strauss was not in certain instances as memorable as that under Mr. Gericke, and it strengthened our opinion concerning the value of the work itself. There is a display of amazing technical ingenuity; there are startling orchestral effects; the variation that represents Don Quixote discoursing in lofty speech concerning the ideal is of rare power and beauty; but, on the other hand, much of the music is unintelligible without a text or tiresome with it.

"Don Quixote" is to us the least interesting and successful of Strauss' larger works, and the music belittles and degrades the finest gentleman in all fiction. Such was not probably the intention of the composer who wished to perpetrate a fantastically practical joke. Don Quixote in Cervantes' tale met with all manner of strange adventures; he was mocked and maltreated by worldly wise persons, by men and women of high and low degree; but the Don Quixote of the immortal romance is himself never ridiculous; he is enviably noble when he is most abused.

There was a very large audience and there was unbounded enthusiasm. Dr. Strauss was recalled again and again. The distinguished composer and conductor well deserved such honor. He shared the applause modestly with the orchestra and with Mr. Krasselt, whose cello playing in "Don Quixote" merited the public recognition.

RICHARD STRAUSS ACHIEVED A NOTABLE TRIUMPH

The most memorable event in the musical annals of Boston for many years past took place in Symphony Hall last night. The greatest orchestral master of the present, conducted a programme performed by the best orchestra of America, a fitting culmination of his tour in America, which, too pecuniary and mercenary in some of its aspects, deserved at least a magnificent climax.

The concert was given in aid of the pension fund of our orchestra, thus making the great triumph doubly welcome. A great and representative audience was present, in spite of the storm, and enthusiasm began and ended the concert at fever heat.

Already in the rehearsals there were inklings of the power of the conductor. His stopping the strings at a certain passage and saying:—"You play that finely;

RICHARD STRAUSS.

but a little too finely; I want some roughness here!"—revealed the virile conductor who was not likely to polish the strength of any composition into mere elegance. The jovial eighth symphony of Beethoven, the lightest-hearted of the 9, was a good revelation of the fact that the new path of this orchestral giant has not led him away from full appreciation of his classical predecessors.

When Beethoven was in his best mood he generally turned to the bassoon for his musical expression, and the eighth symphony may almost be called a bassoon concerto, so frequently does the clown of the orchestra appear in the foreground. The bassoonists, and in fact all of the players, performed their task well. But, while we appreciated the freedom and elasticity of the performance, it did not cause us to forget that our own conductor has given us very effective readings of this in the past.

Nor did the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude efface the memory of Mr. Gericke's Wagnerian readings in recent days. Dr. Strauss' innovations in the symphony were chiefly in the line of virility and emphasis; there may be two opinions about his tempo in the Minuet.

But when it came to the conductor's own works a revelation began! "Don Juan" is one of the most vivid proofs of Strauss' genius. When we bear in mind the fact that the work was written before the composer was 25 years old, that he had already created several compositions in the strict classical forms, as well as a modern symphonic poem on Italy, and that he had already begun to hew out a new path with such a work as "Macbeth," one is astounded at the fertility and power of the master. His works have absolutely refuted Wagner's statement that Beethoven had reached the limits of instrumental music.

Yet "Don Juan" can by no means be ranked with its companion work (produced at the same epoch) "Death and Transfiguration." It sounds more fragmentary and its subject is less lofty. It is not Da Ponte's "Don Giovanni" who is here pictured, but a more erratic party, by Lenau; a philosophic German lover who seeks an ideal in womanhood, even at the risk of ruining his health. He is not finally seized by the fiend, but achieves what a Heidelberg student would call "Haarweh" (hair-ache) and a moral "Katzenjammer" that finally carries him off.

The work is a strange mingling of bitter and sweet, enthusiasm and disgust, but the whole picture is scarcely worth the painting. In the matter of motif-treatment Strauss is monarch of all he surveys, but the figures that he invents are by no means so full of meaning as those of Wagner. Compare, for example, the "Siegfried" figure with the figure by which Strauss represents a hero in "Heldenleben" and our meaning will be very clear.

The figures of "Don Juan" are not in themselves graphic or striking. The tender oboe theme is the most melodic part of the work. It was most artistically played. We may not hazard a guess of what it means, for Strauss' works are a fine example of the vagueness of programme music, even when at its best and highest. Some of the most careful critics have dilated with the wrong emotion in commenting upon them.

Wild recalls followed the completion of the work, everybody acting as if he understood and loved it!

"Don Quixote" came to us as something new, something infinitely more powerful than we had conceived of.

The former suspicion that Strauss had not perceived the inner dignity of the chivalric character, at once vanished; he has given us the Don of Cervantes, the figure that is semi-pathetic in the midst of its droll situations. The sweet tenderness of the violoncello solo, when the knight's mind has cleared, is a sympathetic touch that removes all thought of mere farcical representation, and Mr. Krasselt played the cello obbligato as if inspired by the presence of the composer.

When the composer translates it, the work speaks an intelligible language to the layman, and to the trained musician it presents a score that simply astounds. What an amount of subdivision of parts! Wagner's "Waldesweben" seems simple beside it! The muted brasses of all kinds, with their bleatings, the frequent and characteristic use of English horn, the strong touches of contra-bassoon and Bass Clarinet—one cannot enumerate the many strong colors of this orchestral jungle, which yet has design back of its luxuriance.

But 2 points may be lingered upon; the personification of the Don and Sancho Panza by violoncello and viola; and the scoring of the Ride through the Air. The use of the viola for Sancho is almost a new discovery in tone-color. Mr. Zach deserves praise for his performance on the instrument. Hitherto the viola, used obbligato, has represented melancholy; but Strauss gives us the instrument in an entirely new role, that of blunt and honest rusticity. We are not quite prepared to accept this as the spirit of the viola, although it must be confessed that it makes an excellent foil to the 'cello in this picture, and particularly in the dialogues.

The ride through the air brings in a totally new instrument, a "wind-machine"! This is a large wooden cylinder like a very thick grind-stone, and is turned with a crank; it has a serrated edge, over which heavy canvas is stretched. In the score this is notated on a single note, a long trill on small C, but practically, as one turns quicker and quicker it goes higher and higher, giving the wildest pipings; and when, as in this case, three tones(?) are assisted by the fiercest chromatic scales played upon flutes and piccolo in the highest register, "mit flatterzunge" (a tremolo effect) and with bold glissando effects on the harp, pandemonium is indeed broke loose;—and yet the picture of the aerial journey is graphically set forth.

We begin to think that if Richard Strauss has tried to picture the Day of Judgment, as Berlioz did, he would have succeeded even better than the Frenchman with his 16 kettle-drums. To properly score a great noise requires orchestral skill, but to have it as graphic as this, is Genius!

And all the humor of it came bubbling forth, as much of a revelation as when the master gave us "Till Eulenspiegel" a short time ago. Few composers are great directors, but Strauss is a giant in both directions. Nevertheless it is as well to remember that the furious and numerous rehearsals of "Don Quixote," a few weeks ago, had very much to do with the marvellous interpretation of last night. It is a great thing to have a virtuoso come along and give us star performances upon our orchestra. But at such times we are apt to forget who made the instrument! Nevertheless Dr. Strauss (and Mrs. Krasselt, and Mr. Zach) deserved the applause that followed the work, and the composer must have been satisfied both with his performers and his public.

The Love Scene, from "Feuersnot," is a less involved matter than the 2 works above described. It is more direct and works up to a more easily-comprehended climax. While we do not believe Richard Strauss the greatest interpreter of Passion in tones (and this may account for some of the defects of "Don Juan") he is certainly a great master of the art of Climax. Only Beethoven and Wagner, in such works as the finale of the 7th symphony or of "Tristan and Isolde," have achieved such superb, long-breathed and mighty crescendo passages.

The recalls at the close were beyond ordinary Boston enthusiasm; shouts and hurrahs greeted the composer as he bowed his thanks.

It certainly was a memorable performance of some astonishing music, but the critic may still say (regarding these tonal labyrinths) with the cautious Scotchman—"I hae my doots!" Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Dr. Richard Strauss

Bostonians seized eagerly on the opportunity to swell the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time to hear the famous Dr. Richard Strauss conduct our Symphony players. A vast crowd of most distinguished-looking persons came to the hall yesterday, where, in the course of the evening, there was a good deal of enthusiasm. On the whole, however, the occasion was perhaps not as brilliant as had been anticipated.

The programme, at the very start, caused disappointment. Beginning with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," it ended with three pieces by Dr. Strauss himself: the tone poem, "Don Juan," the "Don Quixote" variations and the love scene from "Feuersnot." The Wagner prelude would do very well, for, although everyone knows it by heart, it may be played in various ways, as the conductor chooses. Yesterday, in fact, it was the gem of the evening, for, from Dr. Strauss, the music moved along with a melodic grace that it does not always possess, and yet its character was more powerfully passion-tossed than it often is from conductors who, so far as in them lies, ignore Wagner's melody. Richard Strauss's was, indeed, a moving, overwhelming interpretation. But of the Beethoven symphony Dr. Strauss made comparatively little. The Eighth Symphony, however, offers small field to a conductor, for there is hardly more than one way to read it; any other symphony of Beethoven, therefore, would have been more interesting at last night's concert than the Eighth, which we are by way of hearing admirably performed as frequently as is necessary.

When it came to the Strauss pieces the choice was still disappointing, for people had so firmly fixed their hearts on hearing the "Heldenleben" or "Zarathustra" from the composer that they were exceedingly ill-content when the programme was announced. A few weeks ago, when "Don Quixote" was produced here, the work seemed exceedingly weak, an exhibition of amazing ingenuity and extraordinary cleverness put to a poor purpose. Last night, from Mr. Strauss, the composition seemed more trivial than before, because Mr. Gericke, by a certain breadth of performance, smoothed over many vulgar places so successfully that they seemed quite worth while. Last night the musical poverty of the work stood boldly forth, and it seemed as though "Don Quixote" would never come to an end.

Of far more moment was the "Don Juan" poem, which we first heard here a season or so ago. To a listener purposely unprepared with any programme notes, the poem made a most beautiful musical impression, although it might as well have been called by no name at all as "Don Juan"; for their full understanding, Richard Strauss's orchestral works must be furnished with a distinct programme. As a tone poem, however, of regular form, in a certain number of distinct episodes, all leading up to a grand climax that seemed less grand than it did two or so years back, "Don Juan" left behind it a memory of beautiful music. The most striking feature of the performance was its clarity; from the composer, the music seemed obvious and inevitable.

At the end of the long programme came the "Feuersnot" excerpt, which was perplexing because it sounded so much less brilliant than when it was played here two years ago. Trans. Apr 20 1904 R. R. G.

STRAUSS DRAWS AS CONDUCTOR

B. Journal 10 April 1904

At Symphony Hall last evening a concert was given for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Richard Strauss conducted and this was the program:

Symphony No. 8, in F major..... Beethoven
Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"..... Wagner
Tone Poem, "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," Love Scene from "Feuersnot"..... Richard Strauss

The long desired came to pass, and the great hall was filled with a splendid gathering of Boston's musical best to see and hear it. Richard Strauss conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not only that, but some of his own compositions were played. And therein lay the great, the compelling charm of the concert. For the Beethoven Eighth Symphony, that gay exponent of all that is fair and sweet in life, has been better given by other conductors. There was apparent at once, it is true, a more virile and impetuous reading, which made the first movement rather more interesting than usual; but after that not so much can be said. The allegretto, with its dainty, incessant rhythm, was beautifully interpreted, but the third, or minuet, movement was ragged, and several individual players went wrong, most noticeably the first horn. And in both this and the last movement, while there was solidity and a certain strenuousness, it was at the expense of beauty and clearness, and surely this particular symphony demands both, if it demands anything. Honor where honor is due. Mr. Gericke, who often fails to bring out the strength and emotional fire there is in a piece, need fear nothing in comparison as a reader of Beethoven.

Exhilaration in the Extreme.

With the "Tristan" prelude came an intensity of passion and an enormous power in the orchestra that were exhilarating in the extreme. But here, as in the symphony, the thumpings of the kettle drummer—not the regular player, but the man who ruined so many things under Paur by his inordinate banging—was too sadly in evidence. This man and others should remember that a kettle drum is a musical instrument, with a definite pitch, and not a mere barrel head upon which to pound and rattle.

In the field of Richard Strauss' own works there was nothing left to desire. Here was the best orchestra of America playing as the greatest living composer wished it to play, and the result was fine and thrilling. With the first bars of the "Don Juan" tone poem, that bravely suggestive epitome of the life of the prince of rakes, it was evident that the Strauss music was being given as it should be. The broad and sensuous sweep of melody and the marvelous coloring of the varied elements of the work came forth from the players as never before. Surely it is worth while to get these things at first hand.

"Don Quixote" a Masterpiece.

The "Don Quixote" fantasy, which we heard by the same orchestra in February, seems more human and comprehensible at its second performance. At any rate, its beauty now overbalances the weirdness of many of its thematic developments, and it stands forth a masterpiece of its kind. Whether sweeps are legitimate subjects for musical expression or not, matters very little. The fact that here, in its completeness, is a most wonderful and fascinating tone-picture is sufficient answer to any minor criticism. No one but a colossal genius could have written this "Don Quixote," and no one but a master could have conducted it with the authority and the knowledge that Richard Strauss displayed last night.

There was plenty of breadth and strength in the love scene from "Feuersnot," with which the concert ended, and it was played by the Symphony men in a way that must have surprised themselves. For once the brasses out with tremendous power, and concertgoers rubbed their eyes.

The piece is not especially great in thematic material, but it is undoubtedly stirring; the magnificent performance it
had doubtless gave it every advantage.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CHADWICK,	CONCERT OVERTURE, "Euterpe." (First performance.) Conducted by the Composer.
BRUCH,	ARIA from "Odysseus."
ELGAR,	VARIATIONS on an Original Theme, op. 36. Mr. H. G. TUCKER at the Organ.
J. S. BACH,	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
FRANZ,	"If thou thy Heart bestowest."
MENDELSSOHN,	"In Autumn."
	"Spring Song."
VOLKMANN,	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 1, op. 44. I. Allegro patetico. II. Andante. III. Scherzo: Allegro non troppo. Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss MARGUERITE HALL.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

themselves. For once the brasses
 e out with tremendous power, and concertgoers rubbed their eyes.
 he piece is not especially great in thematic material, but it is undoubtedly stirring; the magnificent performance it
 had doubtless gave it every advantage.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CHADWICK,	CONCERT OVERTURE, "Euterpe." (First performance.) Conducted by the Composer.
BRUCH,	ARIA from "Odysseus."
ELGAR,	VARIATIONS on an Original Theme, op. 36. Mr. H. G. TUCKER at the Organ.
J. S. BACH,	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
FRANZ,	"If thou thy Heart bestowest."
MENDELSSOHN,	"In Autumn."
	"Spring Song."
VOLKMANN,	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 1, op. 44. I. Allegro patetico. II. Andante. III. Scherzo: Allegro non troppo. Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss MARGUERITE HALL.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The next to last Symphony concert of the season was held in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening. Miss Marguerite Hall was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Chadwick: Concert Overture, "Euterpe."
(First performance.)
Conducted by the Composer.
Bruch: Aria from "Odysseus."
Elgar: Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.
Mr. H. G. Tucker at the organ.
Songs with Pianoforte—
J. S. Bach: "If thou thy heart bestowest."
Franz: "In Autumn."
Mendelssohn: "Spring Song."
Volkman: Symphony in D minor, No. 1, Op. 44.

Although the concert was depressingly dull, the cause of the lack of interest would not be easy to discover. The programme, to be sure, proved by no means exciting, but the root of the evil must have lurked farther back than the programme, for from the very first moment the audience was apathetic. As the evening wore on the atmosphere got murkier and deader; nothing went.

In such an environment Mr. Chadwick's overture, "Euterpe," failed to make a deep impression. As the work of Mr. Chadwick, it could not, of course, be other than effectively planned, skilfully executed and orchestrated with a glowing array of tone colors. In itself, however, the overture did not seem interesting, although it was agreeable at the present time to hear a new composition that is mere music, pure and simple, with no suggestion of philosophy to be expounded or a landscape to be painted.

For the second time this year on Saturday Mr. Gericke practised the innovation of repeating a new work in the course of the same season. The custom is surely an excellent one, but yet we might have been spared further acquaintance with Mr. Elgar's fourteen friends, whom he has sketched in the symphonic variations, for, with the exception of the pretty Dorabella, a more colorless company of persons were never gathered together. Like Henry James's later creations, these friends of Mr. Elgar confine themselves to remarking, "You are wonderful!" or even the less complicated, "A hot day, sir," with so intricate a system of shrugs and meaning looks that one fancies such conversation must be singularly significant, had one only the intelligence to fathom it. More likely, though, it is quite as commonplace as it sounds, in the case of both Mr. James and Mr. Elgar.

The music of the evening that had most appearance of life was the Volkmann symphony, but by the time of night when it began (in reality not very late) most people were too much influenced by the prevailing mood greatly to enjoy it. The gloom, by the way, was not lightened by the presence of Miss Marguerite Hall. Although Miss Hall is held in high esteem by many people as a singer of songs, her warmest admirers could hardly think her suited either in voice or temperament, to sing a dramatic aria in Symphony Hall. Miss Hall's man also cannot in justice be allowed pass unmentioned.

This week the Symphony concerts will end for the season. The programme of the last concert will consist of Tchaikowsky's Manfred symphony, with excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung."

R. R. G.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick—Concert Overture, "Euterpe" (first performance), conducted by the composer.
Bruch—Aria from "Odysseus," Miss Marguerite Hall.
Elgar—Variations on an original theme, op. 36, Mr. H. G. Tucker at the organ.
Songs With Pianoforte.
J. S. Bach—"If Thou Thy Heart Bestowest."
Franz—"In Autumn."
Mendelssohn—"Spring Song."
Miss Hall.

Volkman—Symphony in D minor, No. 1, op. 44.

Mr. Chadwick seems to be serving up the muses, one by one, in overture form. He has given us a superb "Melpomene," a dashing "Thalia," and at this concert presented a rather conservative and contrapuntal "Euterpe." We shall await the coming of "Terpsichore" with interest. Euterpe, muse of lyric poetry, was generally represented by the ancients holding a flute, but the American composer did not give her too much of the sentimental tube.

The work was scored for classical orchestra, with trombones and tuba, and called for neither a wind-machine nor a dynamite bomb. It was sane and well-constructed music. The chief theme and its subordinate were well-contrasted, and worked up in effective double counterpoint. The subordinate theme was a pleasing cantilena for the violins. It was not a very exciting work as a whole, but contained some ingenious subtleties.

Mr. Chadwick was greeted with much applause when he took the conductor's stand and recalled at the end of the overture. He led it with authority and effect; yet we should have been glad to have had one of his more fiery compositions in a concert that leaned heavily towards conservatism.

His "Vagrom Ballad" would have been an excellent counterpoise to the Volkmann Symphony, and it would have shown that this musician can make as much racket and be as thoroughly unconventional as any discomposer of the most modern school of musical trouble.

Miss Marguerite Hall's voice has gained greatly in recent years, but it is not yet of the proportions demanded by a symphonic concert. She was over-weighted by the woes of the lugubrious Penelope, but did better work in the subsequent lieder, which were accompanied by Mr. Zach, although these, also, would have been better in a smaller hall.

It was pleasant to find a Franz song on a programme again. Robert Franz ought not to be crowded out even by the beautiful modulations of a Richard Strauss, when it comes to the song repertoire. Franz is poetic, melodic, and yet his ideas are always highly developed. We wish that the artists of the present would occasionally put a Franz "lied" in juxtaposition with some of the modern songs so much in vogue.

Miss Hall also sang a "Spring-song." "Never speak of hemp in the house of one who has been hanged," says an old proverb; do not sing about Spring in Boston this year!

We were glad to hear the Elgar variations again. We spoke of them as great music on the occasion of their first performance, and we can only reiterate our view after a second hearing. They are not equal, there is some padding, but as a whole the set is the best orchestral music that has yet come to us from England. The climax, in which the organ appears (the instrument was well played by Mr. H. G. Tucker) is especially effective.

Volkman's first symphony is but a moon to Schumann's sun. Poor Volkman's metal was refined in the crucible of adversity, but it has not proved to be valuable gold. In the symphony there is much reiteration, an exasperating use of sequences and scales, and when, at the very end, a majestic climax is reached, it is too late to make the work successful.

The symphony is sombre, too, and coming after Penelope's wails and a brooding "Autumn," it seemed as if there was an intention to cast a gloom over the community. Judging by the early exodus it succeeded in doing so. A word of praise should be spoken regarding the excellent clarinette playing. Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL.

Last but One of the
Symphony Concerts.

Always-Welcome "Pops" Soon to Begin Again.

People's Choral Union Concert Tonight.

Mr George W. Chadwick conducted his new overture, "Euteope," at last week's Symphony concerts, and Miss Margaret Hall sang an excerpt from "Odysseus," by Bruch, and songs by Bach, Franz and Mendelssohn. Elgar's variations on an original theme and the D minor symphony by Volkmann completed the program. Mr Chadwick's composition is in the same style as his previous overtures titled after the Muses and is a very pleasing piece of a classic nature. He has not attempted the ultra modern in his orchestration, for there are themes developed and modulations effected without resorting to dissonants and the forte effects are worked up sans a chaos of passages so much affected by composers of the present day. The instrumentation is thoroughly good, elaborate without being particularly difficult, and the subject is treated in a poetic and generally blithesome manner, the alleged contrasting elements in Euteope's make-up being pleasingly shown in the various musical expressions indicated in the score. The piece was very well played under the direction of the popular composer who was most cordially received.

Miss Hall sang admirably, although her opening number, Penelope's recitative and aria from "Odysseus," was not very interesting and the fair singer's voice was void of the sepulchral quality necessary to make the Bruch selection very effective. So far as expression, purity of tone and execution are considered she was satisfactory, and if she had chosen some other classic and less dramatic aria doubtless the majority of her auditors would have been much better pleased.

The Bach and Franz songs, too, were of a somber cast, though being less tragic than Penelope's wail, Miss Hall's voice showed to better advantage, the demands upon the lower contralto register being lighter. Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" was given with a delicacy and finesse that were charming. Miss Hall was greeted with much applause at the close of the group of songs. The orchestra accompanied the "Odysseus" number and Mr Zach assisted at the piano in the trio of selections.

The Elgar variations were given for the second time this season and, as before, the "Dorabella" intermezzo with its bewitching mute passages on the violins proved to be the most acceptable of the 14 varieties of individual tone pictures. Mr Krasselt's cello work in the 12th movement is also deserving of favorable mention.

The program closed with Volkmann's D minor symphony, in which there are so many reiterated passages in three of the movements that the work sounds monotonous, despite its vivid and strenuous instrumental colorings in spots. The second is interesting, possibly by contrast with the other movements, and the themes are acceptable to the ear and very cleverly arranged for illustration by the different groups of instruments. But as a whole the work doesn't appear to be inspired and its reception by the audience was very lukewarm.

The last concert and rehearsal of the season will take place this week with Tschaiowsky's "Manfred" symphony and selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" announced as the program numbers.

NEW OVERTURE BY CHADWICK

"Euterpe" Given Its First Performance at the 23d Symphony Concert Last Evening, with the Composer Conducting.

B Herald Phil Apr 24 1904

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture—Euterpe.....Chadwick
(First performance.)
Penelope's Recitation and Prayer from "Odysseus".....Bruck
Variations on an original theme.....Edgar Songs—Bach's "If Thou Thy Heart Bestowest," Franz's "In Autumn," Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," Symphony No. 1 in D minor.....Volkmann

Mr. Chadwick conducted his overture, which was composed at West Chop last summer. The work will not enlarge his reputation, for it is not conspicuously imaginative or brilliant; it has rather the character of a well made "occasional" overture; but it is significant in this respect—it is straightforward music, without any programme in a period when young as well as more experienced composers would fain translate books, dramas, pictures, statues, all shapes and forms of nature into music, whether they themselves have imagination, moods, sensitiveness, subtle appreciation, or whether they are simply musicians so thoroughly grounded in routine that they stray only with difficulty from the beaten path.

Mr. Hicks, the eminent dry-salter in one of Thackeray's Christmas Books, in his youth wrote poems after the manner of Byron: "The Death Shriek," "The Fireship of Botzaris"; he then became philosophical and wrote an epic, "Idiosyncrasy in 40 books, quarto; and then he turned to the classics and published his "Pæseidon" and "Hephaestus." He wrote poems that contained everything but poetry. And so we find today young Englishmen writing musical works after "Manfred" and Walt Whitman; Germans putting the characteristics of Bismarck and Brahms into music, thus hoping to excite an interest by means of material other than musical. Nor is Mr. Chadwick given, like John Ford, to "doleful dumps." He realizes that music may well be the expression of joy and optimism as well as a dismal science or the accentuation of some phase of mental gloom or the narration in tones of some fantastically hideous vice or crime. When a man has the rare talent of a Loeffler, a Richard Strauss, a Debussy, he can well afford to be fantastical. But there are men who, instead of being inoffensive and sleep-inducing in the field of chamber music, must needs be amateurs in gory and hideous musical crime. Mr. Chadwick has shown that he can be nobly tragic; witness his "Melpomene" overture. His "Euterpe" is an essay in cheerfulness.

Elgar's Variations sketch the idiosyncrasies of 14 of his friends, to whom we were introduced in Symphony Hall last December. The friends for the most part do not improve on acquaintance. They are still boresome. The men tell dull stories, or in their wilder moments play Russian backgammon or jackstraws. But Dorabella is still fresh, piquant, with a suggestion of French daintiness and coquetry.

The symphony by Volkmann is an earnest work, one that is not without a certain interest to all those who are acquainted with his life of disappointment and poverty, and there are pages in it that may well be respected; but the work, as a whole, is not of the first rank, nor has it the elements of continuous popularity.

Miss Hall sang the lament that Bruch put into the mouth of Penelope, the woman still famous for her fidelity to the absent Ulysses, although the suitors—there were at least 118 of them—were indefatigable in attention. She is still famous, and yet centuries ago scandal-mongers were busy with her name, and some said that she was the mother of Pan by all the wooers and parasites. Bruch's music is not dramatic, and Miss Hall, who is seldom, if ever, dramatic, did not vitalize the written notes. She was a little more successful with the group of songs, although Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" was last night ironical, for, as Coleridge remarked of another region: "The spring comes slowly up this way."

All in all, the concert was not an interesting one.

for PIANOFORTE, in E r. , op. 5.

i.—Allegro ma non troppo
gro vivace.—Trio I.—Trio II.
ssivo.
vivace.

1 Boston.)

A major, op. 45.
n Boston).

No. 2, in C major, op. 61.
so.—Allegro.

ist:

DOHNANYI.

is a Steinway.

1 Concert next week.

240

241

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1903-04.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

"MANFRED," SYMPHONY after Byron's Dramatic Poem. op. 58.

I. MANFRED'S WANDERINGS AND DESPAIR.

Lento lugubre,

Moderato con moto.

Andante.

Andante con duolo.

II. THE FAIRY OF THE ALPS.

Vivace con spirito.

Trio: L'Istesso tempo.

III. PASTORALE: Andante con moto.

IV. THE PALACE OF ARIMANES; INVOCATION TO ASTARTE;

MANFRED'S DEATH.

Allegro con fuoco.

Andante con duolo.

Tempo primo.

Largo.

---

WAGNER,

SELECTIONS from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

(Arranged by HANS RICHTER.)

WAGNER,

KAISERMARSCH.

242

Symphony Hall.

---

Twenty-Fourth Season, 1904-1905.

---

The Boston
Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

Opening Concert,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, 1904.

243

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. May 2, 1904

Tschaikowsky.....Manfred Symphony
Wagner.....Selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" (Hans Richter's Arrangement.)
Wagner.....Kaisermarsch

It was a great and memorable concert. There was no soloist and therefore our orchestra and its director won all the laurels. Mr. Gericke's desk had been decorated with flowers and when he appeared the audience gave him a prolonged ovation, as if to thank him for all that he has done for our orchestral music. And few can fully understand how great these services have been.

Granting any limitations that are charged against him, he has made our orchestra something unparalleled, something that would have been deemed impossible a generation ago; and the performance of last night proved the standard of the organization. Even with the defection of a couple of wind-instrument players of importance, the interpretations were almost flawless.

No man, we believe, understands Symphony Hall quite as thoroughly as Mr. Gericke, and he avoids its defects (for it has grave shortcomings) with consummate skill. One may remember Mr. Gericke's acoustical improvements in our old Music Hall, culminating in the addition of a sounding-board.

It might be well if he were given "carte blanche" to make a few experiments in Symphony Hall, and had a sum of money placed at his disposal for this purpose. It is almost certain that, with his exceptionally keen ear, and his intelligent devices, he would improve the hall up to the excellence of the old Music Hall, if not beyond it.

The concert of Saturday was modern in the best sense. It presented great orchestral numbers without distressing puzzles and dissonances. It was lofty, not turgid. It seems wonderful how "Manfred" appeals to foreign nations after the poet's own country has outgrown it! It required a Tschaikowsky or a Schumann to translate it into tones. If we could have a combination of the 2 composers we would have an ideal musical interpretation of Byron's thought.

Tschaikowsky evidently tries here to do with instruments what others have done with voices. We have "Songs without Words," in music, why not also a "Cantata without words?" As usual, the Russian makes most of his chief effects with the wind instruments. The orchestra is about like that which Beethoven uses in the finale of his Ninth Symphony, except that a bass clarinet is there instead of a contra-bassoon, and bell and gong also toll forth, while there are a few bars of organ music at the close.

Its very beginning is impressive. The lugubrious Manfred theme, the mutterings of the deep wind instruments, seem "big with Fate." Then come climaxes of tremendous force, even "ffff" appearing more than once. Manfred's sorrows can be heard a long distance off; they could wake up an entire county.

Yet the work could stand as music, without a programme. The tender melody upon the muted violins,—"Astarte,"—would charm without a label. Or, if programme there must be, a mere recital of names would be sufficient to make the work intelligible. For example "Manfred and Astarte," "The Water-witch," "The Mountaineers," and "The Hall of Ahrimanes" would be sufficient to tell the tale, and there would be no need of learned commentary and analysis to come rumbolling after.

The picture of the Witch of the Alps is a beautiful piece of orchestration. Tschaikowsky is strong just where Schumann is weak. Schumann could give no subtleties of scoring; his tone-colors were primitive. But his melody descriptive of that is an inspiration, and if it is only a violin tune, it so admirably tells its story that a whole orchestra could not improve upon it. But Tschaikowsky gives to us an iridescent picture with a gossamer web sort of ending that is an orchestral masterpiece, and our players performed it in a manner to make the most "blase" critic sit up.

"Beautiful spirit with thy hair of light,
And dazzling eyes of glory,"

The movement picturing the mountaineers was full of brusque contrast between the healthy rusticity of the peasants and the morbid brooding of Manfred—English born chiefly for the first and muted horns for the last. The rough dance theme was too refined; it might have been made far more uncouth and emphatic.

Why there should be a "Soiree Dansante" in liades, we cannot discover. It gave an exciting picture, but one which we cannot find in Byron's conception of Ahrimanes. But Ortrud, our pagan friend from Brabant, had evidently arrived in the nether world, for her motive was prominent. A masterly movement, in short, which contradicted Byron. That both Schumann and Tschaikowsky should end this work with a religious thought is a "most lame and impotent conclusion"! The good old Abbot in the poem says that Manfred is gone—

"Whither I dread to think; but he is gone!"

Whereupon Schumann adds a very ugly double canon with requiem words, and Tschaikowsky introduces the organ with religious fervor.

The performance was speedily recognized at its high worth by the audience (even the bell was in tune and effective), and the applause was most sincere and intense.

Then came Wagner, not a bit weakened by the long symphony. It was well played, although Siegfried had a little trouble with his horn, and we object to the mis-translation of "Siegfried's Trip up the Rhine" as being too suggestive of a "Cookie" excursion.

Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" does not grow upon repeated hearing. We feel that the master's grandiose ideas sometimes went over the border-line and became bombastic. Thus it was with all his marches, although the "Huldigungsmarsch" sins less in this respect, and thus it is with some of the "Parsifal" effects, which are just now accepted in America as the acme of music. At the close the public again thanked Mr. Gericke by long and loud applause, and a recall to the stage.

Louis C. Elson.

MAY 1, 1904.

ORCHESTRA CLOSSES ITS 23D SEASON

Boston's Incomparable Band at Its Best Through Tschaikowsky's Manfred Symphony.

THE REISENAUER RECITAL

Program Unsatisfactory to Average
Listener—Many Numbers
Superbly Played.

For its twenty-fourth and last of this season's concerts, the Symphony program was this:

"Manfred," Symphony, Op. 58, after Byron's dramatic poem.....Tschaikowsky Selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
"The Emperor's March".....Wagner

The season ended with a musical cheer, a vast shout of triumph, for Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," spite of its strain of the circus and its suspicion of bombast, is a very effective cry of patriotic fervor. And the rest of the concert was somewhat in the same mood, for even the "Manfred" symphony, spite of its gloom, is after all, the tense and passionate victory of a soul over death and despair.

This same "Manfred" poem naturally inspired the somber Russian with a desire to set his wanderings and his maunderings to music. Byron's pessimistic and mournful hero is not altogether genuine, as we look at these things nowadays. He struts and poses in his theatrical despair, and comes perilously near the line of burlesque. But Tschaikowsky did not see him thus, for his music is thrilling and powerful and sincere.

To be sure, there is little of the terrible personal sadness of the great Sixth Symphony; even Tschaikowsky is, in this work, here and there melodramatic and turgid, as if, contrary to his own knowledge, the Byronic touch affected him.

But, on the whole, here is great and lasting music. The mournful first movement, with its delirious cry for forgetfulness; the exquisitely beautiful and characteristic melody of the second theme of the Alpine music; the brooding to nature in the pastora, and the wild riot of the scene in the hall of Arimanes, with its ending of solemn majesty as Manfred's soul speeds to the unknown, are all very typical of the wonderful Russian if not at all times his best product. The playing was admirable; rarely has Mr. Gericke so enthusiastically entered into a performance, and rarely has he let his orchestra "go" with such abandon. The effect was exhilarating, and the audience was quick to respond to it.

With great breadth and beauty were read the "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung" selections also, and though we have heard all this very recently, there is no satiety in music of such superb coloring and suggestive themes. In the face of its nobility and haunting call to the imagination there are few indeed who can remain unmoved.

Thus endeth the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one that has not been brilliant, as a whole, but in the main interesting and profitable.

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSSES.

The 23d Symphony season closed last night with the following program: "Manfred," a dramatic symphony by Tschaikowsky, and selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," and "The Emperor's March," the latter three by Wagner. A substantial and dignified finale, which gave the orchestra plenty of work without the relief of a solo contribution, a somewhat infrequent occurrence, as a score of soloists have appeared at these concerts this season. Wagner, preceded by Tschaikowsky, did not make a very good contrast, and doubtless some lighter composition played between would have been acceptable to the majority of the patrons; but four compositions of this importance are not frequently given on one program, and so anyone who really appreciates music of the modern and advanced style could find but little fault with the combination.

Tschaikowsky's great "Manfred" symphony, which he considered his best orchestral work, illustrates vividly characteristics of Byron's dramatic poem, the themes are wonderfully suggestive of phases and incidents in Manfred's turbulent career and the scoring is tremendous in its scope. The first movement, with its weird, uncanny phrases, was played with splendid spirit and power, and the "Fairies of the Alps" scene, an immensely difficult and ingenious piece of orchestration, although severely testing the abilities of the various contingents, was given about as smoothly as if the composition was much simpler in construction. The violins deserve special mention for their harmonious work. In the "Pastorale" the sharp contrasts were beautifully shown, the heavier instruments making the most of their opportunities in the shepherd dance, and in the "Bacchanal," fantastic and irregular in rhythm, the full band was heard in one of the finest pieces of ensemble work of the season. The climax was unusually effective.

The selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," although played admirably, lost somewhat in impressiveness by reason of the powerful number which preceded them. The "Emperor's March" received vigorous and sympathetic treatment.

The summary of the works performed at these concerts is given in the last program as usual and of the 112 compositions Beethoven leads with eight to his credit. Brahms has seven, Mendelssohn and Wagner six each, Saint Saens and Liszt five each and Tschaikowsky four. Twenty-one works were performed for the first time in Boston, of which those by Chadwick, Stoube and Arbos were given for the first time anywhere.

Twenty soloists appeared, Messrs T. Adamowski, Arbos, Krasselt and Blinbaum of the orchestra being of the number, with Mr. Zach set down in the summary as piano accompanist for five singers. The solos were apportioned among seven vocalists and 13 instrumentalists. The 24th season will open Oct 14-15. Globe May 1 1904

SYMPHONY SEASON BROUGHT TO CLOSE

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" and Selections from Wagner's "Ring" Attract a Great Audience at the Farewell Concert.

MR. GERICKE GIVEN
REPEATED OVATIONS

Orchestra Is the Work of His Hands and Its Reputation for Technical Proficiency and Uncommon Euphony Is Enhanced.

Herald May 1, 1904.

The programme of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

"Manfred," symphony.....Tschaikowsky
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung".....Wagner
"Emperor's March".....Wagner

Balakireff suggested Byron's "Manfred" to Tschaikowsky as a subject for a symphonic poem. He had suggested it to Berlioz, who shrank from the labor on account of his age and infirmities. Balakireff made out a programme with instructions, even about tonalities to be chosen, and about the manner of notation; and then he calmly added: "The subject does not suit my own inner disposition."

Tschaikowsky found the task of composition a hard one. He sweated drops of blood. He wished to put it aside forever; yet there was a fascination, and there was a time when he felt himself a Manfred.

Byron's hero does not appeal to us of this day as it did to the romantic world in which he sulked and scowled. His period was more impressionable. Hazlitt wrote "Manfred is merely himself, with a fancy drapery on;" but the man Byron was not dismissed so lightly by the essayist, who thought him worthy of a long and labored attack. The "noble Lord" not only influenced such men as Maturin and his Melmoth; he was taken seriously by Goethe; nor did Henley exaggerate when he characterized this "lovely and tremendous and transcending genius of revolt" as "one of the greatest elemental forces ever felt in literature."

Henley fought for Byron and now Mr. Chesterton, with that love of paradox which would have made him a glorious member of the pirate crew of Penzance, writes entertainingly of Byron's optimism. It would no doubt be better for us all if we read Byron, but Manfred and Childe Harold and Lara and the rest of them have joined Melmoth and Werther and the stranger and other heroes, once mysterious or bugaboo and now unmitigated bores. The Byron of true and inimitable genius who may well be praised today is the poet of "Don Juan," "Beppo," "The Vision of Judgment"—Byron the letter-writer. The poet in Mr. Shaw's "Candida," even though he was created chiefly to expose the pretentious clergyman-husband is much more human, much nearer to us in his expression of revolt than any of Byron's gloomy wanderers. Yet what superb poetry there is in this same tragedy of "Manfred"!

Tschaikowsky's music illustrative of "Manfred" appeals to us, then, first of all as music with its direct effects and its suggestions, and also as an expression of Tschaikowsky's moods and attitude toward the world. As he was most human, his music composed when he was roused to deeds is still as a personal message to the hearer; we hear Tschaikowsky's voice; we share his emotions, sufferings, tortures, despair. And so "Manfred" is most effective when it is strictly personal and direct without thought of formal expression or pedagogic rhetoric.

It is by no means the greatest of his works. Too often the endeavor and the labor are apparent. The scherzo is in structure and design after the manner of Berlioz, although the song of the Alp-witch is purely Tschaikowskian. The finale as a whole is disappointing. The bacchanal in the hall of Arimanes is too deliberate, as though invitations had been sent out and letters of regret had been received. There is the thought of Arimanes on his throne with genial smile, outstretched arm and familiar speech: "Now let the sports proceed," and why a bacchanal? The Arimanes and the spirits of Byron, the destinies and Nemesis, needed no earthly food and drink; they danced no delirious dance. The end, which begins with the entrance of the organ, is an anti-climax after the tremendous death scene. Why this psalmody? Why this hint at forgiveness? Tschaikowsky might better have taken his cue from the poem:

Manfred—Old man! 'tis not so difficult to die.
Abbot—He's gone—his soul hath ta'en

Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone. But the first movement, the Manfred music in the third, the invocation, the scene between Manfred and Astarte and the death scene—these are marvellously impressive and dramatic pages. The music is alternately passionate, sinister, despairing, sepulchral. There are times when the orchestra is as a sea of sobbing, raging, shuddering voices. For it might be said of Tschalkowsky, as it was said of Baudelaire and then of Maeterlinck, he created a new shudder. He has a curiosity about death horrors and the secrets of the grave, and a felicity in the treatment of thoughts of death that recall John Webster's tragedies of Italian vengeance and violent endings. We hear in his music the cry of despairing Job: "I have said to corruption, thou art my father; to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister."

Tschalkowsky's modernity is that of nervous doubt and anxiety, and the expression is elemental. Since this modernity is that of every generation since death came into the world, since the expression is poignant and overwhelming, it would seem that the better pages of this composer must move and thrill the hearer for years to come, just as today the call of Charon in Gluck's "Alceste" chills the blood as it did nearly a century and a half ago. For love and death are the two universal and supremely engrossing subjects in life, and the complete expression of the attending joy and anguish defies the revolving years with their shifting tastes and opinions. No great love song ever seems out of fashion. No sonorous chant of death will ever be archaic.

It is easy to complain of the love of repetition, or insistent rhythm, of gorgeous colors. Tschalkowsky was an oriental, a barbarian in certain affections; but it is impossible to deny him a soaring imagination, an intensely human, emotional quality and an elemental breadth and grandeur of expression that are often overpowering.

The excerpts from the "Ring" and the "Emperor's March" are familiar here, and they now require no comment.

Mr. Gericke was greeted with spontaneous, hearty and long-continued applause, which was renewed at every opportunity. He may well be proud of the reputation of the orchestra, for it is as the work of his hands. Whatever may be thought of the character of the programmes during the past season, there is but one opinion concerning the technical proficiency and the uncommon euphony of the Boston Symphony orchestra as it exists today.

CONCERTMASTER ARBOS RESIGNS FROM SYMPHONY

Journal — May 19, 1904

Fernando Arbos, who was concertmaster and first violin of the Boston Symphony orchestra last season, has resigned. It is rumored that several other players will not be here this winter. Mr. Arbos is to resume his old position of professor in the Royal College of Music, London. Mr. Arbos' successor has not been determined upon. Franz Kneisel, one of the famous Kneisel Quartet, has been mentioned.

Symphony Concerts.

The 23d season of the Symphony orchestra was not so brilliant as some that preceded it. The standard of actual mechanical performance was high, and there were performances, such as that of Strauss' "Don Quixote," which could not easily be surpassed by any orchestra under any conductor, but the programmes were too often uninteresting and some subscribers complained of mediocrity of certain singers and players chosen as soloists.

There could be no just criticism concerning the catholic taste of Mr. Gericke as displayed in the selection of his programmes. Nationalities were thus represented:

German: D'Albert (for, although his father was French and Eugene was born at Glasgow and educated musically at first in London, where he gained a scholarship that enabled him to go to Germany for further study, d'Albert now insists angrily that he is a German, and no one with any sense of humor will contradict him). Bach 1, Bargiel 1, Beethoven 8, Brahms 7, Bruch 3, Bruckner 1, Franz 1, Gluck 1, Goldmark 1, Handel 1, Haydn 2, Kaun 1, Mendelssohn 5, Mozart 1, Raff 1, Schubert 3, G. Schumann 1, R. Schumann 2, R. Strauss 2, Strube 1, Wagner 6, Weber 3.

French: Berlioz 1, Bizet 1, Bruneau 1, Campra 1, Chabrier 1, Delibes 1, Dubois 1, Franck 1, d'Indy 2, Lalo 1, Loeffler 1—for Mr. Loeffler, we understand, ranks himself as a member of the French school—Massenet 1, Perillou 1, Poise 1, Saint-Saens 5, A. Thomas 1.

Russian: Akimenko 1, Glazounoff 3, Rachmaninoff 1, Rimsky-Korsakoff 1, Rubinstein 1, Tschalkowsky 4.

Hungarian: Dohnanyi 1, Liszt 5.

Scandinavian: Svendsen 1.

Finn: Sibelius 1.

Spanish: Arbos 1.

English: Elgar 3, Mme. Hopekirk 1.

American: Chadwick 1, Huss 1, Paine 1.

These soloists appeared: Singers, Mme. Blauvelt, Miss Foster (first time), Mme. Galski, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Hall, Mme. Melba, Mme. Schumann-Heink; violinists, Miss McCarthy, Miss Mead, Messrs. Adamowski, Arbos, Birnbaum, Sauret, Messrs. Arbos and Birnbaum played for the first time in Boston. Pianists, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Busoni, Mme. Hopekirk, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Proctor; cellist, Mr. Krasselt (his first appearance).

Mr. Ferir, the viola player, who joined the orchestra last season, displayed his unusually beautiful tone and his art in Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

The list of new pieces produced at these concerts will be found in tabulated statements at the end of this article. Some of them were not worth the rehearsal, but it is only fair that composers should have a hearing, especially when there is talk about them and their "indisputable" talent. We may wonder now at the columns written in London about Mr. Elgar and his works, but if we had not heard his "Variations" and his "Dream of Gerontius" we might be ready to burst with curiosity. To be disillusioned is good for the mental health. Dull pieces should be revived occasionally that we may see how easily preceding generations were pleased or startled.

As a whole, this series of programmes was uninteresting and the complaint against the quality of certain singers and solo players was well grounded.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

On Saturday the twenty-third season of symphony concerts came to an end, the programme consisting of Tschalkowsky's "Manfred" symphony, selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" (Siegfried passing through the fire to Brünnhilde, the morning dawn from the Götterdämmerung prologue, and Siegfried's journey to the Rhine), arranged by Richter, and Wagner's "Kaiser" march.

The Manfred symphony made a deep impression, far greater than when it was played two years ago. Latter-day sympathy is not strong for Lord Byron, the egotist with the gloomy air, who wandered about the earth seeking vainly forgetfulness of his ugly self in all sorts and kinds of unsavory adventures, neglecting only, it would seem, the experiment of behaving himself properly and trying what a good day's work once in a way might accomplish. With his habit of screaming forth his woes, furthermore, for all the world to hear, it is not easy now to find patience. Goethe admired the man, but in this day probably most people regard "Manfred," where the poet screamed of himself most loudly and frankly, much as Thackeray regarded the sorrows of Werther—something to be laughed at. In such surroundings, pages of splendid poetry are badly placed.

If Byron's dramatic poem must be revived for mankind, through music, no musician was so well fitted to the task as Tschalkowsky, himself a genius, and, also, a man familiar with sorrow and grief, and not averse to let the world know of it. As Verlaine and his kind interest the moderns, like Mr. Loeffler and Debussy, Byron must needs make a potent appeal to the tragic romanticist who knew not reserve, Tschalkowsky. At all events, in "Manfred" the Russian composer has set before us very soul torments that know no end. His orchestra shrieks, groans, howls, with a very evident sincerity that makes one shudder. No other composer ever could have done it, for no other mortal man than Tschalkowsky ever combined the necessary morbid temperament with the dramatic spirit and the technical skill; skill by itself would never answer, for manifest sincerity alone prevents such an exhibition of frantic despair as Manfred's becoming ludicrous. The first movement of the symphony is indeed truly horrible, also the close of the last, when everything vanishes into nothing; the bottom drops out of the world, for Byron and Tschalkowsky.

The performance Saturday was tremendously impressive, as has already been mentioned, and even better was that of the Wagner excerpt. Rarely do we hear the music of the "Ring" so carefully and beautifully, above all, so poetically, played. There was little noise about it; many a conductor would make twice as much din with the overture to "Lucia di Lammermoor." But it was all wonderfully satisfying, and made one wish for an opportunity to hear an entire Wagner opera from

Mr. Gericke.

The season just ended has been one of unusually brilliant playing; in its entire course never has the orchestra been in finer fettle than today. The programmes, for some reason, have not all proved interesting, although there have been new works in plenty produced—twenty-one in twenty-four concerts. For these unfamiliar compositions we must be grateful, whether they have shown themselves valuable or not, for the only way to learn is by experience. Perhaps one fault to be found with the programmes is their excessive length. The quality of the soloists, furthermore, has, on the whole, left much to be desired. However, for such orchestral playing as Mr. Gericke has given us all the year, we cannot be too thankful, and evidently everybody feels the same, for Saturday night Mr. Gericke was given a reception and a farewell, of which any conductor might well feel proud. R. R. G.

Trans. May 2, 1904.

ARBOS HAS RESIGNED

Rumor Says That Mr. Kneisel Will Return to His Old Place in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Trans. May 18, 1904.

To those who have been regular patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will come as a surprise to learn that Mr. Fernando Arbos, who occupied the seat of concert master and first violin all last season, will not be seen with the organization next winter, as he has resigned as a member of this musical organization. Before accepting an offer to come to America Mr. Arbos was a professor in the Royal College of Music in London, and at the beginning of next season he will return to his old position. Meantime he will conduct a series of summer concerts at San Sebastian, Spain, as he has been doing for several summers past.

By the management of Symphony Hall it is stated that the successor to Mr. Arbos has not yet been determined; but if one may repeat what is persistently rumored about town Franz Kneisel, who resigned as concert master at the end of last season to devote his time to concert work, will return to the position occupied for so many years. Early in the fall he started abroad with his quartet, but was suddenly recalled home late in the winter, owing to the sudden death of his young son.

It is understood that there are several others of the Symphony Orchestra who are not intending to return to Boston another season.

BERARDY.

minutes before the Symphony.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1903-1904.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
 Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
 Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
 Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
 Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
 Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
AKIMENKO: Lyric Poem, Op. 20. Feb. 27, 1904 . . . . .	944
D'ALBERT: Overture to the Opera, "The Improvisatore." Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	545
ARBOS: "Tango," Concert Piece for Violin, Op. 6, No. 3.† (E. FERNANDEZ-ARBOS†). Oct. 24, 1903 . . . . .	84
BACH, J. S. (?): Song, "If thou thy Heart bestowest."* (MAR- GUERITE HALL.) April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1368
BARGIEL: Overture to "Medea," Op. 22. Dec. 26, 1903 . . . . .	485
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36. Nov. 14, 1903 . . . . .	214
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92. Feb. 13, 1904 . . . . .	893
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93. Dec. 26, 1903 . . . . .	512
Overture in C major, Op. 115. Oct. 24, 1903 . . . . .	65
Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72. Nov. 28, 1903 . . . . .	305
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62. March 12, 1904 . . . . .	1056
Overture to "Leonore" No. 2, Op. 72. April 2, 1904 . . . . .	1196
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. Feb. 6, 1904. (OLIVE MEAD.) . . . . .	812
BERLIOZ: "Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Viola Solo, Op. 16. (Viola Solo by Mr. E. FERIR.†) Dec. 5, 1903 . . . . .	386
BIZET: Ralph's Air, "When the Flame of Love," from "The Fair Maid of Perth."* (CHARLES GILBERT.) Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	550
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. Oct. 17, 1903 . . . . .	35
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98. Feb. 6, 1904 . . . . .	821
Academic Overture, Op. 80. Dec. 5, 1903 . . . . .	365
Tragic Overture, Op. 81. March 26, 1904 . . . . .	1105
Concerto in D minor, for Violin, Op. 77. (MAUD MAC- CARTHY.) Dec. 19, 1903 . . . . .	434
Two Songs for Alto with Viola and Pianoforte Accompani- ment, Op. 91*: "Longing at Rest" and "Cradle Song of the Virgin." (MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK. Mr. Ferir, Viola; Mr. Zach, Pianist.) Feb. 27, 1904 . . . . .	944
BRUCH: Fantasia on Scottish Airs for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 46. (ALEXANDER Z. BIRNBAUM.†) Nov. 28, 1903 . . . . .	316
Andromache's Lament, from "Achilles," Op. 50.* (MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK.) Feb. 27, 1904 . . . . .	934
Penelope's Recitative and Prayer, from "Odysseus," Op. 41. (MARGUERITE HALL.) April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1350
BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Unfinished). April 2, 1904 . . . . .	1183
BRUNEAU: Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor." Oct. 17, 1903 . . . . .	28

CAMPRA: "Charming Butterfly."* (MME. BLAUVELT.) Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	629
CHABRIER: Overture to the Opera "Gwendoline." Feb. 27, 1904 . . . . .	947
CHADWICK: Concert Overture, "Euterpe."† April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1345
CHERUBINI: Overture to the Opera "Anacreon." Feb. 13, 1904, . . . . .	861
DELIBES: "Why?"* (MME. BLAUVELT.) Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	603
DOHNÁNYI: Symphony in D minor. Nov. 28, 1903 . . . . .	331
DUBOIS, THÉODORE: Overture, "Frithjof." Feb. 6, 1904 . . . . .	797
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 70. Nov. 21, 1903 . . . . .	275
Song, "Gute Nacht."* (MURIEL FOSTER.*) April 2, 1904, . . . . .	1163
ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36. Dec. 26, 1903; April 23, 1904 . . . . .	500, 1356
Prelude to the Oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius."* March 26, 1904. . . . .	1116
FRANCK: Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman." Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	614
FRANZ: Song, "In Autumn." (MARGUERITE HALL.) April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1370
GLAZOUNOFF: Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major, Op. 48. Oct. 24, 1903; Jan. 2, 1904 (by request) . . . . .	88, 576
"Carnival" Overture, Op. 45. April 9, 1904. . . . .	1251
GLUCK: Recitative and Aria, "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo." (MURIEL FOSTER.*) April 2, 1904 . . . . .	1163
GOLDMARK: Overture to "Sakuntala," F major, Op. 13. Oct. 31, 1903 . . . . .	125
HANDEL: Scena, "Sweet Bird that shun'st the Noise of Folly," from "L' Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato." (MELBA.) Dec. 26, 1903 . . . . .	494
HAYDN: Symphony in C major (B. & H., No. 7). April 9, 1904, . . . . .	1225
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9). Dec. 19, 1903 . . . . .	425
HOPEKIRK, HELEN: Concert Piece in D minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (MME. HOPEKIRK.) April 16, 1904 . . . . .	1304
HUSS: Concerto in B major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 10. (ADELE AUS DER OHE.) Nov. 14, 1903 . . . . .	192
D'INDY: "The Enchanted Forest," Symphonic Legend (after a Ballad by Uhland), Op. 8. Oct. 31, 1903. . . . .	144
Entr'acte from the Opera, "The Stranger." March 5, 1904 . . . . .	1000
KAUN, HUGO: Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1. Jan. 30, 1904 . . . . .	756
LALO: Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21. (Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.) March 12, 1904. . . . .	1048
LISZT: "The Preludes," Symphonic Poem, No. 3. April 9, 1904, . . . . .	1254
"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem, No. 12. Nov. 21, 1903 . . . . .	260
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (GEORGE PROCTOR.) Jan. 30, 1904 . . . . .	746
Concerto No. 2, in A major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (RAFAEL JOSEFFY.) March 26, 1904 . . . . .	1110
"Dance of Death," a Paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (FERRUCCIO BUSONI.) March 5, 1904 . . . . .	1004
LOEFFLER: "The Death of Tintagiles," Symphonic Poem (after the Drama by Maeterlinck). Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	554

MASSENET: "Twilight."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.) Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	572
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56. Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	632
Overture to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," Op. 32. April 2, 1904. . . . .	1165
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21. Nov. 21, 1903 . . . . .	245
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Dec. 5, 1903.§
Concerto in E minor for Violin, Op. 64. (E. FERNANDEZ ARBOS.†) Oct. 24, 1903 . . . . .	74
§ This march, not announced on the title-page of the programme-book, was played in honor of the wedding anniversary of Major Henry L. Higginson.
"Spring Song."* (MARGUERITE HALL) April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1371
MOZART: Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543). Feb. 27, 1904 . . . . .	921
PAINE: Ballet Music from "Azara." Dec. 19, 1903. . . . .	436
PÉRILHOU: "The Virgin at the Manger."* (CHARLES GILIBERT.) Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	572
POISE: Song of Gilles* from "Joli Gilles." (CHARLES GILIBERT.) Jan. 2, 1904 . . . . .	575
RACHMANINOFF: Song, "Von Jenseits."* (MURIEL FOSTER.*) April 2, 1904. . . . .	1163
RAFF: Overture, "Ein feste Burg," Op. 127.* Nov. 14, 1903 . . . . .	185
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Overture to the Opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar." April 16, 1904 . . . . .	1285
ROSSINI: Cavatina, "Una Voce poco fà," from "The Barber of Seville." (MME. BLAUVELT.) Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	610
RUBINSTEIN: Symphony No. 6, in A minor, Op. 111. Jan. 30, 1904 . . . . .	733
SAINT-SAËNS: Overture to the Opera, "The Barbarians." Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	605
Scherzo from the Concerto No. 2, in G minor, for Piano-forte, Op. 22. (HELEN HOPEKIRK.) April 16, 1904 . . . . .	1312
Concerto No. 5, in F major, Op. 103,§ for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (FERRUCCIO BUSONI.) March 5, 1904 . . . . .	994
Concerto No. 3, in B minor, for Violin, Op. 61. (EMILE SAURET.) April 9, 1904. . . . .	1232
Concerto No. 1, in A minor, for 'Cello and Orchestra, Op. 33. (RUDOLF KRASSELT.†) Nov. 21, 1903 . . . . .	256

§ First time in Boston with orchestral accompaniment.

SCHUBERT: Unfinished Symphony in B minor. April 16, 1904, . . . . .	1308
"Gretchen am Spinnrade"* and "Erlkönig." (JOHANNA GADSKI.) Oct. 31, 1903 . . . . .	123
SCHUMANN, GEORG: "In Carnival Time," Suite for Full Orchestra, Op. 22. Jan. 23, 1904 . . . . .	690
SCHUMANN, ROBERT: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38. March 5, 1904 . . . . .	981
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120. Oct. 31, 1903 . . . . .	154
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 2, in D major. March 12, 1904 . . . . .	1077
SMETANA: Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country"). Nov. 14, 1903 . . . . .	198
Overture to the Opera, "The Sold Bride." Jan. 30, 1904 . . . . .	759

STRAUSS, RICHARD: "Don Quixote" (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale): Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35. (MR. KRASSELT, 'Cello; MR. ZACH, Viola.) Feb. 13, 1904 . . . . .	876
Song: "Muttertändelei."* (MURIEL FOSTER.*) April 2, 1904 . . . . .	1163
STRUBE: Fantastic Overture, Op. 20.† March 12, 1904 : : :	1045
SVENDSEN: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, Op. 15. Jan. 23, 1904 . . . . .	669
THOMAS, AMBROISE: Ophelia's Mad Scene from "Hamlet." (MELBA.) Dec. 26, 1903 . . . . .	508
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36. March 26, 1904 . . . . .	1128
Symphony, "Manfred," after Byron's Poem, Op. 58. April 30, 1904 . . . . .	1401
"The Voyvode," Orchestral Ballad, Op. 78§ (posthumous). Dec. 5, 1903 . . . . .	374
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23. (HAROLD BAUER.) Oct. 17, 1903 . . . . .	12
VERDI: Bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers."* (MME. BLAUVELT.) Jan. 9, 1904 . . . . .	630
VOLKMANN: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, Op. 44. April 23, 1904 . . . . .	1374
Serenade No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69. (MR. KRASSELT, 'Cello.) Jan. 23, 1904 . . . . .	676
WAGNER: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." Oct. 24, 1903 . . . . .	76
Orchestral Excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement). April 30, 1904, . . . . .	1416
Overture to "Tannhäuser." Dec. 19, 1903 . . . . .	440
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." March 5, 1904 . . . . .	1013
Overture to the Opera "Rienzi." April 16, 1904 . . . . .	1314
The Emperor's March . . . . .	1418

§ First performance in Boston by an orchestra.

WEBER: Overture to "Euryanthe." Oct. 17, 1903 : : : : :	56
Overture to "Der Freischütz." Jan. 23, 1904 . . . . .	696
Recitative, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered," and Aria, "Softly Sighing," from "Der Freischütz." (JOHANNA GADSKI.) Oct. 31, 1903 . . . . .	134

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON:

SYMPHONIES.

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Unfinished). April 2, 1904.
DOHNÁNYI: Symphony in D minor. Nov. 28, 1903.
GLAZOUNOFF: Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major, Op. 48. Oct. 24, 1903 (repeated).
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 2, in D major. March 12, 1904 : : :	4

SYMPHONIC POEMS.

D'INDY: "The Enchanted Forest." Oct. 31, 1903.
KAUN: "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1. Jan. 30, 1904 : : : :	2

OVERTURES.

D'ALBERT: To "The Improvisatore." Jan. 2, 1904:
CHADWICK: "Euterpe."† April 23, 1904.
DUBOIS: "Frithjof." Feb. 6, 1904.
GLAZOUNOFF: "Carnival," Op. 45. April 9, 1904.
SAINT-SAËNS: To "The Barbarians." Jan. 9, 1904.
STRUBE: "Fantastic Overture," Op. 20.† March 12, 1904 : : :	6

SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.

AKIMENKO: Lyric Poem. Feb. 27, 1904.
ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36. Dec. 26, 1903 (repeated) . . . . .
SCHUMANN, G.: "In Carnival Time," Suite, Op. 22. Jan. 23, 1904.
STRAUSS, R.: "Don Quixote": Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale, Op. 35. Feb. 13, 1904 . . . . .	4

CONCERTOS, ETC.

ARBOS: "Tango," Piece for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 3.† (E. FERNANDEZ-ARBOS.) Oct. 24, 1903.
HOPEKIRK: Concert Piece in D minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (HELEN HOPEKIRK.) April 16, 1904.
SAINT-SAËNS: Concerto No. 5, in F major, Op. 103,§ for Piano-forte and Orchestra. (FERRUCCIO BUSONI.) March 5, 1904 . . . . .	3

OPERATIC EXCERPTS.

BRUNEAU: Entr'acte Symphonique, from "Messidor." Oct. 17, 1903.
D'INDY: Entr'acte from "The Stranger." March 5, 1904 : : :	2
	21

§ First time with orchestra.

SUMMARY.

AKIMENKO . . . . .	1	KAUN . . . . .	1
D'ALBERT . . . . .	1	LALO . . . . .	1
ARBOS . . . . .	1	LISZT . . . . .	5
BACH (?) . . . . .	1	LOEFFLER . . . . .	1
BARGIEL . . . . .	1	MASSENET . . . . .	1
BEETHOVEN . . . . .	8	MENDELSSOHN . . . . .	6
BERLIOZ . . . . .	1	MOZART . . . . .	1
BIZET . . . . .	1	PAINE . . . . .	1
BRAHMS . . . . .	7	PÉRILHOU . . . . .	1
BRUCH . . . . .	3	POISE . . . . .	1
BRUCKNER . . . . .	1	RACHMANINOFF . . . . .	1
BRUNEAU . . . . .	1	RAFF . . . . .	1
CAMPRA . . . . .	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF . . . . .	1
CHABRIER . . . . .	1	ROSSINI . . . . .	1
CHADWICK . . . . .	1	RUBINSTEIN . . . . .	1
CHERUBINI . . . . .	1	SAINT-SAËNS . . . . .	5
DELIBES . . . . .	1	SCHUBERT . . . . .	3
DOHNÁNYI . . . . .	1	SCHUMANN, G. . . . .	1
DUBOIS . . . . .	1	SCHUMANN, R. . . . .	2

DVOŘÁK . . . . .	2	SIBELIUS . . . . .	1
ELGAR . . . . .	3	SMETANA . . . . .	2
FRANCK . . . . .	1	STRAUSS, R. . . . .	2
FRANZ . . . . .	1	STRUBE . . . . .	1
GLAZOUNOFF . . . . .	3	SVENDSEN . . . . .	1
GLUCK . . . . .	1	AMBROISE THOMAS . . . . .	1
GOLDMARK . . . . .	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . . .	4
HANDEL . . . . .	1	VERDI . . . . .	1
HAYDN . . . . .	2	VOLKMANN . . . . .	2
HOPEKIRK . . . . .	1	WAGNER . . . . .	6
HUSS . . . . .	1	WEBER . . . . .	3
D'INDY . . . . .	2

112

SUMMARY BY WORKS.

I. SYMPHONIES.

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36.
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93 . . . . .	3
BERLIOZ: "Harold in Italy," Op. 16 . . . . .	1
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73:
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98 . . . . .	2
BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Unfinished)	1
DOHNÁNYI: Symphony in D minor . . . . .	1
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 2, in D minor . . . . .	1
GLAZOUNOFF: Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major, Op. 48 (repeated)	2
HAYDN: Symphony in C major (B. & H., No. 7).
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9) . . . . .	2
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56,	1
MOZART: Symphony in E-flat major (K. 543) . . . . .	1
RUBINSTEIN: Symphony No. 6, in A minor, Op. 111 . . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Unfinished Symphony in B minor . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN, R.: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120 . . . . .	2
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 2, in D major . . . . .	1
SVENDSEN: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, Op. 15 . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36.
Symphony, "Manfred" . . . . .	2
VOLKMANN: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, Op. 44 . . . . .	1

24

II. SUITES AND SERENADES.

SCHUMANN, GEORG: "In Carnival Time," Suite, Op. 22 . . . . .	1
VOLKMANN: Serenade No. 3, in D minor. (MR. KRASSELT, 'Cello) . . . . .	1

2

III. SYMPHONIC POEMS.

FRANCK: "The Wild Huntsman" . . . . .	1
D'INDY: "The Enchanted Forest," Op. 8 . . . . .	1
KAUN: "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1 . . . . .	1

LISZT: "The Preludes."

"The Ideal" . . . . . 2

LOEFFLER: "The Death of Tintagiles" (after Maeterlinck) . . . . . 1

SMETANA: "Vysehrad" . . . . . 1

7

IV. OVERTURES.

D'ALBERT: To "The Improvisatore" ** . . . . . 1

BARGIEL: "Medea" . . . . . 1

BEETHOVEN: Overture in C major, Op. 115.

"Fidelio," Op. 72.

"Coriolanus," Op. 62.

"Lenore," No. 2, Op. 72 . . . . . 4

BRAHMS: "Academic," Op. 80.

"Tragic," Op. 81 . . . . . 2

CHABRIER: To "Gwendoline" . . . . . 1

CHADWICK: "Euterpe" † . . . . . 1

CHERUBINI: "Anacreon" . . . . . 1

DUBOIS: "Frithjof" ** . . . . . 1

ELGAR: To "The Dream of Gerontius" * . . . . . 1

GLAZOUNOFF: "Carnival" ** . . . . . 1

GOLDMARK: To "Sakuntala" . . . . . 1

MENDELSSOHN: "The Legend of the Fair Melusina."

To "Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . . . 2

RAFF: "Ein feste Burg" * . . . . . 1

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: To "The Betrothed of the Tsar" . . . . . 1

SAINT-SAËNS: To "The Barbarians" ** . . . . . 1

SMETANA: To "The Sold Bride" . . . . . 1

STRUBE: Fantastic Overture, Op. 20† . . . . . 1

WAGNER: To "Rienzi."

To "Tannhäuser." . . . . . 1

To "Die Meistersinger" . . . . . 3

WEBER: To "Der Freischütz."

To "Euryanthe" . . . . . 2

27

V. ORCHESTRAL VARIATIONS.

ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36 (repeated) . . . . . 2

STRAUSS, R.: "Don Quixote," Op. 35** . . . . . 1

3

VI. OPERATIC EXCERPTS AND TRANSCRIPTIONS.

10

BRUNEAU: Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor" ** . . . . . 1

D'INDY: Entr'acte from "The Stranger" ** . . . . . 1

PAINE: Ballet Music from "Azara" . . . . . 1

WAGNER: "Waldweben" from "Siegfried."

Excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"

(Richter's arrangement) . . . . . 2

5

VII. MISCELLANEOUS.
AKIMENKO: Lyric Poem	I
MENDELSSOHN: Wedding March	I
TSCHAIKOWSKY: "The Voyvode"	I
WAGNER "The Emperor's March"	I
	4

VIII. CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS WITH ORCHESTRA.

ARBOS: "Tango," Concert Piece for Violin, Op. 6, No. 3.† (E. FERNANDEZ-ARBOS†)	I
BEETHOVEN: Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. (OLIVE MEAD)	I
BRAHMS: Concerto in D minor, for Violin, Op. 77. (MAUD MAC-CARTHY)	I
BRUCH: Fantasia on Scottish Airs for Violin, Op. 46. (ALEX-ANDER Z. BIRNBAUM†)	I
HOPEKIRK: Concert Piece in D minor, for Pianoforte. (HELEN HOPEKIRK)	I
HUSS: Concerto in B major. (ADELE AUS DER OHE)	I
LALO: Spanish Symphony for Violin, Op. 21. (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI†)	I
LISZT: "Dance of Death": Paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" for Pianoforte. (FERRUCCIO BUSONI.)	—

Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major, for Pianoforte. (GEORGE PROCTOR.)

Concerto No. 2, in A major, for Pianoforte. (RAFAEL JOSEFFY)

MENDELSSOHN: Concerto in E minor, for Violin. (E. FERNANDEZ-ARBOS**†)

SAINT-SAËNS: Scherzo from Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 22, for Pianoforte. (HELEN HOPEKIRK.)

Concerto No. 5, in F major, Op. 103, for Pianoforte.** (FERRUCCIO BUSONI.)

Concerto No. 3, in B minor, Op. 61, for Violin. (ÉMILE SAURET.)

Concerto No. 1, in A minor, for 'Cello. (RUDOLF KRASELT**†)

TSCHAIKOWSKY: Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor. (HAROLD BAUER)

IX. VOCAL MUSIC: SCENES, ARIAS, ETC.

BACH(?): Song, "If thou thy Heart bestowest."* (MARGUERITE HALL)	I
BIZET: "When the Flame of Love,"* from "The Fair Maid of Perth." (CHARLES GILIBERT)	I
BRAHMS: Two Songs for Alto with Viola and Pianoforte Accompaniment, Op. 91.* (MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK)	2
BRUCH: Andromache's Lament, from "Achilles," Op. 50.* (ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK.)	—
Penelope's Recitative and Prayer from "Odysseus," Op. 41. (MARGUERITE HALL)	2

DVOŘÁK: "Good Night."* (MURIEL FOSTER*)	I
FRANZ: "In Autumn." (MARGUERITE HALL)	I
GLUCK: "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo." (MURIEL FOSTER*)	I
HANDEL: "Sweet Bird," from "L' Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato." (MELBA)	I
MASSNET: "Twilight."* (CHARLES GILIBERT)	I
MENDELSSOHN: "Spring Song."* (MARGUERITE HALL)	I
PÉRILHOU: "The Virgin at the Manger."* (CHARLES GILIBERT)	I
POISE: Gilles's Song from "Joli Gilles."* (CHARLES GILIBERT),	I
RACHMANINOFF: "Von Jenseits."* (MURIEL FOSTER*)	I

ROSSINI: "Una Voce poco fà" from "The Barber of Seville." (LILLIAN BLAUVELT)

SCHUBERT: "Gretchen am Spinnrade."* (JOHANNA GADSKI.) "Erlkönig." (JOHANNA GADSKI)

STRAUSS, R.: "Muttertändelei."* (MURIEL FOSTER*)

THOMAS, A.: Ophelia's Mad Scene from "Hamlet." (MELBA)

VERDI: Bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers."* (LILLIAN BLAUVELT)

WEBER: Agathe's Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischütz." (JOHANNA GADSKI)

NOTE.—Mozart's aria, "Parto, parto," announced for Dec. 5, 1903 (p. 372), was not sung by Mme. Melba, nor did she sing at that concert.

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

	PAGE
MR. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI,† violinist. March 12, 1904. Lalo's Spanish Symphony, Op. 21	1048
MR. E. FERNANDEZ-ARBOS,† violinist. Oct. 24, 1903. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor; Arbos's "Tango," Concert Piece, Op. 6, No. 3. (Sketch)	72
MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE, Pianist. Nov. 14, 1903. Huss's Concerto in B major, Op. 10. (Sketch)	190
MR. HAROLD BAUER, pianist. Oct. 17, 1903. Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor. (Sketch)	8
MR. ALEXANDER Z. BIRNBAUM,† Nov. 28, 1903. Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, Op. 46. (Sketch)	314
MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT, soprano. Jan. 9, 1904. "Una Voce poco fà," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville"; Campra's "Charming Butterfly"; Delibes's "Why?"; Bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers"*	610
MR. FERRUCCIO BUSONI, pianist. March 5, 1904. Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 5, in F major, Op. 103; Liszt's "Dance of Death." (Sketch)	990
MISS MURIEL FOSTER,* contralto. April 2, 1904. Gluck's "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo"; Dvořák's "Good Night"; Rachmaninoff's "Von Jenseits"; R. Strauss's "Muttertändelei."* (Sketch)	1240

MME. JOHANNA GADSKI, soprano. Oct. 31, 1904. Agathe's Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischütz"; Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade"* and "Erlkönig." (Sketch)	130
MR. CHARLES GILIBERT, baritone. Jan. 2, 1904. Ralph's Air from Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth"; Massenet's "Twilight"; Périllhou's "Virgin at the Manger"; Song of Gilles from Poise's "Joli Gilles." (Sketch)	548
